

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

MASONIC.

For the American Masonic Register and Literary Companion.

To behold a band of brothers, joined by the most sacred ties which can bind social beings, and at the same time realize that we have fellowship with that band, if accompanied with a conscience void of offence towards God and towards man, is the greatest felicity which we can expect to enjoy while we remain on earth.

The antiquity of the institution of Freemasonry is well established by the fact that the era of its commencement is lost to the world by its preceding the annal of human record. It is certain that it was the medium by which the heaven of civilization, morality and science, was carried through what are emphatically called the dark ages, to expand and adorn the enlightened age in which we now live. A large portion of the great and the good in all ages have composed its members. It was early introduced into America, and cherished by the most eminent founders of the new world. Most of the heroes and sages of the Revolution belonged to the order, and they seem to have copied from its principles and regulations the form of that free government which is the pride of the nation and envy of the world.

The enemies of our order have been coeval with the existence of the institution, although they have filled all ranks in society, from the king to the beggar: one general feature has been stamped on the character of the whole mass. INTOLERANCE AND TYRANNY.

It is not our intention to eulogize the masonic institution, or the good and great men who have honored it by their fellowship, or been honored by its confidence nor to point out ancient enemies. That the principles of the institution are good—that we have often seen their beneficial effects, in rendering assistance to the weak and helpless—sustenance and clothing to the needy—counsel to the ignorant and inexperienced—consolation to the afflicted, and otherwise alleviating the miseries of mankind—and that much pleasure and even happiness is enjoyed at the convocations of the craft, we all know: and to even repeat the names of conspicuous worthies who have belonged to the institution, or those who have with an unholy zeal waged war against it, would be superfluous, as those particulars are well known to the world generally, and especially to every mason.

From despots, demagogues and traitors, we have nothing seriously to fear for the safety of the masonic institution. No, Brethren—for the safety of that institution we have nothing to fear, but from ourselves. For although its principles are based on a foundation which will withstand "the wreck of matter and the crash of worlds," yet the institution may be driven from this earth by its inhabitants becoming too base and degenerate for the abode of so sublime a resident: but this can be effected only by ourselves; by ourselves we mean we who still profess to support and revere the institution and its principles. All the despots of Europe, seconded by a thousand professed Judases, cannot injure the institution as much as one pretended supporter who disregards all its precepts, and acts in direct opposition to all its sacred principles.

Therefore, Brethren, let us at all times hold the character of the institution as a precious jewel, given us in charge to preserve unblemished and unsullied, and at the same time realize that our own deportment and conduct is to affect in a greater or less degree the lustre of that jewel. We should be very circumspect in our conduct towards each other and towards the world, towards each other, that our examples may be safely followed by our brethren and towards the world that the institution to which we are known to belong may not, through our means, suffer disgrace. As members of the great body of the fraternity, we should punctiliously attend every regular communication of the craft within our legitimate spheres, and guard well the approach of the unworthy from without, and endeavor to correct abuses within.

To "render unto Caesar the things which are Caesar's and unto God the things which are God's;" to deal honestly and uprightly with every one; to injure no man in person, property or reputation, and to live peaceably and quietly with mankind, is the duty of all men: but we as masons, have further duties to perform. It is our particular duty to relieve want and distress among mankind generally, and especially among the brotherhood; to aid and assist, protect and defend, the destitute, helpless and innocent, who need our assistance or protection, to whatever society they belong, or wherever they may be found. To that fairest portion of creation, woman, who from the fitness of things is excluded from our labors, we particularly owe this duty and we are to presume all those to be destitute and helpless who appear to be so, and all to be innocent whom we shall have no good reason to suppose guilty. A mason should never perform an act which he or others would be ashamed to confess was done by one of the fraternity, and in unison with its principles; nor should he omit an act, if reasonably within his power, which would add lustre to the character of the order. Relative to our conduct generally, the excellent precepts and charges adopted by the institution are replete with instruction, and, when adhered to and obeyed, will lead us in the right path; these should be often conned over in our minds and imprinted in our hearts. As we have taken the Holy Bible for our rule of conduct through life, we should always square our actions by that divine guide, and act in accordance with its Divine requisitions.

Finally, Companions and Brethren—If we live in accordance with the principles of the institution, and are guided by its precepts—taking the Holy Bible for our rule of conduct through life—we shall constantly possess.

"What naught on earth can give or can destroy
The soul's calm sun shine and the heart-felt joy."

with a steadfast hope and reasonable assurance that, when we have finished our labors here below, and laid by this tenement of clay, we shall be found worthy to enter the grand Asylum above—"that house not made with hands Eternal in the Heavens."

SUMMARY

Of the Proceedings of the Grand Lodge of the State of New York, June 5th A. L. 5839.

The Annual Communication of the R. W. G. Lodge of Free and Accepted Masons of the State of New York, was held at the Grand Lodge Room in the City of New York, on Wednesday evening the 5th of June, and was opened in DUE FORM.

The Minutes of the last Grand Lodge having been read, the Grand Secretary, read his annual Report, from which we extract:—

"The Grand Secretary has great pleasure in communicating to the Grand Lodge, that the general condition and prospects of the Masonic order in this state are highly satisfactory. Many of the Lodges in the City of New York, have been constantly, at labor through the past year, and are in a flourishing condition. The tide of prosperity is rising and flowing up the rivers to the north and west. Our remotest frontier Lodges are once more at work.

The receipts of the year from May 30th. 1838, to May 29th. 1839, have amounted to $1557.58.

"Since the last annual meeting, the following Lodges have been revived! Fidelity Lodge, No 309, at Trumansburgh, in Tompkins County; Phoenix Lodge No 361 at Lansingburgh, in Rensselaer County, and Brownville Lodge, No. 318, at Brownville in Jefferson County."

The Foreign Correspondence of the past year has been extensive, and of the most gratifying character.—We continue to receive the strongest assurances from all quarters of the friendly support of the Grand Lodges in the efforts now making by this Grand Lodge to maintain the integrity and pure principles of the order inviolate. The system proposed by this Grand Lodge in June last, to exchange representatives with foreign Grand Lodges, is, gradually going into operation and will no doubt be universally adopted.

The R. W. Brother John Norman, of Dublin, has been received and accredited as the Representative of this Grand Lodge in the Grand Masonic Lodge of Ireland.

The R. W. Abraham Howard Quincy, of Washington City, has been received and accredited as the Representative of this Grand Lodge, in the Grand Lodge of the District of Columbia.

The Grand Lodge of Ireland is represented here by the W. Robert R. Boyd.

The Grand Lodge of the District of Columbia by the W. William C. Burnett.

The Grand Lodge of Rhode Island by the R. W. Joseph S. Cooke.

The system has been approved by the Grand Lodges of New Jersey and North Carolina, and, as we are informed, by our Representative in Dublin, by the Grand Lodge of Scotland.

The following is a copy of the letter of condolence written by order of the Grand Lodge at their last quarterly meeting, to the widow and family of the late Past Grand Master Stephen Van Rensselaer.

THE GRAND LODGE OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK.

To Mrs. Cornelia Van Rensselaer.

MADAM—The Grand Lodge of the Ancient and Honorable Fraternity of Free and Accepted Masons of the State of New York, over which the late Major General Stephen Van Rensselaer, your husband, presided for many years, beg leave to offer to his bereaved Widow and Family, the sympathy and condolence of friends, who knew his worth and honored him for his virtues.

Time, while it blunts the edge of sorrow, hallows the memory of departed worth, and the honors which are decreed to those who have passed the veil of immortality, are not the less sincere, when offered after time has set its seal upon regret. Deep and sincere is the sorrow which prevails in our Fraternity at the loss which you, which they, and which society have sustained, in the decease of our late Grand Master and faithful Friend.

His name will remain upon the records of our Order as the highest, and the most conspicuous, when a legion of enemies surrounded it, and by an unjust and cruel persecution attempted its destruction. At such a time he refused to comply with even his own wishes for retirement, and interposed the shield of his unimpeached public and private character, to turn aside the poisoned shafts of Anti-Masonry.

A grateful sense of honorable obligation binds us to revere the memory of our departed Brother; and while our Lodges are clothed in the sable habiliments of woe we would offer to the widow and the afflicted family of our late Grand Master, the consolations of the Gospel of Peace; and unite with them in our prayers to God that, after the journey of life is closed, we may, like him, "sink to rest," surrounded by the blessings of the poor, and in the bright hope of eternal life.

By order of the Grand Lodge.

JAMES HERRING, Grand Secretary.

The following officers were unanimously elected for the ensuing year:—

M. W. MORGAN LEWIS, of Dutchess Co. Grand Master.

Rt. W. Wm. Willis, of New York, Deputy Grand Master.

" Joseph Cuyler, of Johnstown Senior Grand Warden.

" John D. Willard of Troy Senior Grand Warden.

" James Herring of New York, Grand Secretary.

Rt. W. & Rev. Evan M. Johnson of Brookling

Rt. W. & Rev. Coogland, of Flathush,

R. W. & Rev. Wm. S. Walker of Troy,

R. W. & Rev. Salem Town, of Cayuga.

Grand Chaplains.

W. Gerrit Lansing, Grand Pursuivant.

Bro. James Thorburn, Grand Tyler.

A Report from the Committee on the publication of a Masonic paper was received and adopted, and is as follows:—

The Committee to whom was referred the prospectus of Brother L. G. Hoffman, in relation to the establishment of a Masonic Newspaper, beg leave to report:

That having had the same under consideration, they feel satisfied that a paper devoted to Masonic intelligence, and conducted in a mild and conciliatory spirit would be auxiliary to the cause of Masonry, and at the same time be the instrument of doing much good without the walls of the Institution. In the prospectus of Brother Hoffman, now before us, the Committee have the assurance that this course will be sedulously observed, and the Committee have directed their chairman to bring in the following resolution:

Resolved, As the sense of this Grand Lodge, that it is deemed expedient for the Masonic Fraternity of this State, to have an organ of communication, and that from the views of Brother L. G. Hoffman, as expressed in his printed proposals, this Grand Lodge would, and do recommend his publication to the kind wishes of the Fraternity, wherever dispersed.

JOHN D. WILLARD.

JOHN S. PERRY.

R. R. BOYD.

On Motion, it was ordered that the Grand Secretary publish a complete list of all the Lodges with the old and new numbers, according to the dates of their warrants.

Ordered, that the Grand Secretary of the Grand Lodge, and the Secretary of every subordinate Lodge shall keep a book, in which shall be written or printed the following words:—"We the subscribers do promise upon the pledge of our Masonic obligations and honor that while we continue within the jurisdiction of the Grand Lodge of the State of New York, we will support and conform to the constitution and regulations thereof;" to which every member of said Lodge shall subscribe his name, and every visitor shall subscribe the same before he shall be permitted to enter the Lodge; and every applicant for relief shall sign the same before his petition shall be acted on by the Grand Lodge, the Grand Stewards, or by any subordinate Lodge.

After the transaction of some other business, the Grand Lodge adjourned to meet at 4 o'clock, at the Shakespeare, to dedicate the new Lodge Room, and to meet again at the Grand Lodge Room, at 7 o'clock.

The Committee on Foreign Correspondence presented the following report which was accepted and adopted.

The Committee on Foreign Correspondence have examined communications from the Grand Lodges of Ireland, Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, District of Columbia, Virginia, North Carolina, Kentucky, Georgia, Alabama, Florida, Indiana, and Louisiana, from the General Grand Encampment of the U. States—the General Grand Chapter of the United States, and the Grand Chapters of New Hampshire and Tennessee. The most important matters to this Grand Lodge contained in these communications are already extracted, and made known by the Grand Secretary in his different reports at the present session of the Grand Lodge. We cannot, however, avoid expressing our gratification at the interesting fact, which is apparent throughout these communications, that the progress of our institution is once more onward and prosperous.

The following resolution was proposed by the W. Brother Boyd, and unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed to ascertain where, and at what price, a site can be obtained for a Masonic Hall, and a plan for the same, estimates for building, and recommend a plan for raising money to pay for the same, and report to this Grand Lodge at the next Annual Communication.

Worshipful Brothers R. R. Boyd, Waring, Herring, Jarvis and Pennell, were nominated by the chair, and confirmed by the Grand Lodge. The Rt. Worshipful Deputy Grand Master and Senior Grand Warden were added to the committee.

HISTORICAL.

From the Knickerbocker of August.

N A P O L E O N.—BY BROUGHAM.

The superb English edition of the second series of the LORD BROUGHAM'S Historical Sketches reaches the country, and our round table, at too late an hour for an elaborate or adequate review. We cannot, however, forbear to say, that we have read the volume through, with an enhancement of the pleasure which the first series afforded us. The sketches of the present division are twenty in number, and include those of WASHINGTON, LAFAYETTE, NAPOLEON, TALLEYRAND, the MIRABEAU family, etc. We had marked for insertion the sketches of NAPOLEON and WASHINGTON, which are admirable considered in contrast; but our limited space compels us to forego their insertion, and to content ourselves with a passage or two from the paper upon the character of the great general:

"When the fortunes of war proved adverse, the resources of his mind were only drawn forth in the more ample profusion. * * Let us not forget that the grand error of his whole career, the mighty expedition to Moscow, was a political error only. The vast preparation for that campaign; the combination by which he collected, and marshalled, and moved this prodigious and various force, like a single corps, or a domestic animal, or a lifeless instrument in his hand, displayed, in the highest degree, the great genius for arrangement and for action with which he was endowed, and his prodigious effort to regain the ground which the disasters of that campaign rescued from his grasp, were only not successful, because no human power could in a month create an army of cavalry, nor a word of command give to recruits the discipline of veterans. In the history of war, it is assuredly only Hannibal who can be compared with him. His course of victory had been for twelve years uninterrupted. The resources of France had been poured out without stint at his command. The destruction of her liberties had not relaxed the martial propensities of her people, nor thinned the multitude that poured out their blood under his banner. The Conscription worked as great miracles as the Republic. The countless hosts which France poured forth, were led by this consummate warrior over all Italy, Spain, Germany; half the ancient thrones of Europe were subverted, the capitals of half her power occupied in succession; and a monarchy was established, which the existence of England and of Russia alone prevented from being universal.

But the vaulting ambition of the great conqueror at last overshot itself. After his most arduous and perhaps most triumphant campaign, undertaken with a profusion of military resources unexampled in the annals of war, the ancient capitals of the Russian empire was in his hands; yet, from the refusal of the enemy to make peace, and the sterility of the vast surrounding country, the contest was bootless to his purpose. He had collected the mightiest army that the world ever saw; from all parts of the continent he gathered his forces; every diversity of blood, and complexion, and tongue, and garb, and weapon shone along his line; the resources of whole provinces moved through the kingdoms which his arms held in awe; the artillery of whole citadels traversed the fields; the cattle on a thousand hills were made the food of the myriads whom he poured into the plains of Eastern Europe, where blood flowed in rivers, and the earth was whitened with men's bones. But this gigantic enterprise, uniformly successful, was found to have no object, when it had no longer an enemy to overcome, and the victor in vain sued to the vanquished for peace. The conflagration of Moscow in one night began his discomfiture, which the frost of another night completed. Upon the pomp and circumstance of unnumbered warriors—their cavalry, their guns, their magazines, their equipage—descended slowly, flake by flake, the snow of a northern night. The hopes of Napoleon were blighted; the retreat of his armament was cut off; and his doom sealed far more irreversibly than if the conqueror of an hundred fields had been overthrown in battle, and made captive with half his force. All his subsequent effort to regain the power he had lost, never succeeded in countervailing the effect of that Russian night. The fire of his genius burned, if possible, brighter than ever. In two campaigns, his efforts were more than human, his resources more miraculous than before, his valor more worthy of the prize he played for. But all was vain. His weapon was no longer in his hand; his army was gone; and his adversaries, no more quailing under the feeling of his superior nature, had discovered him to beincible, like themselves, and grew bold in their turn.

"No man ever could bring such bodies into the field; none provide by combined operations for their support; none move such masses from various quarters upon one point; none manoeuvre at one fight the thousands whom he had assembled, change his operations as the fate of the hour or the moment required, and tell with such absolute certainty the effects of each movement. He had all the knowledge in minute detail which the art of war requires; he had a perfectly accurate appreciation of what men, and horses, and guns could do; his memory told him, and in an instant, where each corps, each regiment each gun was situated, both in peace and war, and in what condition almost each company of his vast force was at any moment. Then possessed the intuitive knowledge of his enemy's state, and movements, and plans; so nicely could he unravel all conflicting accounts, and decide at once, as by intuition, which was true. In the field his eye for positions, distances, elevations, numbers, was quick, and it was infallible."

* * "Lying under some cover in fire, he would remain for an hour or two, receiving reports and issuing his orders, sometimes with a plan before him, sometimes with the face of the ground in his mind only. There he is, with his watch in one hand, while the other moves constantly from his pocket, where his snuff box, or rather his snuff, lies. An aid-de-camp arrives, tells of a movement, answers shortly some questions rapidly, perhaps impatiently put, is despatched with the other that is to solve the difficulty of some general of division. Another is ordered to attend, and sent off with directions to make some distant corps support an operation. The watch is again consulted; more impatient symptoms; the name of some one aid-de-camp is constantly pronounced; question after question is put, whether any one is coming from a certain quarter; an event is expected; it ought to have happened. At length the wished for messenger arrives: « Eh bien!—Qu'a-ton fait la bas? » « La hauteur est gagnée; le maréchal est là. » « Qu'il tienne ferme; pas un pas de mouvement. » Another aid-de-camp is ordered to bring up the guard. « Que le maréchal avance vers la tour en défilant par sa gauche; et tout ce qui se trouve à sa droite est prisonnier. » Now the watch is consulted, and the snuff is taken no more; the battle is over, the fortune of the day is decided; the great captain indulges in pleasantries, nor doubts any more of the certainty and of the extent of his victory, than if he had already seen is details in the bulletin." * * * "He saw as clearly and as quickly determined on his course, in government as in the field. His civil courage was more brilliant than his own or most other men's valor in battle. How ordinary a bravery it was that blazed forth at Lodi, when he headed his wavering columns across the bridge swept by the field of Austrian artillery, compassed with the undaunted and sublime courage that carried him from Cannes to Paris with a handful of men, and fired his bosom with the desire, and sustained it with confidence, of overthrowing a dynasty, and overwhelming an empire, by the terror of his name." * * * "But with these qualities which form the character held greatest by vulgar minds, the panegyric of Napoleon must close. He was a conqueror—he was a tyrant.—To gratify his ambition; to slake his thirst of power; to weary a lust of dominion which no conquest could satiate: he trampled on Liberty, when his hand might have raised her to a secure place; and he wrapt the world in flames which the blood of millions alone could quench. By these passions, a mind not originally unkind, was perverted and deformed, till human misery ceased to move it, and honesty, and truth, and pity, all sense of the duties we owe to God and to man had departed from one thus given up to a single and a selfish pursuit."

The force and beauty of these passages cannot fail to win the reader's admiration. Mr. Brougham affirms that it is equally true, that Bonaparte was kindly in his nature, and inhumanly cruel. He once saw a letter of the emperor to a favorite brother, which was replete with the tenderest affection, and in parts blotted with tears, evidently shed before the ink was dry: yet the writer could give a command, which must consign thousands to agony and death; he could direct his cavalry to press forward the foot, in a forced march, until thousands were trampled down, and miserably perished by the way; he could order an attack, with no other object than to gratify his mistress, while yet a young officer of artillery. These acts, with the death of Englien, the cruel sufferings of Wright, the mysterious end of Pichegru, the punishment of Palm, and the tortures of Toussain, with other equally dark spots upon his fame, make us feel the full force of Mr. Brougham's transition to the character of our own Washington: 'How grateful the relief which the friend of mankind, the lover of virtue, experiences, when, turning from the contemplation of such a character, his eye rests on the greatest man of our own or any age; the only one upon whom an epithet so thoughtlessly lavished by men, to foster the crimes of their worst enemies, may be innocently and justly bestowed!'

MISCELLANY.

A POLICE SKETCH.

BY JOSEPH C. NEAL.

'It is most astonishing!' said Richard Mervyn, as he relinquished the attempt to rise from the gutter at the corner Sixth and Prune streets, it is really astonishing how soon this dreadful climate of America brings on old age. I shall never get home to write a book, but it never. Here am I six feet two, without my stockings, sprawling in a dirty republican gutter, without being able to help myself out of it. There's that lamp winking and blinking in my face, as if it wants to laugh, and would if it had a mouth; and a big brute of a dog just smelt of me to see whether I was good to eat. What a country! what gutters! and what liquor! I only took nine smallers of whiskey, and what with that and a premature old age, I verily believe I'm a gone chicken!'

Mr. Mervyn now clamored so loudly that assistance soon came.

'Silence there! what's the matter?'

'Matter yourself; I'm being done, or as some people say, I'm doing. The march of mind has tripped, and Richard Mervyn is too deep for himself. Help me out gently there. Aint I in a pretty pickle. This is what the doctors call gutta serena, is'n't it?'

'When I was at school, the boys would have called you gutteral.'

'They would'n't have known much grammar if they did. I'm a liquid—see me drip.'

'Oh, oh! said the watch, 'dont try to be funny; I know you well enough, now you've wiped your face. You are the chap that locked me up in my box once, and when I burst open the door you knocked me heels over head and legged it.'

'That's me. I did that thing. How did you like the ups and downs of public life? Is'n't variety charming?'

'If it was'n't that I am a public functionary, and mus'n't give way to my feelings, I'd crack your coco, and ease my mind by doing as I was done by. I'll make an example of you however. You're my prisoner. Hully coosha to the watch'us. That's the dutch for being tucked up.'

'Well give us your arm. Dont be afraid of the mud'

Gutter mud is very wholesome. Look at the pigs how fat it makes 'em, and if you like fat pork, why should'n't you like what makes pork fat? So so; steady. Now I'll tell you all about tother night. I was passing your box friendly, promiscuous sort of a way, I thought you were asleep, or had run down, and I turned the key to wind you up. If a watch aint wound up it can't either keep good time, or even go.'

'Well, what else?'

'Why then I watched the box, and when you came out, I boxed the watch. That's all. It grew out of my obliging disposition.'

'Ha! very obliging. Now it is my turn to wind you up, and to do it in the same way, I'll take you before the watchmaker, to be cleaned and regulated. You go to fast, but he'll put a spoke in your wheel; he'll set you by the state house and make you keep good time.'

'Why watch you're a wag. Why don't you say that I was a horizontal, and you lifted me up like a patent lever? You're wide awake now; but that night you wer'n't up to trap on you would have caught me. I caught a weasle asleep that night. I put fresh salt on you for once.'

To add more to his vagaries, Mervyn now refused to walk a step further; and sitting down on a step, loudly avowed his determination, declaring that his name was not Walker.

'Whether your name is Walker or not you must go.'

'Not without a go cart; you cant force me to go; I am a legal tender, and you must take me. Hav'n't got an office, or at least aint I in a public situation, here on the steps, Mr. Charley Rattletraps. If I must go, it shall be on the yankee principle of rotation; bring me a wheel-barrow. Reform me out regularly.'

Persuasion being useless, the officer procured assistance and a wheel-barrow in which Mervyn was placed. Away they went.

'So we go,' said Mervyn. 'Charley's making a borrow night of me. Gently over the stones. I don't like bumpers, except when I get them of porter. This is the way to Wheeling; hurrah! cart before the horse!'

When arrived at the watch house, Mervyn insisted upon being wheeled up stairs, and styled the place a BARROW nail castle.

'I'm a modest man,' said he and no stainer. If I can't have a ride up I think myself entitled to a drawback.'

So saying he attempted to escape but not being so nimble with his feet as with his tongue he was soon caught and lugged back, being as he said, Goldsmith's work, beautifully chased. Willing hands make short work, and therefore our unsavory punster was soon carried up aloft, and next morning sober and penitent, paid his tipsy fine and carriage hire with a doleful countenance.

A CURIOUS HISTORICAL FACT.

The first rough model of a steamboat, made by Fulton in New York, was cut out of a shingle, shaped like a mackerel, with the paddles placed further in front than behind, like the fins of a fish. The paddle-wheel had been first put in the rear on the sculling principle, but was advanced on consulting with Mr. Greenwood, the well known ingenious dentist of New York now deceased, in whose possession the model remained for many years. Old Admiral Landais, whom many of our readers recollect as the enemy of Paul Jones, was also in frequent consultation with Greenwood at the time. He recommended the paddle-wheel to be placed in the stern and to be moved by a tunnel-shaped sail, which was to catch the wind even when it blew directly ahead, and thus communicate the power by reaction to the wheel.

LABOR SAVING SOAP.

The following is a recipe for making the labor-saving soap, (so called,) which is an excellent article for washing, and a saving of labor. The recipes for making have been sold from $5 to $10, and the soap 7 cents per pound; but can be manufactured for about two cents. Take two pounds of sal soda, two pounds of yellow bar soap, and ten quarts of water; cut the soap in thin slices and boil all together two hours; then strain it through a cloth, let it cool, and it is fit for use. Directions for using the soap:—Put the clothes in soak the night before you wash, and to every pail of water in which you boil them, add one pound of soap. They will need no rubbing; merely rinse them out, and they will be perfectly clean and white.

IRISH HUMOR.

Darby Kelly went to confession, and having detailed his several sins of omission and commission, to which various small penalties were attached, at last came, with a groan, to the awful fact that he had stolen his neighbor Kitty Mahony's pig: a crime so heinous in the sight Father Tobin that his reverence could by no manner of means give him absolution for the same.—Darby begged, and promised, but to no effect: no penance could make atonement—no repentance could produce the effect; nothing, in short, but restitution; that is to say, to give back her own to Kitty Mahony.

But a difficulty arose, inasmuch as Darby and Darby's children had eaten up the pig. Upon which the priest waxed very wrath and threatened the rogue with evil here and a terrible destiny hereafter. 'And now hear me, ye vagabond cheat,' said he, 'when ye go to stand yer trial, and find yerself among the goats (for sheep ye are not,) to get your sentence, there'll be two witnesses against ye—there'll be Kitty Mahony, that ye robb'd, and the pig that ye ate; and what will ye do then, ye vagabond?' 'Och plaze yer riverence and is it true what you say, that Kitty Mahony herself will be there?' 'She will.' 'And the pig I ate; will the pig be to the fore?' 'He will.'—'Och, thin, plaze yer riverence, if Kitty Mahony will be there, and the pig be there, what'll hinder me from saying, Kitty Mahony, bad luck to your soul there's yer pig.' 'Sure won't that be restitution?'

THE UNNATURAL PARENT.

The maintenance of military fidelity and discipline seems to the present emperor of Russia an object for which all human ties may well be sacrificed. In March 1838, a woman named Maria Nikoforesco, the widow of a peasant, received a letter from her son Novik, a soldier in the stationary battalion of Tambow. In this letter the son stated that the barbarous treatment which he and others endured at the hands of the regimental officers, had driven him to the resolution of deserting from a service into which he had been forced at the first, and that in a few days after the date of his communication, he hoped to see and embrace his mother. The first thing done by the mother on receipt of this letter was to carry it to the governor of the province, who, astonished at the unnatural character of the action, sent the woman away without taking any steps in consequence of her disclosure. Some days later, the deserter arrived at the dwelling of his mother, who received him with open arms, and loaded him with caresses. But she took an opportunity immediately afterwards to go to the police-officers, to whom she delivered up the child to whom she had given birth, and whom she had nursed at her breast. Compelled by his duty, the governor addressed a detailed report of the case to the emperor. Nicholas viewed the matter differently from the governor. The autocrat issued an ukase, decreeing a silver medal to Maria Nikoforesco, with these words engraved on it, 'Devoted to the Throne.' This medal was to be suspended from her neck by the ribbon of the Order of St. Ann, and the woman was further secured, for the rest of her life, against the chances of want. It was moreover decreed that the circumstances of the case should be published in all the journals of the empire, that its subject might imitate this example of fidelity and devotion to the throne. The young soldier, in accordance with the military regulations of Russia, was subjected to the knout, and died under the blows. The unnatural parent wears the pride as if she had won it by the most virtuous action.

A tea spoonful of finely powdered charcoal, drank in a half a tumbler of water, will in less than fifteen minutes give relief to the sick head ache, when caused by a sour stomach.

POPULAR TALES.

For the American Masonic Register and Literary Companion.
A TALE OF SLANDER.

There is perhaps no vice so much tolerated in society at the same time so deleterious in its effects as evil speaking. It is confined to no class of community; the high, the low, the rich, the poor, the old and young are alike its victims.

"Good morning," Mrs. Adams, I hope you will excuse my troubling you so early, I have called to enquire concerning Mary Munson, she informs me that she has been living with you the past three months, and if you can give her a character, I shall be glad to take her into my employ.

"Why, as to character, I suppose she is well enough, but she is a perfect drone, and there is no keeping one's patience when she is about the house, besides she is so untidy that I was obliged to dismiss her. I felt sorry for the child, and bore with her as long as I could; but she is a very artful girl, and one consideration that weighed more especially, with me, was a certain turn of mind that I have recently discovered in her that does not promise very fair. You know Mary is rather pretty, and the truth is I did not choose to expose my son, who is but two years older than herself, to her fascinating lures, you know Mrs. Smith, it becomes a mother to be prudent."

"It does indeed," but really I am shocked, that one so young and lovely in appearance, should indicate a disposition so far from amiable; for certainly I felt quite an interest in the child. She does not appear to be more than 16 years of age. "I am sorry that any thing I have said, should diminish your interest in her, and wish I could recall it; but I should not like to be deceived myself, and to tell the truth, I much feared her influence on my Caroline, for, although I should not permit Caroline to associate with a servant, yet she was necessarily thrown frequently into her presence, and the unhappy effect was already obvious. For myself, although it was very painful to my feelings, and an entire violation of the sympathies of my nature, I feel that in the removal of that girl from my family, a heavy load is removed from my spirit. It is true, since she left, I have missed several articles of value from the house, but I do not accuse her, and yet I know of no other person who could have taken them."

"O well, it is most fortunate, that I called on you, for I had thought seriously of receiving her into my family as a companion, for Louisa; but if there are such dark traits in her character, it will never do."

"Oh, now Mrs. Smith, do not let any thing that I have said, hinder your generosity. It is true these things look dark, and I have not told you half, but you might reform her perhaps."

"Ah there is little hope of that; when one so young indicates that vice is germinating in her bosom, the chance of reform is very small. No, I must not permit my sympathy to warp my judgment; and yet her poor mother, I feel for her."

"Her mother's case is indeed pitiable, but still I am told she has brought her affliction upon herself, by her pride, and imprudence; though even that, should not close our hearts to pity, yet one feels more free to exercise charity when the object is worthy. But pray Mrs. Smith how come you to know any thing of Mary?"

"I have heard her spoken of with interest by both my son, and daughter; and she called on me last week to obtain a situation as domestic."

"Is it possible! Ah! I understand it now; your son George noticed her when here, and now she wishes to place herself in his way. Take my word for it, Mrs. Smith, Mary Munson is a dangerous girl to adopt into your family. I know your generous heart, would be too easily duped by that artful girl, but I have said enough to put you on your guard, if you have the interest of your children, especially your son, at heart."

The persons we have thus unceremoniously introduced to our readers, were as opposite in their dispositions, as can well be imagined. The one a widow, generous almost to a fault, but weak, and unsuspecting. Her family consisted of herself, a son at the age of twenty years, and a daughter of 16. The other lady was an artful designing woman whose husband followed the sea. She has already been intimated, had a son aged 18, and a daughter, 1 year older. But who was Mary Munson. She was a distant relative of Mrs. A——, and indeed a child of sorrow. Her father, though once respectable had quaffed from the inebriating cup, and sank into an abyss, shame and misery, and his amiable wife and lovely daughter, were now reaping the fruits of his departure from the paths of virtue.

Mary, besides all her other misfortunes, was the victim of detraction and envy. She had at first (as a very great favour) been received into the family of Mrs. Adams, in the capacity of seamstress, and by this means she became acquainted with many who frequented Mrs. A——'s house; and among others, Mr. George Smith, the son of the lady first introduced.—This young gentleman called at first from mere etiquette to see Miss Adams, but attracted by the superior charms of Mary, had become a frequent visitor; a circumstance of no little importance to an ambitious, and designing mother. And when she first perceived his partiality to Mary, she resolved to take measures to prevent their farther intercourse, and accordingly degraded her to the capacity of a common servant, and subsequently discharged her entirely. Mary had learned that Mrs. Smith was in need of help, and applied for a situation; but was entirely ignorant of the relation existing between that lady, and George.

My, my dear, hand me a glass of water, I feel as if the struggle will soon be over. I soon shall be where I shall no more say, I thirst, and you my daughter will be an orphan indeed, but I feel assured that you will find friends. He that feeds the ravens, and clothes the lilies will feed and clothe my poor deserted child, yes, deserted by him who should have been my stay, and thine. These words were uttered by an emaciated female, who was struggling with the King of Terrors, on a bed of straw, in a lowly cabin. It was evidently the abode of poverty, and yet neatness pervaded the whole apartment. The dying female was Mary's mother, and Mary was her only nurse. The damp of death was standing on her brow. Mary, she exclaimed, I shall not see your father more, but he will doubtless return, before the grave shall close over my poor body. Yes, he will have sober moments ere that, and then, my daughter promise to deliver to him my dying message.

From Denton's Miscellany.
THE FATHER.

THE interest of the following narrative (if interest it possess) is founded on the parental affection. To many the degree of it therein portrayed may appear morbid; but to those I would submit a few remarks on children considered as a great class of society, not as embryo elements of it—mere things of promise and present pastime. In pleasantry we may designate them as a happy little people, who have no need of laws, pains, and punishments, among them; but when we seriously reflect on the corrupting and hardening effect on our hearts of worldly pursuits and collision with our fellow-men, and then turn to these innocent beings, happy by unerring instinct only, not through false views, or vicious aims, or the sufferings of others; when we grasp the little hand put artlessly into ours, when we look into the fair countenance, and say, "Here is the hand that never did offence, the eye that never looked it, the mind that never thought less innocently than the spirits of heaven!"—I say, when wearied with our worldly conflict, we turn into our domestic circle, and thus muse over these, its purest ornaments, are we not justified in regarding children as a most important body? as a sort of link between our polluted degenerate selves, and that primeval innocence, of which we have on earth no representative or image left, but "little children?" Surely it is something to enjoy daily so beautiful, so pure a spectacle, as a multitude of creatures of our own nature, without a speck of that defilement incident to all adult nature; creatures which realize all the ideas we can form of life in heaven,—of the society of angels.

I cannot but think that this constant presence of human nature, pure and happy, of simple and innocent enjoyment, exerts a great, though little noticed influence on this whole great fighting family of man; and that each member of it foregoes somewhat of his selfishness, abates something of his fury, after every such contemplation of something happier than himself, which never yet regarded self, never was infuriated by passions. No wonder that the greatest of men have mostly evinced a passionate fondness for children; neither is it surprising that in some persons, not otherwise of weak character, such fondness should even rise to excess. In our mourning over a lost child the very sources of our comfort bear in them an embittering venom for our grief. The same purity of soul which assures us of its acceptance into the bosom of God, also renders the memory of its vanished prettiness and graces more intolerable by the exemption of every even the least drawback on our love, from failings or of fence. To the busy world what indeed, is the death of a child? It forwarded—it retarded no human aim; stood an insignificant little alien by the side of the mighty dusty arena of life. Not so to the parent;—it him its smile and play were the invigorating spirit that nerved him in the conflict; and the very apathy of the whole world beside, its utter want of sympathy with him in his (to their feeling) trifling loss, becomes itself an added source of poignant, lonely, heart-consuming misery.

I was requested by a middle aged farmer to visit his only son, and set out with him on a ride of nine miles to his mountain home. As a specimen of a numerous class of the aborigines of Wales and the most estimable class—the secluded breeders of sheep and cattle—must briefly sketch my fellow traveller. His manner was so reserved as to border on sullenness, until intercourse had dispelled its coldness. He wore a grey coat (of home dressed wool) of a coarse texture, and a shapeless straw hat; there was an air of negligence about his personal appearance, which betokened habits of solitary life; the moss from the bark of trees had greened his dress in many places but being a man of tall and fine person, and his behaviour indicating education above that of a labouring rustic, his whole appearance was not without a homely dignity, primitive though rather grotesque. There is a pensiveness of look and tone in the more secluded Welsh farmers, almost touching, produced, no doubt, by the solitude in which much of their lives is spent, as well as by the character of their native land. Many of the sequestered Welsh homes have something of the solemnity of a church in their grey antiquity, howered by huge trees, in the depths of dingles, shut up by mountains so nearly meeting as to almost bulge over the roof of deep thatch. Owls hooting by night from one wild barrier ridge to the other across these ravines roaring with waterfalls at a little distance, among huge mishapen rocks; and the plover (the bird of ill omen to the Welsh) shrieking from the fern in the still noon, and the wren from the hills' stone tops; the mournful morass, with its black bogs an ever-whistling wind, which beyond those tops cuts off communication with the world to all but resolute hill-climbers—all these cannot fail, while thus surrounding the native almost from birth to burial, to exert a plastic influence on the mind and character of man.

It was to such a home that my master-shepherd, whom I shall call him, at last introduced me, after a long descent down a watercourse, called by courtesy a road.—The short dialogue which passed between us prior to our arrival bring the reader acquainted with David Beynon, the hereditary owner of Llandefelach.

"You are a widower, I believe, David?" I remarked (In rural Wales we exclude the "sir," and the surname, and the "mister," so frequent in Saxo usage.)

"Why, no; but much the same thing. My wife is alive; but her brother and I were on bad terms before our marriage, and worse after; this led to quarrelling which always made things worse, so we parted. There was a great dispute about which should have the little Peter. We could not both have him, and I could not part with him, and would not. I have no relation left, she has many; so I thought she could better spare him than I could. So I have been both father and mother to him; always in my lap, in my arms, and in my bed; abroad with me up the hill with the sheep, and in the snow he would toddle after me."

"Is your wife still desirous to have him with her?" I inquired.

"Furious about him still, I hear. I should be sorry for her, but I do hear that she finds a comforter in a fellow who courted her before we were married. I've had thoughts of our coming together again, for little Peter's sake, in case I should die, that he might not have in a mother a stranger to go to; but, since I hear that, I've done with her."

On reaching the antique home I found a very sweet little boy, sensible, pale, patient, stretched on what appeared—from the dangerous state of typhus-fever u-der which he was suffering—too likely to prove his death bed.

Of terrible and overwhelming evils the mind does not readily admit the probability; but, when this happy incredulity is once overcome by evidence the transition to absolute despair is rapid, and equally unreasonable with the previous obstinacy of hope. Hence it was that, no sooner had I signified to David that his child was in great danger, than his eyes rolled and dilated as if under some astonishing news, and a wild dismay marked his whole countenance. He stood a minute statue-like; asked again if I meant that his child was actually likely to die, and, without waiting reply, burst forth, "O my God! my God! what shall I do?"—then ran to his child as if he had but a minute more to see him alive, hung over him in dumb agony, and at last vented his agony in a womanlike flood of tears.

Afraid to flatter him with hope, I said something commonplace of his having surely known that his child was mortal.

"Mortal!" he exclaimed; "why, ay; and so am I too, thanks to God! for how could I bear to live without him now? A patient sensible boy! a good boy and a fond! So fond of me, a rough man, just as if I had been his own soft mother! Oh! sir, what avails it now! Now I wish to God he had been less good, less fond.—I wish I could remember one fault he had; for now every pretty look of his up into my face, and all his pretty ways, do every one come back like a knife at my heart, now that I think I shall never see'em more. Oh! doctor, bear with me; I am a lone man, and there's no one in my house that is a father but I! No one to feel with me, or for me!"

On my second visit, delirium had supervened in my little patient. The first indication of wandering intellect in beloved object is, to even the best-regulated mind, dreadful; but to our extravagant recluse it was a gorgon that almost produced a kindred reeling of the mind to that visible in the object he so doted on.

The boy fancied himself on the hill side with the sheep, and the affrighted father tried almost angrily to convince him of the delusion, as if he would steady and hold back by force that reason which he saw departing—that mind of precocious power of which he had been so proud, now wandering and groping in the shadows of a night too likely to prove eternal. A pretty, but vacant smile only answered to the agonised and eager words of the parent thus striving against nature; but once his hollow horror of voice and accent seemed to rouse the sufferer; for he feebly tried to raise his arm as if to wipe away the tears he saw streaming from his father's eyes, and by that pathetic and pretty action brought many more.

Day after day did this impassioned parent sit sleepless, wan, and without food, holding that small hand, and counting the beats of that frightful pulse, watching every turn of those half-extinguished eyes, whose light had been the very light of life to him.

Had David been less beloved by his farm servants every duty would have been neglected by them as was every avocation by himself, but that of a nurse; for, taking no longer interest in anything beyond that little bed, he was grown impatient of their attention to even the most needful calls of daily duty. He seemed to fancy that the aid of every hand and every mind was demanded, in that fearful crisis, on which depended his own future doom of deadly sorrow or restoration to happiness; he was enraged by the presence of mind in others which could any longer recollect milking-time and folding-time, could still hear the cows lowing to be milked at the door, the sheep needing penning down in the valley of the brook; it almost seemed as if a slight and a cruelty to his darling, to attend to those things, to regard the future or the present, or anything but the moaning and the tossing of that dear sufferer—for any eye, or heart, or hand, to watch, and tend, and tremble and ache with a less fearful anxiety than his own.

After all this storm of distress in the home of Llan-dafelach, and the cum of the Glamorgan, the great pleasure of seeing the restored child and the joy on the sunny soil slanting down to the foot of the hill, fringed with cowslips and lily-rebels; the former nearly well and quite happy, surrounded with almost a toy-shop; the various toys procured from a distant town, his promised reward of good conduct in taking the requisite remedies.

Again I visited that valley and spot. I saw the father with folded arms walking thoughtfully, rather sullenly on by himself, and little Peter calling after him to up for him, he being still to feeble too hasten much.—The father stopped at last; but rather, I thought, as if ashamed that I should see his inattention to the boy, than moved by his eager and half-reproachful call. Never shall I forget the then inexplicable fall and change of that man's countenance as it met mine, as he paused, perplexed between reluctance to indulge his child with the usual "jump" as he begged to be "carried," and his shame under my observation of his altered manner toward him—how altered!—and the child more beautiful than ever! for the paleness left by illness harmonised with a certain amiability and gentleness, the fruits, perhaps of a half-developed superior mind, which my small patient exhibited.

"What has my little friend here done, David?" I inquired. "Nothing very bad,"—and the blue and speaking eyes of Peter, suffused each with a tear, seconded my question, earnestly gazing up at the rather stern and deeply sorrowful face of the father.

"Done! God bless thee, boy, nothing—nothing! He has done nothing, sir—as good a child as ever!" The child, delighted, mounted a little bank of wild thyme, ready for a spring into his arms, of which the unaccountable man, after half-extending his arms to his pretty supplicant, disappointed him, letting them slowly fall to his sides, and muttering, "Poor little fellow!—poor little wretch!" Then he seated himself on the ground in strange absence of mind, as if forgetting me, his child, everything.

"I should have thought, David, your heart would have bled to draw tears from those beautiful eyes," and I tried to console him by my kiss and a present, for the want of his father's.

Suddenly the latter sprang up out of his disconsolate reverie, and he broke forth in a hollow voice of frightful energy.

"Does not my heart bleed then? Have I shed no tears? Sir, for every tear that my cruelty draws from his, mine shed hundreds—in the night, sir,—in the dead of night,—lonely—long and lonely nights! He is no longer my little bedfellow now: oh! no more now—never more! If ever agony did force blood from a wretch's eyes, I have wept blood!"

While he raved thus, his large melancholy eyes were fixed on the brook; he seemed to be rather in a passionate soliloquy than addressing me, although answering me; and after apause, he wept and trembled like an infant, adding in a quieter tone, "Would to God we had again one bed, even this earth! one grave, one death-hour, to lie shroud by shroud, as hand in hand we used to sleep sweetly! O my boy!—my boy! I had been happy to see you die a few short weeks ago to suck in death from thy poor black lips, and lay me down for ever by thy side—oh! yes, then, while I could have said, 'Farewell, my boy!' But now—oh! now—" He broke off there, and fixed a stern, yet, I thought, a sort of shamefaced look on me, and recalled by my presence, as it seemed, to more self-recollection, he started, and exclaimed—"How I have been talking to you, a stranger!"

But lest this change in our master-shepherd should be as bewildering to the reader as it then was to me, let me briefly supply the explanation.

During the boy's convalescence, David, in his fullness of joy, had invited the mother to visit their child. After a sort of reconciliation, the old source of contention (the question with which parent he should live) produced a fresh quarrel. It had happened that Peter was a seven months' child, without very manifest signs of such prematurity. The malignity of Mrs. Beynon's brother, a brutal sort of grazier and drover, had led him to goad his enemy. David, by taunts, at the expense of his sister's character: in short, he had insinuated that the real father of the child was the man who (as David Beynon told me) had wooed her prior to her marriage. At this fatal interview, that unhappy mother, either wishing to estrange her husband from Peter, and so effect her object, or urged by mere fury of revenge, forgot decency and herself, and her son's welfare, so far as to avow the truth of this scandal raised by her brother. To prove to the selfish father, who had engrossed to himself their common object of love, that it was in fact hers, and hers only, so that he had been hugging to his heart his bane and his dishonour in what he deemed his pride and blessing. This was a tempting species of revenge, too sweet and keen in point for her mood of the moment to resist. David, breaking up the interview with terrible curses on her head, from that moment never looked into those sweet and innocent eyes, without seeing there the image of that man's countenance, who he believed had wronged him. Those pretty orbs, into which he had rarely looked without an impulse to implant kisses on both, were now become inhabited by a smiling devil—a face that seemed to leer upon him, as the fool and dotard who had fostered another's offspring for his own.—That man's eyes, too, were blue; Peter's were of a lovely blue. The mother's eyes were, indeed, of that colour; but David could and would no longer see that mother's eyes in those; for, "Trifles light as air," &c.

EDUCATION.

For the American Masonic Register and Literary Companion.
FRIVOLITIES OF FEMALE EDUCATION.

BY TRIPTOLOMOUS TINDALL, E. E.

Mr. Editor:—Having been notified but a little time before the publication of your first number, that I was to occupy one or more of its columns, I am unable to present you with any thing of a more serious nature than the trifling accomplishments of modern female seminaries. My mind has for a long time been directed towards their exposure, but to my own discredit I have desisted from so doing through popularity as well as the fear of giving offence. If in the course of my remarks, I should elicit a smile from any class of my readers, I shall feel my self abundantly rewarded for my humble effort. It is preposterous for you or I, Mr. Editor, to talk of moral courage in exposing the follies of the age, when it is well known that in most instances moral courage is nothing more than a recklessness of character, and all rules of propriety. The only way then for you and I to get along, is to flatter ourselves we are an exception. So much for an exordium.

The extensive evil to which I refer is, the decided preference for flimsy, airy, trifling and unprofitable acquirements. Why is the female sex (and I might with equal propriety add the greater part of the male) palmed off with these nonentities from which they reap no solid profit, no real advantage? Is it because they are deficient in faculties for nobler acquirements?—is it exclusively their sphere? From whence then was this over-weening system of education derived?—certainly not from reason nor revelation. Are they ornaments to the sex which must surely win the admiration and respect of man? are they worthy of a mind that acknowledges its emanation from the Maker of the universe? All reason cries out, No! I admit there is no necessity of their penetrating into the labyrinths of abstruse sciences, and poring over hair breadth distinctions in theology law, and metaphysics; but I cannot coincide with the over-benevolent philanthropists who have allotted to them the contracted circle in which they now move. It is really amusing to behold the brazen faced coquette strut with the dignity of an empress over the floor of a ball-room, as though the hearts of all the love-stricken swains were entangled in her nets dexterously woven with sighs, and darts, and flames, and cupid. It is equally amusing to behold the simpering Miss perched aloft in the private box of a theatre entertaining the mob below with a little graceful terror, delightful screams, charming attitudes, the very best convulsions, and the latest mode of fainting beautifully. The fashionable system of education contains all this, and even more that is positively full as ridiculous. Her mind actually soars no higher than the plume that waves over her head, nor has it half the stability of the fan over which her eyes peep laughingly. How much more amiable, how much more lovely, how much nearer would she approach the end for which she was created, if, instead of decorating her face with carmine, cold cream, pearl powder, or the bloom of oriental lilies, she would decorate her mind, and by continually improving it, extend wide and wider an influence that will not only elevate her but the whole human race. Why then, with these things before them, do they not break out from this narrow circle, and

"Through learning, and through fancy take
Their flight sublime; and on the loftiest top
Of Fame's dread mountain set

Ah! it is because they indulge the soothing mistake, that every one of these high-life accomplishments are so many checks to draw upon the esteem and devotion of man. When they present them they are mortified to

And that they are checks forged by the hand of vanity. Not fitted to master the solid branches! the daughters of England have wiped away this foul stain from the character of their sex. The giant mind of Mrs. Somerville has grasped the shining heavens, walked through the boundless realms of space as though it were an old acquaintance, and then come to earth and told the wondering people the mysteries of the solar system.—Have the immortal names of More, Hemans, Opie, Montague, Taylor, and a thousand others, lost that magic spell which once they flung around our minds?—Shame on the men who cannot elevate themselves without depressing the character of the females! It is not fair to conclude that nature has weakened them in mental powers because she has in physical. No man of sense will suffer jealousy to warp his judgment so much as to draw such an unfair inference. I hope ere long we shall see the day when the women of our land shall champion to literary combat the greatest sages we can boast—when

"Justice untaught shall poise the impartial scales,
And every curious eye may mark the beam."

Females that are brought up according to the fashionable boarding school system, I acknowledge are worth nothing to the world—and why? because they are taught those things which serve only to while away a leisure hour, and not to improve the mind. They can twirl a fan to perfection, hold an opera-glass delicately, smile prettily, and ogle a lover in the latest Parisian style; or perhaps they can affect a distortion of the face even with the heavy weight of a novel in their hands heave an affected sigh, gently languish into a fashionable posture and simper about cosmetics, rouge, the last romance, Mrs. Fanciful's new ribbons, Mrs. Gadabout's scandal, or Mrs. Muslin's new French silks and laces. Oh! how much beneath the dignity of a human being! how it degrades the mind! how it sinks the soul into the mire of corruption! The very stones of the street cry out, shame! shame! Had I the power, I would write the well known words of Virgil over the door of every boarding school, and they should be addressed only to these falsely named accomplishments:

Procul, O! procul este profani,
Condamat vates, totoque abstinete loco;

And I would write over the door of every private dwelling in characters that could not be mistaken:

Cautus adito meo desis operae

The music of the churn, the herculean wield of the mop, and the rattling of dishes, are far nobler employments for a young lady, than kicking up her heels to the sound of the merry viol, murdering the French language, or thrumming on the piano. No one is born to gratify himself in the world's foolish whimsicalities; but to improve the mind and heart, and thus elevate mankind. I knew a young Miss who had studied the French almost all her life, and had just put the finish upon her education by taking a diploma at one of our fashionable seminaries; this same young lady to the mortification of every one of her acquaintances could not put three English sentences together grammatically. You ask her where the Hudson and Connecticut rivers rise, and she would be just as likely tell you in the Allegany mountains as any where else. She would tell you with great candor, that Shakspeare's dramas were written by John Bunyan, and Paradise Lost by Peter Pindar. It is this mind deteriorating fashion, it is this perverted taste, which, "like a worm in the bud," nips talent in embryo, and destroys even moral worth. Men of sense look not upon these superficial things which are falsely named ornaments with any sort of pleasure. If they were to select a partner for life I do not doubt but that these non-essentials would be thrown entirely in the back ground. Then, where, I ask, is the superiority of all these gewgaws, this filmy cobweb business, to such knowledge as will best subserve the duties of life, and spread happiness through the domestic circle? I answer, No where.

RETENTIVE MEMORY.

The historian, Fuller, in 1607, had a most retentive memory; he could repeat 500 strange, unconnected words, after twice hearing them; and a sermon verbatim, after reading it once. He undertook, after passing from Temple Bar to the farthest part of Cheap-side and back again, to mention all the signs over the shops on both sides of the streets, repeated them backwards and forwards, and performed the task with great exactness.

SATIRE.

For the American Masonic Register and Literary Companion. NOTES ON A HAND ORGAN.

"Hark! how it sweeps away,
Searing and dying on the silent sky,
As if some spirit of sound went wandering by."

What an exquisite sense of enjoyment is awakened by the tones of the Hand Organ. I speak from experience most musical reader, for in order frequently to enjoy the rapturous sensations which this instrument never fails to excite, I have taken up my residence very near a public spirited individual who is altogether untrammelled by fashion, and above the opinions of the world. One who deserves a niche in the temple of fame were it only as a reward for his herculean labours in the cause of musical science; but alas! his efforts are not appreciated or his motives misconstrued, for I understand some of the Goths in our immediate neighborhood have even presented his soft toned harmonious instrument as a public nuisance! and for no better reason than that it "discourses most eloquent music" "from night till morn, from morn till dewey eve"—But he has the sympathy of all who have souls for "melting melody," and as an admirer of genius I would say to him persevere in your efforts to reform the world. Fear not opposition, all great men have their calumniators and detractors, and how can you expect to escape? Persevere, and depend upon it your efforts will one day be crowned with success and you shall receive a suitable reward. How some men can be so utterly devoid of taste and feeling as to prefer the thrumming of a piano-forte to the delicious notes of a Hand Organ, I cannot imagine. I am sure had the latter instrument been known in the days of Saul, David would have used it to charm away the evil spirit; for I verily believe no other so powerfully affects the feelings of men, or exercises a greater influence in controlling their actions. There is music and melody in its every note. Talk to me of the music of the spheres, of Madame Caradori's street warblings, or the rich thrilling cadences of Miss Shirreff—tell me of music in the woods, of bees and birds, of whispering leaves and murmuring brooks, or the hum of the tiny cascade.—There is naught to me so sweetly musical as the tones of that old Hand Organ; and this is the instrument so much neglected! It excites my indignation to see those so far inferior, Piano, Guitar, the Violin or the Flute receiving the approbation of all, usurping the place of my favorite. I shall arrive at the very modest conclusion that I am the only man of judgment and taste in the world, from observing the contempt which most people affect towards so delicately toned an instrument as the Hand Organ. But it is the fashion now-a-days to allow one's-self to be tortured an hour or so by the vile sounds produced by a disciple of Paganini, or an amateur on the Piano, nor is this all, we must express our thanks for the gratification we have experienced and applaud! Alas! how seldom can we truly admire instruments whose effects upon the listener depend altogether upon the skill and talents of the performer. Oftener to my ear there is more music in the dying plaint of a plover. Never do our souls overflow with melody as when listening to the soft notes of the Hand Organ, till we exclaim with the poet.

"My soul would drink those echoes. Oh that I were
The voiceless spirit of a lovely sound
A living voice, a breathing harmony,
A bodiless enjoyment—born and dying
With the blest tone that made me!"

Yes give me the Organ, its tones are ever grateful.—Often when my spirit has been vexed and saddened by the strifes and cares of the world, I have shunned the busy crowd whose search is gain, or the thoughtless throngs in vain pursuit of pleasure, and sought my room, there to be soothed and calmed by its dulcet strains, and in the long calm quiet summer eve, "when twilight's soft dews steal o'er the scene" and golden clouds were floating in ether, and the breeze gently fans my feverish brow, I have sat at an open window and listened until I could say

"My spirit soars
Beyond the clouds, and leaves the stars behind.
Let angels lead me to the happy shores
And floating paeans fill the buoyant amid."

Then melancholy is forgotten, and sorrow melts away—I have heard its melody amid the howling of the wintry blast, and felt its influence, when

"So ravishingly soft upon the tide
Of the infuriate gust it did career
It might have soothed its rugged character
And waked him to a seaphyr."

AMERICAN MASONIC REGISTER.

ALBANY, SATURDAY AUGUST 31, 1839.

*. In order to complete the arrangements we have in view, in relation to our paper, we shall be compelled to omit one publication. After this, the paper will be issued regularly each Saturday.

OURSELVES.

Custom, before whose shrine all must imperiously bow, makes a seeming necessity for every editor on assuming the charge of a public Journal, to express the views which is to govern him in its conduct.

At the present moment, we believe, there is not a Journal published and devoted in whole or in part to the Masonic Cause, in all America.

The causes which have produced this state of things, are still fresh in the minds of all, and it is not our intention now to call up reminiscences, that are painful to every true mason, no further than is necessary for the attainment of our present purpose. We shall not disguise our belief in the fact that a man by the name of Morgan was carried off clandestinely by a few misguided men, who belonged to the institution of Masonry, and whose subsequent fate is and probably will forever remain in doubt. That Morgan was among the most worthless, is fully demonstrated by his acknowledged perfidy and dishonor: for by a parity of reasoning, the more truth there was in his book, the greater villain he. Every honorable man, whatever his political or abstract views of the institution of Masonry, might have been, we believe entertained the same feeling of disgust at his sordid baseness. But enough of him. The act was done. The moral sense of an indignant community was justly aroused, and had this moral feeling not been diverted from its legitimate channel, by being used for unhallowed purposes, the entire body of Masons would have sought to wipe the stain from them, by uniting in ferretting out the guilty and bringing them to justice. But when the occasion was made use of as an engine of political power—when every mason was anathematized and declared a murderer,—when the endearments of the fireside afforded no protection to honest opinion, and the ministers to our holy altars were torn from their flocks, by the ruthless hands of a morbid fanaticism as revolting as the scenes of Salem, then did Anti-Masonry smite Masonry to the wall, and make every true brother a Champion in its defence. Human nature is weak, and there is a point beyond which endurance ceases to be a virtue. The goaded ox will turn on his master. So with the thousand "justifications" of the act alleged against Masons who were irritated into passionate exclamations, which were sent forth to the world as "Masonic combinations". An illustration will not be amiss. An aged, respectable, and (heretofore) intelligent friend, a man of influence in this city, who professed to believe in the benign influence of a Savior's love, in conversing with us one evening on the subject of masonry, said that his "last prayer would be, that he could be endowed with power to bring the head of every adhering Royal Arch Mason to the block!!!" It was this spirit that Masonry contended against, and which may in some instances have awakened a sympathy. But that the great Body of Masons, ever countenanced or sought to screen the guilty, is untrue.

But we turn from the past, to the future, the Anti-Masonic party, as an organized body has ceased to exist, and having expressed our views of it, we feel disposed to let it rest, our object is not controversial. From early life, we have been enthusiastically attached to the order; and if we can convince any honest opponent to the principles of the Institution, that "we profess what is good, and mean to live agreeable to our professions," we shall have gained the point we aim at.

Our readers will perceive that our paper is not to be entirely devoted to Masonry. A valuable miscellaneous correspondence is promised us, and this with the best periodicals, which we intend to place within our reach, will, we hope give us a favorable reception with our friends and the public at large.

It is perhaps unnecessary to add, that our columns will have nothing to do with the political strife of the day.

LIKENESS PAINTING.—It is a little singular that a city affluent as ours, should be so far behind its neighbors in the patronage of the fine arts. While New York, Boston and Philadelphia, sustain academies and galleries for the exhibition and culture of painting sculpture and architecture, Albany is without a vestige of such an institution. This fact cannot arise from a lack of wealth—from a lack of taste it certainly does not. Yet there is an utter and almost a culpable indifference paid to these elegant pursuits. However, we have not been behind in given the world those who have excelled in art. The works of Ames and Page, are known and admired from one end of the union to the other. But the question is—who fostered, who reared them? Had not other than our city interfered in their favor, they might, doubtless would, still have been esteemed as respectable citizens, although in all probability quite as obscure as respectable. To add to these, we have now among us a Freeman and a Fink—young, talented, ambitious—who would give credit to any city. With them it is not so much the want of occupation, as that of the right kind. Portraiture is the only painting marketable, that only as far as likeness is considered. An idea of a picture seems never to present itself. The “ladder of Fame” is not upon such material very often ascended. Besides there is nothing an aspirant so abhors, as the mere compliment that his picture is a likeness—that is, the nose is proper length and the mouth, just the width—talking about it as though it were a plank undergoing the application of a two-foot rule. Never thinking of the hours spent in finding a position of ease and grace, and arranging all the parts harmoniously. Likeness painting may be well enough in its way; but subjects from history and imagination, while they fascinate, give rise to invention, and while they excite the mind to industry, enlarge and mature it. Hoping our hints will claim the consideration of men of means and leisure, we leave it.

We send this number of our paper to many of the brethren, who are not subscribers, and with whom we have no personal acquaintance. We do it at the instance of others: and they unite with us in the hope that the present effort to disseminate Masonic Intelligence, may meet with the approbation of all those, who honor the Principles of the Order, and who will aid in their promulgation. Masters, Wardens and Secretaries, are requested to act as our agents, and ten Subscribers procured and money enclosed will entitle them to a copy for their trouble, and our thanks.

To Correspondents.—We return our sincere thanks to our correspondents of this week, for their numerous favors. To our fair friends “Matilda” of the Troy, and “Floranthe,” of the Albany Female Seminary, we are particularly obliged. They must consider themselves particular exceptions, to the remarks of Mr. Tindell, in another column. We hope to find many more exceptions.

The average price of Flour, in the principal Cities in the Union, during the last week, was $5.94 which is 4 cents higher than the average of the previous week. Flour is selling at $3.75 per barrel in Pittsburgh, and Wheat at 75 cents per bushel.

Our correspondent “Triptolmous Tindell Z. Z.” is rather too severe on the fair sex, although some of his views in relation to this subject are sensible and true.—We have long been of the opinion that the present system of female education is materially defective, and ephemeral. Girls should be educated for the station they are to occupy in Society. Let a young lady be thoroughly instructed in the various branches which constitutes a good common education. After she has acquired these, there will then be time enough, circumstances admitting, to add the thousand little superficialities, which at present appear too much to be the “head and front” of a finished education.—There is grievous fault somewhere, and at some future time we may perhaps have the “moral courage” (spoken of by our correspondent) to give our views in detail.

ITEMS.

A seizure of from 50 to 100,000 dollars worth of wolen cloths was made at Philadelphia on Monday, by a custom house officer from New York. The grounds for proceeding on the part of the custom house, are said to be making entries at less than the real value.

MICHIGAN CROPS.—The Detroit Daily Advertiser of Thursday says—“the wheat crop throughout the state is mostly harvested, and it is thought that it will exceed that of last year a million and a half or two million bushels.”

THE CASE OF DR. HOLMES.—We learn from the Burlington (Vt.) Free Press, that the Supreme Court of that State has sustained the decision of Governor Jennison in the case of Holmes, and that he is to be surrendered to the Canadian authorities. Chief Justice Williams is understood to have been absent on account of illness, and Judge Bennet dissented.

NEW COUNTERFEIT.—Our citizens must beware of 10s on the Bank of Owego, counterfeits on that institution having recently made their appearance in this City. They are calculated to deceive.

GREAT ROBBERY.—The store of Mr. Samson Tams, 227 Market street, was entered on the night of the 16th, and robbed of money, in bank notes, amounting to $585, and notes of hand amounting to $120,000.

The thieves gained access by false keys and opened the fire proof by the same means. The notes of hand can be of no use to any one but the owner, and we hope that they will be returned through the post office.—Phil. U. S. Gaz.

LIGHTNING.—Mr. Norman and a horse upon which he was riding were recently killed by lightning in Anne Arundel co., Maryland.

During a recent thunder storm in St. Louis, a man named Shiggin was struck dead by lightning while closing his window.

WESLEYAN CONFERENCE.—The Conference of this great body commenced its session yesterday morning at 6 o'clock; upwards of five hundred preachers were present. The Rev. Theophilus Lossey was chosen president, and the Rev. Robert Newton, secretary.

The subscriptions to the centenary fund amount to $215,000 (equal with the current exchange to $1,044,900). Of this sum $428,960 have been paid to the Treasurers.

Last Saturday morning a young girl about 16 years of age, the daughter of a widow resident in this town, was killed by her brother, a boy about 14 years old, who struck her, in a fit of passion, with a hoe which he happened to have in his hand. She died on the spot. A coroner's inquest was held and the jury returned a verdict in accordance with the circumstances we have mentioned. The boy is in custody.—[Cornwall (U. C.) Observer.]

YELLOW FEVER.—This disease is said to prevail, to a greater or less extent, at the present time in four of the Southern cities, viz. New Orleans, Mobile, Charleston, and Augusta. At the New Orleans Charity Hospital during the week ending 17th Aug. there were 139 yellow fever patients admitted, and 49 deaths by the same disease.

At the Potter's Field burying ground, from the 1st to the 17th inclusive, there were 231 interments; 143 of the deaths having been caused by yellow fever.

In the Protestant Cemetery from 1st to 13th inclusive, 9 interments of person who died of yellow fever.

In the Catholic Cemeteries, 24 interments.—only one death being caused by yellow fever.

A STAGGERER.—The following is the amount of ardent spirits consumed annually in this great free, and civilized British empire. We have copied it from the returns:

	England.	Ireland.	Scotland.
Population,	13,897,187	7,767,401	2,365,114
Gals. of apts.	12,341,238	12,383,461	6,767,715

The statement is a truly frightful one, and well calculated to make all lovers of their country and of humanity pause and reflect. On calculating, we find that this return of spirits leaves seven pints and one ninth to each and every individual in England; thirteen pints to every inhabitant of Ireland; and twenty-three pints to each religious, moral, enlightened, sagacious, and cautious citizen in Scotland!!!! On the supposition that only one sixth of the quantity consumed in Scotland is drunk by the women and children who certainly constitute three fourths of the population, what a fearful quantity of liquid fire must fall to the share of the men.—John o' Groat's Journal.

THE FIRE AT ST. JOHNS.—The Boston Mercantile Journal states that the late fire at St. Johns originated by the flame of a candle coming in contact with oakum lying open upon the top of a cask of brandy, from which a lad was drawing some of the liquor.

A correspondent of the Portland Courier states that all the “vessels in the Market slip cut away their masts for their own safety. The masts of the Compeer of Eastport for New York, lying in South Market wharf, were cut away, to save both vessel and wharf, they being on fire.”

MARRIED.

At Waldoboro, Me, on the 14th inst., John N. Wilder, esq. of the firm of Wilder and Bleeker of this city, to Miss Delia Augusta, daughter of the late Hon. Joseph Farley of the former place.

At Utica Henry Weston, of New York, to Susan Cullen Van Rensselaer, daughter of James Van Rensselaer, of the former place.

At Watertown, Jefferson County, Zebulon H. Benton esq. of Oxbow, to Caroline Charlotte, daughter of Joseph Buonaparte, Count de Survilliers.

On the 19th inst. Alexander Falls, jr., to Miss Sarah Elizabeth, eldest daughter of John Ledyard, esq. all of Newburgh.

In Springwater, John F. Brown, to Miss Ann H. Grover.

At Cooperstown, Isaac Bush Esq. Attorney and Counsellor at Law, of Bainbridge, to Mary Martha, eldest daughter of the Hon. John H. Prentiss, of the former place.

Mr. John Ruyter, to Miss Catharine Morris, all of the village of Greenbush.

DIED.

On Thursday last, Mr. Benjamin Knower, an old and respected inhabitant of this city aged 64 years.

Also in this city, Eliza, wife of Frederick J. Barnard and daughter of the late Col. Eleazer Pomeroy of Coventry, Conn.

In this city, Charles Edward, infant son of E. J. Freeman.

At Athens, Greens co., on the 26th inst. Cyrelia Chester, only child of John and Huldah Ann Hartness aged 1 year and 9 months.

At Utica, of apoplexy, Joshua Hardaway, aged 35 formerly of this city.

At the city of Houston, in Texas, about the middle of July last, Vincent De Camp, of the Mobile Theatre. His precise age is not known to the writer of this brief memoir, but he must have been 65 years old. He was an actor of Old Drury Lane Theatre in 1800, and perhaps was at his death the oldest actor on the stage.—Mrs. C. Kemble, the mother of Mrs. Butler, was his sister, who at that period was an actress of great celebrity in London.

In Ohio, Carter Bassett Harrison, aged 27 years, youngest son of Gen. Wm. Harrison.

Near Walden, Montgomery on the 20th July, Miss Sarah Millsbaugh, aged 22 years.

At Tampa Bay, East Florida, on the 12th June last Mr. John Herner, formerly of Albany.

POETRY.

For the American Masonic Register and Literary Companion.
TO A WIDOWED MOTHER ON THE DEATH OF A DAUGHTER.

Daughter of Zion, thou of saddened brow,
And sorrowful—thou on whose stricken heart
Are writ deep lines of direful agony,
It is thy Soul's sweet privilege to weep,
For thou hast lost a treasure.—She thy loved,
Thy dearest one of earth, is sleeping low,
A dreamless sleep, beneath the silent sod.
No more her voice in strains of filial love,
Shall wake in thy lone heart, the joyous thrill.
Tis hushed in death's deep silence, never more
To hear its gladdening tones on mortal ear.
Her worth was written in full many a heart,
In characters too deep for even Death
With all its power, to obliterate.
When the sad truth first fell upon my ear,
That her, my soul had loved, had bowed her head
To the stern monarch, then, oh then, I felt
As if my brighter earthly star had fled,
And left my soul in cheerless solitude.
But when I thought of thee, I hushed my grief,
And only wished to pour the healing balm
Into thy wounded bosom: yet I knew
That words would be but mockery to thy woe,
And I forbore

Yes, mourner, let it flow
That silent tear 'twill prove a sweet relief
To thy o'er burdened heart. Thy Savior wept
From very sympathy: and thou may'st weep,
And He thy changeless Friend, shall bear a part
In all thy woe. But hark! a voice of love,
Of tenderness ineffable, I hear.
"Daughter, weep not," now dry thy flowing tears,
What means the strange command?

Oh! can it be,
That tones so sweet could mock thy bitter grief.
Ah! no, that voice, those strains are all Divine,
And from a heart that yearns with deathless love
"Weep not," it whispers—"thy loved one lives!"
Far, far from sorrow's vale! No tempest there
Beats on her path—no raging billows rise
To overwhelm her soul. All, all is peace!
Her sky is cloudless; not a shadow falls
Upon the heavenly landscape! Every breeze
Wafts joy unsullied to her ransomed soul.
Then wherefore weep? The time is short;
Soon shalt thou join her in that world of bliss!
Soon thy lone pilgrimage below shall end,
And angel hosts shall bear thee hence away!
A little longer, bear the heavy cross;
A little longer, wait in sorrow's vale,
And thou shalt hear the voice of thy release,
"Daughter, well done! thy earthly toils are o'er,
Celestial chariots wait to waft thee home:
And she, thy loved, thy mourned, thy dearest one,
On heavenly confines waits, to welcome thee."

SMILES AND TEARS.
Suggested by Page's beautiful picture of "you shall and wont."

Ah! for the hours long past and gone,
When lightsome scenes like this,
Though many a reproaching frown,
Yet gained a mother's kiss,
Brought joy in midst of sorrow,
And midst of trouble bliss.

Aeolus where trips the nimble stream,
Beneath the sunlit sky,
A boy had roved to kiss the bloom,
And with his darkling eye,
To trace the birds when reveling
Among golden clouds on high.

And like the fawn when bounding free
Amid the light or shade,
Came Liz; and mischief filled her eyes,
And smiles her thoughts betrayed;
And stealth was spoken in each step
That crushed the grassy blade.

The boy was lost in wonderment,
His form as death was still,
His ear had caught the melody
That through the woodland trill
From blended tones of bee and lark
In concert with the rill.

Liz draws still near—each flowing tress
Soft parting on her brow,—
And locks him in her pearly arms;—
As passion's faithless vow.
Has failed the boy's delusive spell—
He wakes a prisoner now!—

Thus, when mocked by aspiring hope
Or cradled in pure dream,
Or fancy leads her dancing train
To glad the sternest theme,
We're sure to see the bubbles burst—
When brightest they besom

He wrestles vainly in the strife
To break from her arrest,
And tears that glisten on his cheeks,
Fall fruitless in behest;
For Liz with mirth and triumph glows,
And smiles as she were blest.

Smile on; smile on—thou budding rose—
I see my childhood there!
Full soon his grief will melt in joy,
Who struggles in thy snare,
And often in his lovingness,
With flowers braid thy hair.

TO—

They say that other lips than mine thine own
Have freely pressed, and that my name now brings
No rapture to thine eye—that love's gay wing
And burning vow, and golden dream, are strown,
Like autumn leaves, to be as once no more.
Deep sadness enters at the very core—
I feel a life with all its sweetness fled,
And think of thee, among the dead.
And I must track the world's wild wilderness
As some lone barque on ocean sent afar;
But while through danger and through storm I press,
And skies above me bend without a star,
Still back my spirit through the past will roam,
And learn that where thou art, alone is home.

THOUGHT.

Boundless, illimitable! who can trace
Thy varied journeyings through the realms of air!
Thou mock'st each barrier of time or space,
And fliest on swift pinion every where!
By thee we track the past, long ages gone,
Lost in the dark abyss of buried time,
Or strive to pierce the future, dim unknown,
Or soaring upwards, seek the eternal clime:
We revel mid the stars, in the high dome
Of God's own glorious temple, richly spread,
Make, mid their shining hosts the spirit's home—
Among their living lights, where seraphs tread!

But thou hast earthly roving, boundless Thought!
O'er the wide world thine eager wing is flying:
To vine-clad realms, where fragrant winds are sighing,
To fairy-haunted grove, or storied grot,
Thither thou lead'st us: hoary mountains, piled High in the clouds, broad lakes and rivers fair
And green savannahs, stretching vast and wild,
We know them all, by thee borne swiftly there!
The lava buried cities, ancient Rome,
Judea's queen, so honored, so debased,
Where He, the man of grief, vouchsafed to come,
And through her streets his path of sorrows traced
To these we speed us: what can stay thy flight,
Ethereal essence?—swift as flash of light!

And yet a power more dear is thine O Thought!
By thee, long-parted friends together meet;
Though seas divide them, by thy magic brought
In close companionship again: how sweet
To speak kind words of sympathy; once more
To linger, spell-bound, on some long loved face,
Again each faded lineament retrace,
Till faithful memory all their charms restore!
The lonely mother, at her cottage hearth,
Shudders to hear the storm go rushing past,
And, as in fitful and demoniac mirth,
Shrieks forth, in trumpet-tones, the maddened blast,
While roars the tempest, roll the blackened clouds,
She seeks her sea-boy's form, rocked in the spray-wea-thed shrouds.

BROKEN TIES.

The broken ties of happier days,
How often do they seem
To come before our mental gaze,
Like a remembered dream.
Around us each discovered chain
In sparkling ruins lies:
And earthly hand can ne'er again
Unite those broken ties.

The parent of our youthful home,
The kindred that we lov'd,
Far from our arms perchance may roam,
To desert seas removed.
Or we have watched their parting breath,
And closed their weary eyes;
And sighed to think how sadly death
Can sever human ties.

The friends, the loved ones of our youth,
They too are gone or changed,
Or, worse than all, their love and truth,
Is darkened or estranged.
They meet us in the glittering throng,
With cold averted eyes,
And wonder that we weep their wrong,
And mourn their broken ties.

Oh! who in such a world as this,
Could bear their lot of pain;
Did not one radiant hope of bliss
Uncolored yet remain?
That hope the sovereign Lord has given,
Who reigns above the skies,
Hope that unites our souls to heaven,
By faith's enduring ties.

Each care, each ill of mortal birth,
Is sent in pitying love,
To lift the lingering heart from earth,
And speed its flight above.
And every pang that wrings the breast,
And every joy that dies,
Tell us to seek a purer rest,
And trust to holier ties.

FLOWERS AND FRIENDS.

The sweetest flowers, alas! how soon
With all their hues of brightness wither;
The loveliest just bud and bloom,
And, drooping, fade away forever.

Yet if, as each sweet rose-bud dies,
Its leaves are gathered, they will shed
A perfume that shall still arise,
Though all the beautiful tints are fled.

And thus, while kindred bosoms heave,
And hearts, at meeting, fondly swell,
How soon, alas! those hearts must breathe,
The parting sigh—the sad farewell!

Yet from such moments, as from flowers,
Shall friendship, with delight, distil
A fragrance, that shall hold past hours,
Embodied in memory's odour still.

MASONIC.

RISE AND PROGRESS OF MASONRY.

We present our readers, in our paper of to-day, the remarks of Mr. Enos, in the last house of Assembly, on the proposition to erect a monument to the memory of Dewitt Clinton. The remarks contain a great deal of Historical research, which will be of interest to the Masonic reader. We have divested the article of the political exceptions, which might be taken to it, as originally published.—Ed.

On the arrival of the Romans in Britain, arts and science began to flourish, and with the progress of education, masonry gradually rose into esteem; and Caesar, and several of the Roman generals who succeeded him in the government, ranked as patrons and protectors of the institution. The war which afterwards broke out between the conquerors and the conquered, obstructed the progress of masonry in Britain, till the time of the Emperor Carausus, by whom it was raised under his own immediate auspices. He appointed Albanus, one of the nobles of St. Albans, Grand Master, A. D. 303. During a term of about six hundred years, masonry rose or fell, according as arts and science flourished. In 872, when Alfred the Great came to the throne of England, masonry took a rise, and in him it found a zealous protector. Masonry has generally kept pace with the progress of learning; the patrons and encouragers of the latter, having been most remarkable for cultivating and promoting the former. No prince studied more to polish and improve the understanding of his subjects than Alfred, and no one ever proved a better friend to masonry. On the death of Alfred, in 900, Edward succeeded to the throne, and during his reign, the masons continued their lodges under his sanction. Edward, in 924, was succeeded by Athelstane, his son, who appointed Edwin patron of the masons. This prince procured a charter from Athelstane, which empowered them to meet annually in communication at York, when the first Grand Lodge of England was founded, in which Edwin presided as Grand Master.

I pass over a series of events which would be of great interest, but the time allotted for myself, will not allow me to enter into these particulars. In 1066, when William the conqueror came to the throne, he appointed the Bishop of Rochester Grand Master, under whose patronage it remained for some time, and under whose superintendence the Tower of London was built. Henry I. next succeeded, and in 1135 Westminster, now the House of Commons, was built. During the reign of Henry II. the Grand Master of the Knights Templars superintended the masons, and they continued under them till the year 1199, when John succeeded his brother to the crown of England.

On the accession of Edward I., 1272, the care of the masons was intrusted to Walter Gifford, Arch Bishop of York, under whose care the fraternity flourished, and Westminster Abbey was finished, which was begun in 1220. When Edward II. came to the throne, 1307, Walter Stapleton, Bishop of Exeter, was appointed Grand Master. During the reign of Edward III., masonry flourished greatly; he was a patron of science, and the encourager of learning. He patronized the lodges, and appointed five deputies under him to report the proceedings of the fraternity. William A. Wykeham, afterwards Bishop of Winchester, was appointed one of the deputies in 1350, and superintended the finishing of Windsor Castle. At this time lodges were numerous. Richard II. succeeded his grandfather, Edward III., in 1377, and William A. Wykeham was continued Grand Master. The king died in 1413, and Henry V. succeeded to the throne, when the Arch Bishop of Canterbury obtained the direction of the fraternity, under whose auspices lodges and communications were frequent. Henry VI. came to the throne, and in 1442 was himself initiated into the order of masonry, and from that time, he spared no pains to obtain a complete knowledge of the art. He pursued the ancient charges, revived the constitution, and with the consent of his council, gave them his sanction.—The king in person presided over the lodges, and nominated William, Bishop of Winchester, Grand Master.

Masonry continued to flourish, till the peace of the kingdom was interrupted by the civil war between the two royal houses of York and Lancaster. Henry VII. came to the throne in 1485, when masonry again rose into esteem under the patronage of the master and fellows of the order of St John, at Rhodes, who assembled their Grand Lodge in 1500, chose Henry their protector, and under the auspices of this prince the fraternity once more revived their assemblies, and masonry resumed its pristine splendor. In 1509, Henry VIII. succeeded his father to the throne, and appointed Cardinal Wolsey Grand Master. In 1552, John Poynt, Bishop of Winchester, became the patron of the institution, and presided over the lodges till the death of King Edward VI., 1553. The masons remained without any nominal patron till the reign of Elizabeth, when Sir Thomas Sackville accepted the office of Grand Master, and lodges were held during this period in different parts of England, but the Grand Lodge assembled at York, where the fraternity were more numerous. Sir Thomas Sackville held the office of Grand Master till 1567, when he resigned in favor of Francis Russell, Earl of Bradford. The queen being assured that the fraternity were composed of skillful architects, and lovers of the arts, and that state affairs were points in which they never interfered, allowed their assemblies, and masonry made great progress at this time. During her reign, lodges were held in different parts of the kingdom, particularly in London.—Charles Howard, Earl of Effingham, succeeded Sir Thomas in the office of Grand Master, and continued to preside over the lodges in the south, till the year 1588, when George Hastings, Earl of Huntingdon, was chosen, who remained in the office till the death of the queen, in 1603.

On the death of Queen Elizabeth, the crown of England and Scotland was united in her successor, James VI. of Scotland, who was proclaimed King of England, Scotland and Ireland, on the 25th March, 1603. At this period, masonry flourished in both kingdoms, and lodges were convened under the royal patronage. Inigo Jones, a citizen of London, was nominated Grand Master of England, and was deputized by his sovereign to preside over the lodges; and in 1607, the foundation stone of the King's Palace was laid by King James in the presence of the Grand Master and his wardens. In 1618, the Earl of Pembroke was elected to the office of Grand Master, and under his administration the mysteries of the order were held in high estimation, and many eminent, wealthy, and learned gentlemen were admitted into the institution. On the death of King James, in 1625, Charles ascended the throne. The Earl of Pembroke presided over the fraternity till 1630 when he resigned in favor of Henry Danvers, Earl of Danby. The breaking out again of the civil wars obstructed the progress of masonry in England for some time. After the restoration of peace it began to revive under the patronage of Charles II who had been received into the order during his exile. Thomas Savage, Earl of Rivers, was elected Grand Master in 1666, and Sir Christopher Wren was appointed deputy under him, and greatly distinguished in promoting the prosperity of the lodges which met at this time.

In 1666, September 2nd, that awful conflagration which overrun three hundred and seventy-three acres within the walls of the city of London, afforded the greatest opportunity for the exertion of masonic abilities, which had ever been witnessed. On the 23d of October, 1667, the King in person levelled in form the foundation stone of the Royal Exchange, which is allowed to be the first edifice in England. In 1673 the foundation of St Paul's Cathedral, designed by Deputy G. Master Sir Christopher Wren, was laid in solemn form by the King, attended by Grand Master Rives, his architect and craftsmen, in the presence of the nobles and gentry, the lord mayor and aldermen, the bishops and clergy. In 1695, King William being initiated into the mysteries of masonry, appointed Sir Christopher Wren Grand Master, and gave the lodges his royal sanction particularly the one at Hampton Court at which which his majesty frequently presided.

At a general assembly of masons in 1698, Charles, Duke of Richmond, was elected to the office of Grand Master, and continued to fill that responsible station for one year, at which time Sir Christopher Wren was re-elected, and continued in office till the death of the King, in 1702.

On the accession of George I. to the throne, many new regulations were made, and among them a proposition was introduced and afterwards agreed that masonry should no longer be restricted to operative masons but extend to men of various professions provided they were regularly approved and initiated into the order. The masons in London finding themselves deprived of their Grand Master in the death of Sir Christopher Wren and their meetings discontinued, a resolution was offered to unite under a new Grand Master, and to revive the communications and annual festivals of the society. Accordingly, on the 24th of June, 1717, in the third year of the reign of George I. the assembly was held, when Anthony Sayer, Esq. was elected Grand Master. Mr. Sayer was succeeded the next year by George Payne, Esq. who was assiduous in recommending a strict observance of the communications. He collected many valuable manuscripts on the subject of masonry; and being determined to spare no pains to make himself acquainted with the original government of the craft, he earnestly desired that the brethren would bring to the Grand Lodge such old writings or records concerning the fraternity as they should be in possession of, to show the usages of ancient times. The reputation of the society being now established, many noblemen and gentlemen of the first rank desired to be received into the lodges, which had increased considerably during the administration of Mr. Payne. The duties of masonry were found to be a pleasing relaxation from the fatigues of business and in the lodge, uninfluenced by politics or party, a happy union was effected among the most respectable characters in the kingdom. On the 24th of June, 1721, Grand Master Payne and hi wardens, with the former grand officers, and the masters and wardens of twelve lodges, met the Grand Master elect, when the Grand Lodge was opened in ample form, and several gentlemen were initiated into the order of masonry; among whom was Philip, afterwards Lord Chesterfield.

The first Grand Lodge after the accession of George II. to the throne, was held on the 24th day of June, 1727 it which was present the Grand Master, his officers, and the masters and wardens of forty lodges. On the 20th of January, 1730, the Duke of Norfolk was duly elected and installed Grand Master, according to ancient form, in the presence of a numerous and brilliant company of masonry. It is not surprising that masonry should flourish under so respectful a banner. On the 15th of August, 1738, Frederick the Great, afterwards King of Prussia, was initiated into the mysteries of masonry in a lodge at Brunswick. So highly did that prince approve of the institution, that on accession to the throne, he commanded a Grand Lodge to be formed at Berlin, and for that purpose obtained a charter from Edinburgh. Under the management of this prince the order flourished, and objects of charity were sought out, and their wants greatly relieved by the Grand Treasurer. From this period to the death of George II. October 5, 1760, masonry greatly flourished in England. On the 6th of October, 1760, George III. was proclaimed king. No prince ever ascended the throne, whose private virtues and amiable character so justly endeared him to the people. Masonry now flourished, at home and abroad under the English constitution, and the principles of the order were extensively inculcated.—Lord Byron was elected to the office of Grand Master in England on the 30th of April, 1747.

Mr Chairman, we will now see what progress masonry has made in America. On the 30th of April 1733, Lord Anthony Montague, Grand Master in England, appointed Henry Price, esq., of Boston Grand Master of North America and constituted a Grand Lodge by the name of St John's Grand Lodge. Under this charter, the first lodges were established in Massachusetts, Virginia, North Carolina, Rhode Island, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland and South Carolina. In 1755 a lodge was constituted in Boston by Lord Charles Douglass, the Grand Master in Scotland, by the name of St Andrew's Lodge. In 1772, March 3d, Joseph Warren, esq., was appointed grand master for the continent of America by Patrick, Earl of Dumfries, grand master of Scotland. In 1775, the meetings of the grand lodge, suspended by the town of Boston becoming a garrison. At the battle of Bunker Hill on the 17th of June, 1775, masonry and the grand lodge met with a heavy loss in the death of their grand master and brother, Joseph Warren, who fell contending for the liberties of his country. On the 8th of March 1777, the brethren who had been dispersed in consequence of the war, were now generally collected; they assembled to take into consideration the state of Masonry, being deprived of their chief by the melancholly death of their grand master as before stated. After due consideration they proceeded to the formation of a grand lodge, elected and installed Joseph Webb esq., their grand master in Massachusetts, January 3d 1783. A committee was appointed to draft resolutions explanatory of the powers and authority of this grand lodge. On the 24th of June following, the committee reported, "That the political head of this country, having destroyed all connexion and correspondence between the subjects of these states and the country from which the grand lodge originally derived commissioned authority, and the principles of the craft inculcating on its professors submission to the civil authorities of the country they reside in, the brethren did assume an elective supremacy, and under it chose a grand master and grand officers, and erected a grand lodge with independent powers and prerogatives, to be exercised however on principles consistent with and subordinate to the regulations pointed out in the constitution of ancient masonry."

Thus far, I have endeavored to give a just and true history of masonry from the time the Romans first arrived in Britain down to the present time. I have endeavored also to be as concise as possible, and at the same time to give it in such a manner that all may understand it. I am aware, that there has been much speculation respecting the origin of this institution. It has been said by some, that masonry was of modern date; that it was got up by some low persons at a tavern in the city of London, about a hundred and twenty years since. It is for this reason that I have been thus minute, and I think by giving day and date it cannot fail to satisfy every gentleman of its antiquity. I have also been very particular to give the names of some of the most distinguished patrons of the order in Europe, for the reason, should I mistake things, the error may be detected. I will now, sir, endeavor to give you some of the most distinguished men in the U. States, who have been supporters of the masonic institution.

The first, is George Washington, the father of his Country. Where will you find his equal? The philanthropist, the soldier, and the statesman—first in war, first in peace, and first in the support of the masonic institution. He was a faithful friend—a devout christian. He was one whose hand was guided by justice, and whose heart was expanded by benevolence; he honored the lodges with his precepts and examples.

The next that I will name, is Benjamin Franklin.—Does any one question the right of this great and good man to rank among the first as a sage, a philanthropist or a statesman, and one whose whole mind was absorbed in acts of charity and benevolence? We find that this great man was on the 24th day of June, 1734, appointed grand Master of the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania.

There is one other name which has been registered in my mind, and that is La Fayette. Yes, he who left his native land to assist our native colonies against an oppressive foe, thereby to aid with the exposure, of his life and the devotion of his faculties, in laying the foundation of our republican institutions. By a reference to his answer to an invitation from the Grand Lodge of the state of New York, we find the following:

"Most worshipful Grand Master and beloved Brethren—I am happy in your affectionate welcome. I am proud of the high confidential honors you have conferred, and purpose further to confer upon me.—Our masonic institution owes a double lustre to those who have cherished and those who have persecuted it. Let both glories, equal, in my opinion, be the pride of our fraternity, until universal freedom insures to us universal justice."

The next, that I will mention is De Witt Clinton, the individual to whom this proposed monument is to be erected. He was one who held the institution of freemasonry in the highest estimation, as may be seen on all occasions when called in question. I would particularly call your attention at this time to his address at the installation of the Hon. Stephen Van Rensselaer, as Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of the State of New York, in this place, September 1825. After enumerating many of the illustrious men who have been patrons and promoters of the institution of masonry, and the various obligations a mason is under to promote the social and christian relations which should bind man to man, he addressed himself particularly to the Grand Master in the following language:

"Most worshipful Grand Master elect—Accept my cordial congratulations on your elevation to the highest honors in masonry. You are now in this region the head of the most ancient, benevolent and distinguished society in the world. And I am rejoiced to see such exalted authority deposited in such worthy hands.—And I feel assured that no exertion will be omitted on your part to realize the anticipations of your usefulness, and to justify the high confidence reposed in you. I am persuaded that you will use every proper endeavor to reunite the great masonic family under one government, to confirm and to extend the influence and reputation of freemasonry, and to propagate those virtues which are identified with its character, and essential to the cause of benevolence and philanthropy."

This one of the many instances in which this great man, for whom a monument is to be erected, stood forth an advocate for the principles of freemasonry.

The Queen of Madagascar has been for about four years engaged in a violent persecution of the natives who had embraced the christian religion. Six refugees lately arrived in London from that Island. In 1835 the English missionaries had collected 5000 of the native children into schools, and two churches had been erected and were well filled. The missionaries have been obliged to abandon the island, and some of their converts have suffered death.

MOHAMMED.

Glorious hypocrisy! what souls are they,
Who fraught with useful or ambitious views,
Wear not thy specious mask—Thou, Alcoran!
Hast won more battles, ta'en more cities for me,
Than thrice my feeble number had achieved,
Without the sacred succor of thy sacred impulse.

MILLER.

The sixth century is more replete with wonderful events than any century since the creation of the world. It is with painful feelings the philanthropist looks upon that age, fraught with dire deeds and a "horrible futurity." Then was that mighty conflagration enkindled which ravaged a great portion of that vast country, and it still continues to burn though not with that glaring brightness it assumed at first. Then it was that the true religion received a shock which made her tremble and almost reel from her throne. Such a medley of unmeaning sentences as are exhibited in the Koran, were palmed off upon the Arabs at a time when knowledge was limited, I may say almost to Mahomet himself. No settled religion prevailed among them before the appearance of the prophet, and they were prepared at that precise time to embrace any faith however absurd. Had these dogmas of his alleged revelation been circulated a few years before or after the identical time they were, they would have met with a faith reverse from the imposter's intention. We not only object to the sentiments of the Koran, but are compelled to record the whole from beginning to end, as one of the most bare-faced plagiarisms ever committed by man.

This celebrated individual was of poor extraction.—His father Abdallah, occupied no very influential station on account of the smallness of his property, which was then, as is even now too much the case, the only criterion of talent soon after the birth of his child he deceased, and what little estate he had industriously collected together was pounced upon by his twelve brothers. A few years afterwards his mother died. He was now put adrift upon the wide world, helpless and friendless. His birth was in the year 569, in the city of Mecca. It was attempted by the Arabs to authenticate the Koran by supernatural appearances occurring at the time of Mahomet's birth. They aver that he spoke with a virile voice and praised God, ere he had reached the age of one year, and many even go further and say, that he predicted his own greatness as a prophet of the Lord, and the diffusion of the religion he should establish. But upon whatever ground they may have supposed these to be founded they are at the present day altogether too unreasonable to need a refutation. At any rate it is sufficiently conclusive proof of the wonderful credulity of his age. In order that his life might be saved, and there by verify the predictions of the Holy Writ, he soon came into the custody of his uncle Abu Taleb. After arriving at the years of discretion his uncle threw him out from under his guardianship and he had to obtain a subsistence from his own resources.

Somewhere near the age of twenty his mind seemed to be inclined to military tactic, which inclination was sedulously fostered by his guardian, who was then engaged in high disputes with his neighboring fellow camel drivers and merchants. The victory which crowned the first contest greatly augmented the celebrity of Abu Taleb and his nephew. Soon however his affection for this kind of life subsided, and the Arabs not being very fond of it, he was obliged to waive all further hopes of celebrating himself upon the field of battle.—He then engaged himself for the space of three years as a mercantile agent to an affluent widow at the expiration of which time he returned to his benefactress, little knowing the reward he should receive for his services.

The reward was no less than the widow herself.—This was indeed to him a priceless gift and one which his zealous promotion of her interest secured. About three years before the 7th century, in the 28th year of his age, Cadiga who was 12 years the advance, received him in matrimony. This step placed him in an independent pecuniary situation. For the space of 12 years after the nuptials, he did nothing, but meditate the audacious design of forming a new religion for the fluctuating Arabs. He knew that the state of mind was such as to receive the most preposterous ideas that could be fabricated—he knew that their changeable minds would be made to adhere to any belief, tinctured with the least appearance of reality, and knowing these things he commenced and finished his new religion with a dexterity unequalled in the annals of any impostor before or since his day. The cave of Hera in the neighborhood of his native city was the chosen spot of his angelic visitant. There he pretended the angel Gabriel appeared to him and revealed the different parts of the Koran. These revelations were communicated to his countrymen as far as they were made known to him—elf. At first they looked upon it as a piece of jugglery, but he however understanding human nature adopted the persuasion instead of the coercive. Had he not done thus his plans would have been entirely subverted. His pretended indifference as to the result of his prophetic visions gave the whole an air of reality that no bigotry or compulsion could ever have done. Observation and the experiences of others taught him the truth of this complete, and the subsequent diffusion of his tenets must have impressed it more thoroughly upon his mind.

"Religion, to be sacred must be free,
Men will suspect when bigots keep the key."

After a long time his relatives lost their antipathy to his divine pretensions and became the firmest adherents of his faith. From thence issued an influence that carried moral death all over that vast country. Perhaps it would not be amiss in this place to advert to the Koran, that most singularly constructed code of morals even held up to the public credulity. It labors throughout every page to establish the divine commission of its pretended author. The phraseology is an exact imitation of the Bible, and plagiarism of the worst kind marks almost every verse—a plagiarism so bad, that the Koran may be termed a mere re-print of the Bible sentiments, and even of the language in which they are clothed such is the character of that miserable trash, by which the musselman Despot, subjected all the Arabs to his own unbounded sway. At first his proselytes increased so slowly, commencing with his wife, that he was on the point of relinquishing all endeavors to prosecute his plans; but still the golden lamp of hope flickered dimly on the dark verge of the future, to reanimate him in the toilsome task. He continued to travel over the rough road his own hands had constructed, till death terminated the career of his consort and uncle. It was in the year 621, his wife died in the 64th year of her age, leaving one daughter (Fatima) to mourn her loss.

It would be uninteresting to relate the battles Mahomet was constrained to fight for the propagation of his novel creed—suffice it to say, that the last 11 years of his life from the 52d to the 63d year of his age were nothing but continual scenes of bloodshed and murder. In one of his marches he besieged the City of Charbor, entered triumphantly, and slew all its inhabitants. Here was the blow struck that finally put a stop to the conquests that had marked his career for a long time. While making his most sumptuous meal in the conquered city a young girl, to put to the test the supernatural powers of the prophet, placed poison in the mutton he was about to eat. All his superhuman and Divine pretensions were of no avail; the test was applied and his prophetic character was found wanting. He lingered along for some time with this virulent poison rankling in his frame, undeterred from pursuing his wars.

But in the end this mortal drug administered at the Charbor feast occasioned him the loss of his life. In the year 632, he left the world in the most excruciating torments, one daughter survived to weep over his grave—the grave of him whose dreadful influence is felt to this day.

ALLEGED INSULT TO THE QUEEN.—The individual who is accused of having offered an insult to her Majesty in Hyde Park, on the 17th ult. has forwarded a copy of a letter, which he states he has addressed to the Queen, denying in the most positive and solemn terms having been guilty of the offence imputed. The writer after some introductory remarks, says "I had advanced before your Most Gracious Majesty, and did not discover the fact until apprised by one of the grooms (James Light), who acted as one of the outriders. On his announcement that the Queen was behind, my utmost efforts were used to keep at a respectful distance; my horse was unruly, and, but for the indecent conduct of James Light, I should have succeeded in effectually removing myself. He rode furiously up to and took hold of my horse's reins, and did all his power to unhorse me, without the slightest provocation; but for this I should have vanished from your Majesty's presence before any thing unpleasant could have occurred." N. Y. Courier.

VARIETY.

LIFE IN NEW ORLEANS.—We find in a paper from that most ill-fated and afflicted city, the following relation of a scene created by that terrible disease which has proved so fatal to its inhabitants. We hope the picture is over drawn, for it chills our hearts to believe there can be such suffering and ghastly distress within the limits of civilization. It surely must have thrilled the heart of the beholder with sudden horror.

Dr. Lambert, an eminent French physician in this city, relates that during his frequent rides through the different streets, his attention has almost always been attracted as he passed a house where a poor family lived. The family consisted of a man and his wife, both rather young, and the latter good looking, with a little infant smiling in beauty, and about ten months old. He was led to notice them from the appearance of content that lived there, and there being frequently on the banquette before the house. After the fever set in, he still saw them for some days, happy as usual, but at length he "missed them from the accustomed place." This he did for two days, until on the third, feeling uneasy for them he stopped his gig before the house, alighted—rapped at the door. No one answered; silence was in the mansion. He pushed open the door and went in. There lay the husband and the wife on the floor—both dead of the fever, and the former decaying. The child was alive with its little arms around the dead mother's neck, vainly trying to draw the sustaining fluid from the breast. Such is "life in New Orleans."

DANGER OF LOAFING.—On Saturday afternoon, Mr. Michael Mulligan, of 18th street near 6th avenue, having occasion to come down town, became weary on his way and sat down on a stoop, where he had loafed a few minutes before he fell asleep. It so happened that about this time, as Mr. Peter McCaffrey chanced to be passing that way, without any thing in particular to engage his attention, it struck him that there might be something in the pockets of the sleeper worth exploring after. He accordingly seated himself on the step beside him, and while seemingly engaged in the humane office of adjusting the hat over the face of the unconscious slumberer in order to screen him from the rays of the sun, with the other hand he rumaged the pockets of his coat, vest, and inexpressibles of Mr. Mulligan, extracting therefrom a razor, being an article of which he stood in very great need, and a pocket-book containing the sum of nine dollars. All this was effected without disturbing the sleeper and had it not been for a gentleman on the opposite side of the street who witnessed the whole transaction from a second story window, and assisted in taking the aggressor into custody, Mr. Mulligan would never have been the wiser of the thief.—N. Y. paper.

The Secretary of the American Common School Society estimates but there are in the United States 3,500,000 children between the ages of 4 and 5 and 16 years, and that 600,000 of the number do not enjoy the advantages of a common school education. The number of common schools in the United States is estimated at 80,000. Number of teachers in these schools, 95,000.

On Wednesday, Mr. Thomas Wilson, of Baltimore, met with a singular accident. He was engaged in setting a draw knife, which was tightly screwed into a vice. While exerting his strength to press it to the required position, it sprang from the vice and striking him upon the neck, severed one of the arteries and several veins, and slightly cut the main artery. An internal hemorrhage rendered it necessary that an operation delicate and painful should be performed; it is feared that the sufferer will not recover.

Hazardous Experiment for Liequor.—An English paper, the Leeds Mercury, states, that "a man had the temerity to lay himself down between the rails on the York rail-way, and remained in that position until a train passed over the spot where he was laid. Fortunately no injury was done to his person, though two red-hot cinders fell upon his neck. The reward of this pot valor was a quart of ale."

Indictment for Misdemeanor.—The Grand jury on Saturday found a bill of indictment against Mrs. Caroline Restell, female physician, of 160 Greenwich street, for a misdemeanor in administering, or selling to be taken, pills composed of cantharides and ergot to a young single woman, named Anna Dall, of No. 69 King street, in order to produce abortion. She was arrested and gave bail to appear in $1500.

Com. Elliott.—We understand that the Court of Inquiry, appointed to investigate the charges against Commodore Elliott, have sent in their report to the Secretary. The majority recommended that he should be tried by a navy Court Martial, Commodore Stewart dissenting.

Louis Phillip granted pardons, commutations, and diminutions of punishment to 719 persons on the anniversary of his ascension to the throne. This is mercy by wholesale.

Ohio Census.—The population of Ohio is now estimated at one million seven hundred thousand. In 1800 she numbered less than 50,000 inhabitants.—Cin. Buckeye.

Mormonism in New Jersey.—Some disciples of Joe Smith have established themselves in the neighborhood of New Egypt, and in other places in Monmouth. They first appeared there some six months ago, and, according to the Trenton Gazette, have made converts of several persons of some standing and influence; their numbers are increasing.

An aged man named Scott, (a Scotchman) fell from the window of a house at Charleston S. C. and was killed.

The Strangers and Planters Hotel, new Orleans, was totally destroyed by fire on the 9th.

A drunken brute murdered his wife at New Orleans on the 6th in a most shocking manner, stamping on her until life was extinct.

An Irishman named O'Sullivan was crushed to death, under an ore bank near Shenandoah Springs, Va.

The New Orleans papers announce the appointment of Mr. McQueen as postmaster of that city, in the room of Capt. Kerr, resigned.

The yellow fever, by accounts from Havana, New Orleans, to the 11th inst. prevailed with great fatality among the shipping in that port.

POPULAR TALES.

From Bentley's Miscellany.
THE FATHER.

[A TALE OF FACT—CONCLUDED.]

The dreadful condition of feelings here depicted has never, that I am aware, filled a page in the biography of human hearts, prolific as is our age of all sorts of histories, and far-fetched as are the sources of excitement in many of them. To those, then, who may regard in the light of incidents any new and strange harrowing terms of passion in the mind and heart, it may not be uninteresting to hear a few of the sentiments expressed by our humble hero in a cooler moment, when he had reposed his sad secret with me while we wandered together near the house.

"To find out that we have been cherishing a foul father thing, instead of the white blessing we fancied ours in a faithful wife, must be a great trial, but more bearable that mine. A childless man, who makes such a discovery, suffers a great shock, but not like mine! He, at least, knows the worst, and he sees the whole of his misery. It is no longer she, the pure and beautiful thing he loved, and he begins to loathe, to hate her, and that's his cure. But as for me, what cure is for me? How can I hate him, innocent soul! How look on his fair forehead, see his sweet smile, and hate?—Sweet child! what has he done that I should hate him? And yet—yet," he added, in a hollow whisper, that had in it I know not what of piteous horror, "I feel I can—I feel—I—hate!"

The terrible conflict within of opposing feeling, here disfigured his face as with an ugly mask. I started at the transfiguration, and for the moment fancied I saw before me the loving murderer of a loving child; that child so recently the object of a love amounting almost to a frenzied passion!

"I feel I hate," he murmured on. "But is it a cure to me? No, no; but a very hell of pain! Even the man who has children does not suffer like me. He may be made a lone man of a sudden by a wife's crime, but his children, his undoubted own—are left him still. The children of his happy early days, when she was good and faithful, they are not altered by her fault.—They are round his hearth still to soothe him for his loss; he sees nothing in their eyes but their mother as she looked before she sinned, such as she was when he led her home over his threshold, to live and die with him, as he hoped. But, what is left to me? What do I see when I look into that boy's eyes, where I turned for all my comfort, and all my joy? Oh, sir, what see I there?" And the father's features assumed an aspect of the intensest loathing and hate.

Argument, with so fatal an impression, was vain.

"Now, tell me, doctor, if you can," he resumed vehemently, "how is this to be borne, or what am I to do? You cured him once, can you cure me? All your art is for bodies; yet there are plagues, fevers, cancers of a man's mind more unbearable far than any the body suffers. To shun what I cannot live without; to drive him from me that I couldn't bear an hour from my sight: Eay, who can bear this? Is it a state to be borne by a creature that the Almighty has gifted with the power to live or die—to die—or kill? No—no, you cannot tell me what to do—how to bear it; not you, nor all mankind will ever find a cure for such a state of living damnation as this!"

From that day the wretched father, wandering and muttering to himself, absented himself almost wholly from home and Peter, hiding his misery in the deeper chasms of fractured rocks, by the high sources of the waterfalls, in solitudes and shadows, savage and solitary, and gloomy as his view of life or death to come. Whether it arose from some neglect to which the tenderly-reared but now deserted boy became exposed by this desertion, or that his sensitive nature, pining under the change in his father's feelings, and not yet wholly recovered from the effects of his illness, the fact was, from one of these two causes, a relapse took place, and my poor little patient was once more a prisoner of the sick chamber.

Meanwhile the wife, who had inflicted all this agony on the father, was suffering scarcely less. Even the falseness of revenge indulged against those for whom love still lingers in the heart (and such was the case with Margaret Beynon) is like the recoil of a gun in an unskilful hand, which, bursting with its overcharge, proves more fatal to the party aiming to wound, than to the object aimed at. A terrible sort of compunction preyed on her mind from the moment of her fatal, self-eliminating folly. As soon as news reached her (at the distance of some miles) of the new illness of the child (she being at the time herself dangerously ill) she despatched a most earnest request for an interview with her husband. He at last reluctantly assented, and they met.

Their meeting was solemn and affecting. She extended a thin and pallid hand towards her husband, while she sat propped in the bed for shortness of breath. He stopped, reluctant even to be near her. He was come a long way from his boy—his boy, as, melted by pity, he now, under his illness, could not bear but to call him. His heart was full of him, his thoughts were all on him—the more so, that, being now out of sight, that fatal conceit of a likeness no longer could have the effect of chilling or enraging his heart. At home he had been agonised between his longing to act to him the part of a nurse, as before, and his half-maniacal impression that every one knew the secret of the child's paternity, which forbade his manly and proud mind to become the apparent dupe of another, by thus cherishing another's offspring with fondness. Thus tortured at home and abroad, David, altered, haggard, unshorn, and stern, recoiled from that fatal woman.—He stood aloof, and saw, unmoved, (if he saw at all,) the spectacle of a fearful hæmorrhage in her who had been the wife of his choice; and neither extended his hand in return, nor could bear to speak to, or even look at her.

"Pray, come nearer," she said faintly; "I cannot lift up my voice, and I have much to say, and little time to—"

He advanced one step, no more.

Panting for breath, she needed a helping arm to upraise her in the bed, and looked imploringly toward his (that which for a brief space had enfolded, had upheld her, and tenderly too, and might still have embraced her, but for a vindictive brother); but he still withholding his help, she desperately, in a sort of angry despair, erected herself by one effort, and brushed away one tear from her eye, that he might not see it stand there. The exertion caused a fresh and more frightful effusion of the vital fluid. The husband, somewhat touched, perhaps, by her reproachful look and wild action, stooped to hand her the cup, already nearly filled with the crimson horror. Even this tardy and cold courtesy affected the unhappy wife; she wept bitterly.

"Once more, David, but once, support me upright. A little touch of your arm will lift me higher, or I cannot say what I would not die without saying for all the world."

David felt once more the touch of that hand (in its unnatural bloodless white), which he had received before God at the altar, and all the past came over him like a dream just remembered. The wedded happiness of a year, the after solitude of years; the strange transfer of his whole soul's affection to an infantile object; his pensive sort of bliss in a few years passed with him; the recent shocking wrench from his heart of that last consolation. Her frailty and its consequence, more fatal than itself, was now forgotten in this retrospect of a moment, and he even returned that hand's pressure while awaiting the disclosure she had to make.

"Oh! husband, hear me with patience, while I confess—"

It was a luckless beginning.

"Heaven's curse on your confessions!" he broke forth. "I'll hear no more of them! Would to God I had never heard them! Such confessions as yours, after such treachery, are fitter for hell than heaven.—Your confessions have made me childless, and your child fatherless; made me unnatural to him—his beauty hateful to me! Having fooled me so long, you should have held your peace for ever, and died in the sin and secrecy of incontinence, as you lived in the shame of it! Truth from your lips is a crime now; it has wrought a more devilish mischief than the foulest lie ever did!—Lie on, now, you wretched woman, and die in your perjury—you'll be sooner pardoned by a pitying God than for these accused confessions."

Faint, and wringing her hands, she had not breath to interrupt him, except with a word or two.

"Oh, hear me! oh, I was false!"

"False to me! Don't I know it? Why again?—Have you not said it already to kill all the father in my heart? Wretch! I tell you once again, you ought now to persuade me, were it possible, that you never had been false! Restore me my blessed ignorance, if you can; fool me again into the belief that he is my own; cheat me to take him back to my bosom and bed! Would you make your peace with God before you die—die with that merciful lie upon your lips, crying 'He is your own—he is your own!' but, no; it is too late."

With brilliant, yet ghastly smile, and her hectic blush now heightened to a burning crimson, Margaret sprang up of her own sudden strength, supplied by the violence of her emotion, and threw her arms round her husband's neck ere he was aware, and cried.

"And so he is! on the word and oath of a dying woman he is your own! I meant, that I confess a wicked lie told to you lately; I meant, that I was false when I joined my cruel brother in his wicked lie; but you stopped me short. And I was false when I accused myself—on my life, and my soul's life, I was!" He shook his head as if incredulous. "You don't believe me, then?" said she, still wringing her hands. "Then it is indeed too late. My poor wronged little boy!"

"Foolish, miserable woman," he said mournfully, "did you think me earnest when I said you ought to deceive me? Are you obeying that foolish, wild injunction of mine? 'Twas but my passion."

"Alas! what can I say?—how undo what I have done!—and my breath is spent. Oh, God of truth, speak for me! Some pitying mother, now a saint in heaven, witness for me; whisper to his heart, convince my husband, do my dear child right before I die!"

"Wife!" he said solemnly, "remember—this is perhaps your death-bed."

"I do—I do! I hope it is, for I have nothing to live for; and revenging God so deal with me as I speak true or false when I say—He is your own! he is your own! And I too, I am—was—your own, ever yours; but that you regard not. I was true to you, David—loved you—love you, David bach! I came to your bosom even as I left my mother's at weaning time, pure as a child; and I go to my bed in the cold ground just as I left yours! Believe no other, David—do me justice when I am there laid, husband dear! I feel we shall have no more dispute about the keeping of poor Peter. Death will soon settle that now—for ever."

David pored on her face as she spoke, as if to read her inmost soul. He was a suspicious man, and deep melancholy now made him slow to hope, and, therefore, to believe.

"Margaret!" he said tremulously, and held her hand, "I implore you not to deceive me in kindness!—Truth, truth is what I pant for. Can you, dare you take an oath that sweet and precious child is mine!"

"For God's sake bring me a Bible! There lies one, hand it me, quick!" she exclaimed, smiling brightly, though her agitation increased the frightful expectation every moment. "Invent any form of oath the most dreadful," she continued. "On the soul's peril of a dying woman, one who knows herself dying, I kiss this word of God, and swear he is your child. Look! I have sealed it with my blood; the impression of a bloody lip is on the leaf! Yours, David, your own dear boy! Now shall I be believed? Now do you—can you forgive my foul—my unnatural lie? If you can indeed, kiss me once; once more in token of it, and that we part in peace, in love—"

"A hundred, my own dear Margaret," he cried rapturously; "from my heart I forgive you, from my soul I believe you, and kissed her as rapturously, while the happiness of being at last believed lit up the careworn features of the wife with such a beauty from within, that every vestige of sickness and impending death flew before it.

"You have heaved a mountain from off my breast, my dear, dear Peggy. 'Twas I who wronged you, by separating you from our darling. But we shall have no more dispute; we shall all three be happy yet."

She shook her head, and wept, for her extreme exhaustion now admonished her against indulging that hope of life which new incident prompted so powerfully.

"Now, hear me swear, Margaret, solemnly swear, and believe me, you never had rival in my heart or bed but that dear child—never! You shall come to Llan-defelach, we will nurse him together, we will—"

As he spoke, the chamber-door was thrown open in haste, and one of his shepherds entered, who had ridden after him in haste, to say that the 'womankind' thought there was a 'change' in little Peter, by which expression David too well knew that the Welsh attendants mean some indication of approaching death, although their observation is sometimes fallacious. To David the words struck dismay through his very soul, and a ghastliness like death's own overspread his face, while all the husband forsook his heart, and he once more saw only before him the woman who had estranged him from his child, who had caused him to beat this moment at a distance from him.

"And I must be here—at this horrid distance! I must leave him among strangers in perhaps his last—!" and he scowled a dumb curse of infuriated misery at his ill-fated wife, who once more seemed to him the murderess of his life's companion—his life's darling.

A bruptly he broke from her. Not a kiss, or embrace, or word more did he vouchsafe, but almost while her face yet remained turned after him, he vanished through the door. She was shocked by the sound of his horse's hoof rattling with reckless and dangerous speed along the naked and rugged rock of the mountain track which gave access to the wild residence of a mountain farm which she had chosen.—Her heart seemed to die within her, as the sound died away in the high distance of the declivity he was ascending.

Little did the impatient father, see or heed of his road, except its dreadful length. An obstructed journey of many mountain miles was before him. He pictured to himself his darling turning his poor wan face incessantly to the door for him each time it opened; he heard him faintly asking for him; he imagined his life ebbing fast away, and only strangers round; and every craggy water-course, every broken gully, where the dingy peat-water formed a rivulet; every round of pale green verdure indicating the dangerous quagmire which he must avoid; the clogging soil of the mountain's base, spongy with springs; all these seemed to his sad eye and soul as so many inhuman foes deaf and blind to his agony, and groan, and sweat, rising up between him and that house, (that deathbed to his fancy,) wherein and by which he had already arrived in mind, and stood—a childless man. His soul, indeed, was there, but round him, eternally recalling it, was the same dismal far-stretching distance, the fading horizon of mountain rock (for it grew dark) while the only life near was that of creatures alien to the nature of man, and his strong sympathies—the kite, the fern-owl, and the dismal bitters of the dark-brown marsh.—No severer trial of mortal patience can perhaps exist than that he was doomed to suffer; that constant conflict between the fond spirit stretching forward, and throwing behind all obstacles, and the hindering body, in its gradual, tardy, laborious progress, impeded by every one, even the least.

This trial, however, like all human trials, had its end. He approached his house. And now every unkind look and tone of the few last dismal weeks, which he had been betrayed into towards his uncomplaining, unoffending boy, were to be atoned for in one delightful embrace. For David had made a helpmate—a companion of him, young as he was; and therefore felt no less compunction and real remorse toward him, although a child, than toward an adult. With beating heart he pulled the string of the door-latch, paused to listen, and had the joy to find all noiseless within, proving that at least the worst had not occurred—that death was not in the house. It seemed that such an event must have caused something at least of confusion, akin to that tremendous commotion in his own nature which its mere conceit had been producing during the whole of his journey. He was already at his child's bedside ere any knew of his return. All was dim, by the light of the small rush taper. What was his sudden ease of heart to see one woman, only a nurse, tying on his darling's cap, in all tranquillity! The very suddenness of that ease, that stop of his heart's long palpitation was of itself a shock.

"Going to sleep, my precious? One kiss first, mine own darling—mine own sweet boy! Forgive foolish father—forgive him all his cruel—"

Bending over him in the dusk, he saw a pretty quiet smile on the wan little face, but it was not at him.—The lips had a dreadful formality in their closure; it was the chin-band applied to the falling jaw which the woman was tying, and which he mistook for the cap.—The truth flashed upon him just as he uttered the word father, and he knew that he was now, indeed, no father. The frightful appearance of two eye holes instead of eyes (those beautiful eyes!) produced by two small coins, which the woman had placed there, (according to idle custom) confirmed the sad impression. He jerked back his head in horror, for his own lips and those of clay, his eyes and those eye-sockets, had nearly met. He uttered one deep groan, expressive of combined agony and horror, and fell at full length on the floor. It was but a minute's respite. Again he was on his feet, standing at the bedfoot, like some effigy, with its stony eyes fixed on vacancy, gazing stupefied on the sad object which the officious nurse had now covered with a sheet, so that he looked only at the ghastly outline of the small corpse, with projecting face and feet.

Up to the day of the child's burial David hardly left the fatal chamber, and moved about, looking a thousand dreadful emotions, but venting none, in almost total dumbness. He would not look on that last frightful duty imposed by a foul and dire necessity for the sake of survivors, but mounting horse, rode off in the direction of Cwm Carneddau, his wife's residence.—Whether revenge for the fatal lie which had desolated it was up and raging in his breaking heart, and hurried him towards that miserable mother, or that a reeling mind led to rush abroad without object, while a depth of earth was being interposed between that fair object, now becoming a horror and an offence, and the living, whom its beauty had so lately gratified—from one of these causes, David was absent till the middle of the second night. But of his return I shall speak in the conclusion.

I was summoned in haste soon after to Llandefelach. I was led upstairs, where I found the haggard form of the master, apparently searching everywhere for something lost, and followed mournfully by two of his shepherds. He turned his hollow eyes on me with a look of confused recollection, then giving up his search, said disconsolately, "He is not here; can you tell me where is Peter—my Peter? I look across the world, and he is not there. I look up to Heaven, and ask him of God, and God will not hear me—not answer me. I listen for his little voice all night, and cannot hear it; yet I hear it calling in my heart for ever. I shall never see him more—never hear it more!"

The unhappy man had, I learned, reached Carneddau, and found his wife in her coffin. The shock of his furious and abrupt parting had quickly overpowered her remains of life. Whether or no his intellects were at that time already gone, must for ever remain unknown, and unknown, therefore, what was the object of his visit. On his return he was wild in his deportment and looks; he had lost his hat; he appeared to have been immersed in a bog; his horse was discovered loose on the hill, among the pits of black peat (or mawn) where, doubtless, his frenzied rider had passed one dismal night.

Some years after the death of the child I was entering a town at a little distance from Llandefelach, one fine summer's night, by a cloudless moon. A peal of bells (a rather rare accompaniment of our Welsh churches) reached my ears, from the church seen dim, an eminence above the humble town, shrouded by venerable trees, from amidst which the mossy thatches of the houses, in their grey antiquity, peeped through thick foliage. Cows wandered about the rude streets of half green rock, steeply sloping down to a little river tumbling in a craggy channel, and keeping a perpetual gentle roar which, deadened by the banks, produced an effect as lulling, if not as melancholy, as those distant bells. The voices of a few children, tempted out to play round a huge oak tree, on a green sward in the middle of this lonely village town, alone broke the monotony of those mingled sounds, except when an owl was heard from a small ruin of a castle on a mound beyond that mountain brook.

Knowing this to be the native place of David Beynon, where his aged mother still resided, I thought of that unfortunate man, whom the last report I heard stated to be in the condition of raving insanity, in a receptacle for the mad. I thought of the time when he played like one of those little ones, round that tree, and obeyed the pretty summons, which I now heard from them, in English,

"Boys and girls come out to play,
Now the moon shines bright as day," &c.

On their chanting their song, I was startled by the sudden appearance of a tall old man, in tattered clothes, with long hair and beard quite white, who had been sitting at the foot of the tree, and who, on the children pulling him by the withered hands, laughed shrilly, and awkwardly joined in their wild dance, to their seeming great amusement. Nothing but his stature, and something mournful and infantile in his half hysterical laugh, distinguished his manners from those of the real children, whose companion rather than sport, he seemed to be.

It was not till I had inquired about this poor harmless being at the rustic inn, that I knew that this was David Beynon come home to his decrepit mother, to finish his mindless existence under the roof where it began.

DRAMATIC.

From the Knickerbocker of August.

LONDON THEATRICALS.

After breakfast with Knowles, we walked together to the 'Garrick Club,' where I passed an hour agreeably in looking over the departed heroes of the stage, who tapestry the walls of several large rooms and entries. To Mrs. Siddons I paid my first homage. I had already seen her in her glorious portrait by Reynolds. What a divine woman! One feels the dignity of human nature, in a simple contemplation of her features. You but fancy her in her fine tragic visions. Your blood is congealed, and hair erect, with the contagious inspiration. If the vain image has this power, what must have been the living form and expression? And O'Neal!—the feeble taper, scarce flickering in an Irish hut, that shone afterward the brightest, star of the British firmament! Is it true, that a woman ran mad at her 'Belvidera,' and died in Bedlam? And here, in stripling youth, and serious age, is Garrick and Kemble; and Cooke stands as a rock of Atlas; and Kean stalks with hyper-tragic strut in Richard.

The next hour I spent, alone in a box of 'Covent Garden' overlooking a rehearsal. It was the first time I had seen the two muses in their dishabille. A sham exhibition of the passions is close on the ridiculous, at best; and when the mummery is exposed in this manner, without the prestige of costume and decoration, it is ridiculous, outright. Imagine only a number of women and men rushing from behind a scene, making arms, and throwing themselves into comic or tragic attitudes. Oh that's horrid! says the manager. And then he casts himself into a situation, by way of model. They go out and rush in again upon the same sentiment; and then he jumps three feet in the air with joy, at the excellence of the imitation. I would rather see any comedy than this. I strolled, afterward, in the immense space filled with the apparatus of the scene. How interesting to see here the human passions reduced to their elements, in pots of rouge, in dishes of tallow, and burnt cork! Groves are here leaning sentimentally against the wall, and others, erect upon the area, are breathing with Arcadian freshness. I walked through the forest of Arden, and made the babbling gossip of the air cry out Olivia. I saw the thunder quietly reposing at the side of a snow-storm, and Cupid's wings fast asleep with Psyche's petticoat. I studied, too, the customs and manners of the artist, who have here social observances; exacting, rigorously, a respect corresponding with their rank in public favor. The prima has a large room, and several distinctive articles of furniture, and takes especial care not to admit you a second rate to the dignity of her acquaintance. If, by the necessities of the play, she does embrace you tenderly before the world, this is no reason why she should own you in private. Queen Catharine is crying here at her mirror; Richard attitudinizes; Anne being a bonnet, with a petticoat on a bed-post. 'Vouchsafe, divine perfection of a woman! You have seen Hogarth's 'Theatricals'; this is the original.

At no other period has the English drama been so degraded. Its pleasures, being forsaken by the genteel and educated classes, have migrated from the ears almost entirely. The opera, which is a sensual, not intellectual entertainment, is yet in repute; and a portion of good comedy also remains; but the tragic muse sits deplorably amidst her empty boxes; her lamp flickering and expiring; her limbs benumbed, and her wings dripping with Bæotian fogs. Macready has thrown his torn mantle upon her; Knowles poured wholesome liquor in her parched lips; but the principle of life is effete.

The age of the rope-dancers has come. An elephant usurps the place where Garrick stood like a god; and Harlequin flaunts in motley, where Siddons drew her tragic robe across the scene. 'Mother Goose' had a hundred nights, and 'Ion,' in its pure and attic spirit and polished composition, will be content with two or three, at Covent Garden; and at Old Drury, they give you such a clear and natural representation of hell, in Der Freyschutz, that you may dispense with seeing the original. I have seen these great theatres, on a few occasions, recalling their halcyon days, as at Talfourd's first representation, and Malibran's adieu for the season, last night. What vivacity, what splendor, what delightful and rational enjoyment!

ALBANY, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 14, 1839.

AURORA BOREALIS.—The papers are teeming with accounts of 'the unusual brilliancy of this phenomenon, which manifested itself a few evenings since. It seems to have been visible over a vast extent of country. In this city, its appearance was indescribably grand, and may be termed a jubilee of the elements. It was visible from an early hour, and assumed every conceivable form and colour. At one moment, the entire zenith seemed canopied with a dense mass of crimson fires, radiating from the centre: at intervals emitting transitory streamers, which contained the variegated hues of the rainbow. Anon, a mass of ethereal fire would appear in bold relief by rendering visible some portion of the pure azure of the firmament, with scintillations of light radiating in every direction. Again it assumed the form of mountains, clouds, 'fiery shapes' of monsters, and then "like the baseless fabric of a vision, melted into thin air." Its brilliancy continued unabated until near midnight, when the heavens assumed their wanted appearance.

Philosophers of the most profound erudition, have each in their turn, advanced and advocated theories relative to the cause of this singular effect; none of which theories stand the test of close scrutiny, and there still seems to be no general settled belief on the subject. A few generations since, and such exhibitions, were conceived ominous of impending evil, and their recurrence was reverted to as having been the precursor of most moral and political revulsions. Is it not the mere workings of the grand engine of nature in the act of regenerating and resolving into its original elements of purity, the gasses vitiated in contributing their quota to the support of animal and vegetable life? "We are such stuff as dreams are made of." In whatsoever from matter is tangible, whether animal or vegetable, form its embryo germination, it expands and becomes perfected in its structure and attributes; it serves the ends of its creation, and is destined, to yield obedience to the imperious law of nature which dooms to mutation all sublunary objects. Putrescence supervenes and the noisome gasses are disengaged which ascend into the laboratory of nature preparatory to their being assimilated to the wants of a new growth. To effect this desirable object heat was destined to lend a powerful auxiliary aid, and for that purpose was disseminated over the entire face of nature in the form of electricity, either positive or negative, which is stimulated into action by the accumulation of a superabundance of vapour; and while in the act of its transmission into a state of primitive purity, the heavens manifest the appearance spoken of, the amount of light and situation of the planets accounting for the difference of its appearance at different times.

At all events the study and attempt to ratiocinate this point cannot but be attended with advantageous results to all ages and conditions of mankind; as its tendency is to elevate the mind, and imperceptibly lead to a more clear and proper appreciation of the infinite munificence and wisdom of the Creator

WASHINGTON IRVING.—We are called to the consideration of the gentleman whose name begins our article, by an attack recently made upon him by the New-Yorker: a journal, by-the-by, save, we think in this instance, justly and universally admired. However, the reputation of Mr. Irving is 'of too substantial a kind, to be injured by any siege at this late day. The New-Yorker should recollect, the world looks upon Irving in letters, as upon Washington in arms, as the hero of country; and that he has built a shrine in almost every heart, which defies the strong arm of detraction. But what has been the crimes that could provoke so determined an attack? He has said there are more critics than are just. He has vindicated one of his own craft, Mr. Cooper: a writer, who by culpably entering the arena of politics, has greatly impaired a well earned and truly deserved literary fame. We have no excuse to offer for this "grievous fault" of Mr. Cooper's; yet we think the feeling that actuated Mr. Irving's remark towards him, is laudable in the extreme, and rather excites admiration than any other emotion. Nor can we help thinking, that Mr. Cooper has too long been the glass-house against which every hand has hurled the stone. The before beautiful structure seems to be shattered into atoms. This fact operating upon a fine mind like his, at length turned it into bitter misanthropy; and the result was, the world has been edified with a "Home as Found"—a work, which while it evinces the author's power still to write vigorously and well, had better for his own sake, never seen the light. His opinions between the time of writing these satirical volumes, and those of the "Travelling Bachelor," of former years, have undergone too serious a change to be correct; and renders one of these productions a brilliant absurdity. Nevertheless, who that has read the "Last of the Mohicans," and "The Pilot," does not look upon their author as one that has exalted American literature. His description of natural scenes—the Forest and the Ocean—are by all allowed to be unsurpassed. Mr. Irving, doubtless sensibly felt this, when he gave his remarks, unrestrained to the public; and if by so doing he has provoked the "hot haste" of some, he doubtless consoles himself, as he ought, with the natural reflection, that the most clubs are thrown in those trees that bear the best fruit; and likewise, if he has told an untruth, by signifying there is more criticism than justice, he doubtless has the comfort of not being alone in such an opinion.

FANNY AND OTHER POEMS.—For sale by W. C. Little.—Why Halleck should for so many years persevere in keeping the public from this delightful collection of verse, is more than we can imagine. It certainly cannot have been from the cause so often stated—that of being made up of severe personality. The most acrid parts are so finely flavored with other ingredients, that even the person for whom the dose was prepared, can, we are sure swallow it with perfect ease. Providing such has been the cause Mr. Halleck must labor under more than his proportion of that refined sensitiveness, so common to his fraternity. Although the Poem of Fanny possessed much of the poetic, it has been chiefly, and correctly, admired for its dramatic and satirical character. The incidents throughout are familiar and interesting; and the invention of the finale catastrophe—the falling chandelier, would be worthy of an origination from Shakespeare. How strongly it reminds us, for simplicity and ingenuity, of the "stolen kerchief"—the hinge on which the whole machinery of Othello turns. The entire writing of Halleck are peculiar for shrewd observation, and fine mental imagery. He is not the poet of Fancy, but that of thought, vivid and intense. This, combined with lively sallies of wit, has made his works admired as well in the counting-house, as the college. His style of blending pathos and humour in almost the same sentence at the same time, being alike free from the morbidity of grief and the broad-grin of vulgarity, has made him more generally read than any of our Poets. As an instance of pleasure derived from this style of writing, the concluding song of Fanny, quoted in another column, is scarcely surpassed in the language.

However, we do not look upon FANNY as the best production contained in this elegant volume. The Recorder is infinitely its superior. In the last mentioned, poetry less frequently dwindles into prose. Above all, we like it from the liberal compliments showered upon his cotemporaries in song. They show him without envy; possessed of that true nobleness of spirit, which do honor to himself, and rank him among the most generous, as well as best of poets. To verify our remarks, we select the following detached parts of the Recorder, which we think are beautiful:

But let that pass. As I have said,
There's naught, save laurels, on your head,
And time has changed my clustering hair,
And shower'd the snow flakes thickly there;
And though our lives have ever been,
As different as their different scene;
Mine more renown'd for rhymes than riches,
Yours less for scholarship than speeches;
Mine pass'd in low-roof'd leafy bower,
Yours in high halls of pomp and power,
Yet are we, be the moral told,
Alike in one thing—growing old,
Ripen'd like summer's cradled sheaf,
Faded like autumn's falling leaf—
And nearing, sail and signal spread,
The quiet anchorage of the dead.
For such is human life, wherever
The voyage of its bark may be,
On home's green-bank'd and gentle river,
Or the world's shoreless, sleepless sea.

I know that you are modest, know
That when you hear your merit's praise,
Your cheeks quick blushes come and go.
Lilly and rose-leaf, sun and snow,
Like maidens' on their bridal days.
I know that you would fain decline
To aid me and the sacred nine,
In giving to the asking earth
The story of your wit and worth;
For if there be a fault to cloud
The brightness of your clear good senses,
It is, and be the fact allow'd,
Your only failing—DIFFIDENCE!
An Amiable weakness—given
To justify the sad reflection,
That in this vale of tears not even
A  is complete perfection,
A most romantic defestation
Of power and place, of pay and ration;
A strange unwillingness to carry
The weight of honour on your shoulders,
For which you have been named, the very Sensitive Plant of office-holders,
A shrinking bashfulness, whose grace
Gives beauty to your manly face.
Thus shades the green and growing vine
The rough bark of the mountain pine,
Thus round her freedom's waking steel
Harmodius wreathed his country's myrtle;
And thus the golden lemon's peel
Gives fragrance to a bowl of turtle.

True, "many a flower," the poet sings,
"Is born to blush unseen"
But you, although you blush, are not
The flower the poets near.
In vain you wooed a lowlier lot;
In vain you clipp'd your eagle-wings—
Talents like yours are not forgot
And buried with earth's common things.
No! my dear  I would give

My laurels, living and to live,
Or as much cash as you could raise on
Their value, by hypothecation,
To be, for one enchanted hour,
In beauty, majesty, and power,
What you for forty years have been,
The Oberon of life's fairy scene.

THE CONCERT.—Mr. Knight's of Monday evening last, at Stanwix Hall, was all the heart could desire.—We had expected much from the reputation that preceded his entrance among us, and we realized every expectation. He possesses a delightful tenor voice, and uses it skilfully. Many of the melodies were his own composition—"Cupid among the roses," which, to his shame be it said, still remains in manuscript is as rare a song as we in a long time have listened to. The incident contained therein, is exceedingly happy.—"She wore a wreath of roses"—according to his own singing of it—especially the last stanza, is beyond description beautiful. Mr. K. was assisted through the evening, by Miss Jackson, of our city, on the Piano, and Mr. Andrews of Troy, on the violin. The Fantasia by Miss J. displayed a perfect knowledge of musical effect. Her delicate and rapid performance, her fingers running over the keys like electric sparks, producing sounds, that for the time, gives a taste of Eden; would convince greater stoics than ourselves that "music is divine." Nor did Mr. Andrew's play "second fiddle." There was peculiar brilliancy in his style upon the violin, which thrilled us continually. We hope to have our city visited often by such concerts, and we also hope it will receive a larger attendance.—The thin audience of Monday evening was enough to discourage not Mr. Knight, but one accustomed to disappointment. However, the sultry air of the evening must have kept numbers away. Should Mr. K. at any future time appear, we are confident, he will meet a reception more to his liking.

Juvenile Depository, and Youth's Mental Casket.—This is the title of a very interesting little publication, the first and second number of which, we have just received. The Depository is conducted by Mr. Luther Pratt, of Skeneateles, already favorably known to the public, as the editor of several interesting and useful works. The Depository is chiefly designed for youth, and from the numbers before us, we can with great pleasure recommend it to the favorable notice of all who have the charge of youth. Each volume, when completed, contains 432 pages, at the price of one dollar per annum—cheap enough in all conscience.

Mr. James S. Gould, of the Albany Apprentice Library, is authorised to receive subscriptions.

OUR POLITICS.—A circumstance transpired a few days since, which has brought us a communication from a friend in which he wishes to know whether our paper is to meddle with the politics of the day. We distinctly answer no. Our paper is to be strictly a Masonic and Literary Journal, and asking as we do the patronage of our brethren and friends of both parties, propriety and fair dealing leaves us but one course to pursue, which we shall most strictly adhere to. We have, in common with every citizen, our particular notions of men and things, and in the exercise of our principles as a freeman, we shall take the liberty of belonging to either party, or both as is most agreeable. This belongs to us and not to our patrons. Our readers have now our political views, and we trust they will be satisfactory.

HARVEST.—From every section of this vast union, accounts continue to be received proclaiming this season as unusually prolific in its "yield," in requital of the toils of the husbandman. Smiling plenty is an inmate of the house of every frugal farmer and his conscious independence places him, in the scale of happiness far above the denizens of cities. The machinations of politicians and speculators can have but little effect in clouding serenity of his existence. He draws his support from the bowels of the earth, and the consciousness of his usefulness bids him persevere; "for he who makes, by tillage, two blades of grass grow, where but one grew before, is of more intrinsic use in community than the subduer of nations."

Melancholly Occurrence.—Thomas Lockwood, a respectable English resident, of this city, drowned himself a few days since, while laboring under a fit of partial derangement. Although somewhat beforehand, he has of late been anticipating want; and it is supposed this unhappy state of mind, has produced the sad result which we have stated. His body was found on Monday last. He has left a wife and three children to mourn his untimely fate.

TRIBUTE OF RESPECT.

At a meeting of Apollo Lodge No. 49, held at St. John's Hall in the city of Troy, on Wednesday 11th inst., to pay the last respects to the remains of the late Lewis Lyon of this city, the following preamble and resolutions were unanimously adopted:—

Whereas, Almighty God, in the exercise of a wise but mysterious Providence, has suddenly and unexpectedly taken from the world the soul of our dear lamented brother, Lewis Lyon and thereby called a large circle of friends, the members of the Masonic Fraternity, and a fondly attached family, severely to mourn their loss.

Resolved, That while the way of the Providence we are now called to lament, is inscrutably and deeply affecting, we bow with submission and reverential awe.

Resolved, That this fraternity sympathize deeply in the sorrows of the friends, and particularly those of the immediate family, now so sorely bereaved.

Resolved, That we view in this dispensation a solemn and impressive admonition to us of the shortness and uncertainty of life, and the great duty to be also ready.

Resolved, That we commend ourselves and the friends who on this occasion are called to mourn, to the keeping of Almighty God, who has promised to be the stay and the comfort of all the afflicted.

Resolved, That the secretary be authorised to transmit a copy of the foregoing to the family of the deceased, and that these resolutions be published in the American Masonic Register.

ITEMS.

A new sort of Clover has been imported into England from Asia, which is said may be cut every month or if allowed will grow to the enormous height of 12 to 15 feet. Each grain produces 300,000 seeds.

We understand that the Rev. Mr. Kirk, Mr. John H. Prentiss and Family of this City, and the Rev. Dr. Beman, of Troy, who returned from Europe in the Great Western.

Sunday School Union.—The Sunday Schools celebrated their Anniversary on Tuesday last. The Park was filled with Teachers and Pupils, who moved in Procession down either side of State to Market street, and thence North and South to the North Dutch and 1st Presbyterian Churches, where interesting and appropriate exercises were observed. The day was bright, and the scene one of great moral beauty.

Yellow Fever in the Mississippi Steamboats.—The Wheeling (Va.) Times of Saturday says, that this dreadful disease has made its way into the steamboats on the Mississippi. The Mormon and Fusileer, which arrived recently at the mouth of the Ohio, had fifteen deaths on board by the yellow fever, the former 4, the latter 11. They were all buried at the mouth.

The Archbishop of Sweden, Wallen, died lately at Stockholm. He was the author of the translation of the psalms.

Sir Robert Clayton died on the 15th of August, aged 93 years. He was a major in the army in 1785.

One of the Africans, belonging to the company recently captured in the Amistad, died in jail at New Haven, on the 4th inst. His disease was a sort of dysentery.

General Sir James Stewart died at Sheltenham on the 19th of August. He was the oldest officer in the British army, having entered as a cornet in 1761.

SONNETS.

TO RUIN.

Where Nature stands aghast
And wrings her hands in silent agony—KIRKE WHITE.
Grey tombstone of the Past—arts, domes and feuds,
Like those who gave them birth, beneath thee rest;
And undisturbed the sea bird builds his nest,
Where god-like Cæsars once led multitudes
To fame sublime! And too—frail monument
At glory's sepulchre—bright forms that lent
A rain-bow loveliness to life, have pressed
The dust where thine oblivious shadow falls!
While gazing on thee, how the living heart appalls,
And ah, how all ambition's phantoms fade!
Hope's myriad sunbeams quench their bright array
Within a coming storm. Lo! e'en the blade
The warrior trusted, fails; and mid the fray
His form is stretched in desolate decay.

THE SLANDERER.

By treacherous ambush, or more treacherous smiles,
Embracing while he stabs the heart that met
His specious seeming with unguarded breast—MONTGOMERY.
Thou living Leprous, whose contagion spread
Sear spots of shame on brows where beauty shone;
Thou human Upas, breathing poison on
Aught daring to approach thy region dread;
Thou walking reptile, by whose venom'd tongue
Was friendship's trusting heart deep pierced and wrung;
Black darkness follows thy malignant tread!
The good do shun thee as a fire-dreg'd bowl
That burns life's growing verdure from the soul;
And, doomed within thy loathsome self to dwell!
Guilt looks thy form upon, and breathes so free,
That all of vice at once seems changed to thee;
Nor would Death break thy green-heart's saffron shell,
To let from earth-born breast arise the fumes of Hell.

TO—

A change came o'er the spirit of my dream—BRON.
Night draws its sweet serenity of air
Around, and soothes me as the looks I love
Have soothed me oft. The moon sails like a dove
Far up the sky, on some kind errand there.
As its soft brilliance lights the stars, and thro' wa
A silver lustre through the dark expanse,
I think of one, who on life's morning rose
So beautiful I could not believe her glance
Was real—And while scenes return so sweet,
Through every vein a thrill of rapture glows;
Yes—Empress of my soul! I think of thee,
To bend my heart in homage at thy feet;
For life would all be midnight dark to me,
Without thine angel beaming ministry.

THE WINDS,

BY WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT.

Ye winds, ye unseen currents of the air,
Softly ye played a few brief hours ago;
Ye bore the murmuring bee; ye tossed the hair
O'er maiden cheeks, that took a fresher glow;
Ye rolled the round white cloud thro' depths of blue;
Ye shook from faded flowers the lingering dew;
Before you the catalpa's blossoms flew,
Light blossoms, dropping on the grass like snow.

How are ye changed! Ye take the cataract's sound,
Ye take the whirlpool's fury and its might;
The mountain shudders as ye sweep the ground;
The valley woods lie prone beneath your flight.
The clouds before you sweep like eagle's past;
The homes of men are rocking in your blast;
Ye lift the roofs like autumn leaves, and cast,
Skyward, the whirling fragments out of sight.

The weary fowls of heaven make wing in vain,
To scape your wrath; ye seize and dash them dead.
Against the earth ye drive the roaring rain;
The harvest field becomes a river's bed;

And torrents tumble from the hills around,
Plains turn to lakes, and villages are drowned,
And wailing voices, midst the tempest's sound,
Rise, as the rushing floods close overhead.

Ye dart upon the deep, and straight is heard
A wilder roar, and men grow pale, and pray;
Ye fling its waters round you, as a bird
Flings o'er his shivering plumes the fountain's spray.
See! to the breaking mast the sailor clings;
Ye scoop the ocean to its briny springs,
And take the mountain billow on your wings,
And pile the wreck of navies round the bay.

Why rage ye thus?—no strife for liberty
Has made you mad; no tyrant, strong thro' fear,
Has chained your pinions, till ye wrenched them free,
And rushed into the unmeasured atmosphere:
For ye were born in freedom where ye blow;
Free o'er the mighty deep to come and go;
Earth's solemn woodwinds were yours, her wastes of snow.
Her isles where summer blossoms all the year.

O ye wild winds! a mightier Power than yours
In chains upon the shores of Europe lies;
The accepted throng, whose fetters he endures,
Watch his mute throes with terror in their eyes—
And armed warriors all round him stand,
And, as he struggles, tighten every band,
And lift the heavy spear, with threatening hand,
To pierce the victim, should he strive to rise.

Yet oh, when that wronged Spirit of our race
Shall break, as soon he must, his long-worn chains,
And leap in freedom from his prison-place,
Lord of his ancient hills and fruitful plains,
Let him not rise, like these mad winds of air,
To waste the loveliness that time could spare,
To fill the earth with wo, and blot her fair
Unconscious breast with blood from human veins.

But may he like the Spring-time come abroad,
Who crumbles winter's gyves with gentle might,
When in the genial breeze, the breath of God,
Come spouting up the unsealed springs to light;
Flowers start from their dark prisons at his feet,
The woods, long dumb, awake to hymnings sweet,
And morn and eve, whose glimmering almost meet,
Crowd back to narrow bounds the ancient night.

BRILLIANT RHYMES.

FROM THE POEM OF FANNY.

He took at Jupiter a shilling's worth
Of gazing, through the showman's telescope;
Sounds as of far-off bells came on his ears,
He fancied 'twas the music of the spheres.

He was mistaken, it was no such thing,
'Twas Yankee Doodle play'd by Scudder's band;
He mutter'd, as he linger'd listening,
Something of freedom and our happy land
Then sketch'd, as to his home he hurried fast
This sentimental song—his saddest, and his last.

Young thoughts have music in them, love
And happiness their theme;
And music wanders in the wind
That lulls a morning dream.
And there are angel voices heard,
In childhood's frolic hours,
When life is but an April day
Of sunshine and of showers.

There's music in the forest leaves
When summer winds are there.
And in the laugh of forest girls
That braid their sunny hair.
The first wild bird that drinks the dew,
From violets of the spring,
Has music in his song, and in
The fluttering of his wing.

There's music in the dash of waves
When the swift bark cleaves their foam;
There's music heard upon her deck,
The mariner's song of home,
When moon and star beams smiling meet
At midnight on the sea—

And there is music—once a week
In Scudder's balcony.

But the music of young thoughts too soon
Is faint, and dies away,
And from our morning dreams we wake
To curse the coming day.
And childhood's frolic hours are brief,
And oft in after years
Their memory comes to chill the heart,
And dim the eye with tears.

To-day, the forest leaves are green,
They'll wither on the morrow,
And the maiden's laugh be changed ere long
To the widow wail of sorrow.
Come with the winter snows, and ask
Where are the forest birds?
The answer is a silent one,
More eloquent than words.

The moonlight music of the waves
In storm is heard no more,
When the living lightning mocks the wreck
At midnight on the shore,
And the mariner's song of home has ceased,
His corse is on the sea—
And music ceases when it rains
In Scudder's balcony.

New York, Sept. 1839.

SHERIFF'S OFFICE—City and county of Albany, August 17, 1839.

ELECTION NOTICE—A general election is to be held in the county of Albany on the 4th, 5th, and 6th, days of November next, at which will be chosen the officers mentioned in the notice from the Secretary of State, of which a copy is annexed.

MICHAEL ARTCHER, Sheriff,
State of New York, Secretary's Office,
Albany, Aug. 15, 1839.

Sir—Notice is hereby given you that the term of service of James Powers, a Senator of the Third Senate District of this state will expire on the last day of December next, and that a senator is to be chosen in that district, to which the county of which you are sheriff belongs at the general election to be held on the fourth, fifth and sixth days of November next.

You will also take notice, that a vacancy has been caused in the representation of the Third Senate District, by the death of Noadiah Johnson, a senator from that district, whose term of office would have expired on the last day of December, 1840; and that a senator to supply the said vacancy is to be chosen at the said next general election.

You will also take notice, that a proposed amendment to the constitution is to be submitted to the people at the said election, at which the electors are to vote, "For the election of Mayors by the People," or "Against the election of Mayors by the People." At the same election the following officers are to be chosen, viz: Three members of Assembly.

JOHN C. SPENCER, Secretary of State.

N.B. You are to give notice of the aforesaid election, in writing to one of the inspectors of each town and ward in your county, and annex thereto a copy of this notice. You are also to publish the said notice and copy in all the public newspapers printed in your county.

MASONIC.

From the Olive Branch:

OBJECTIONS TO MASONRY—ANSWERED.

The accompanying letters were written under peculiar circumstances, and without the least reference to publication. I kept copies of them because I wished my brethren to be informed of what I had done, that they might sustain me if right, or point out my errors if wrong. Some of my friends expressed a favorable opinion concerning the performance, as well as the design, and solicited that they should be made public; but I resisted every application of that nature, and should never have consented if your paper had not offered the only proper channel through which they could appear.

They were addressed to an eminent minister of the Baptist Church, who had taken great pains, by the circulation of anti-Masonic books, pamphlets and papers to aid the fanatical opposers of masonry in the unsparing crusade which they were carrying on against it. He spoke of the Institution, both in public and private as one designed to impose upon the community, to undermine all religion, and to subvert the free principles of our government; and gave it as his opinion that all good persons ought to unite in putting it down. It was necessary, under these circumstances, that some of the Fraternity should defend it; and as no other person seemed willing to undertake it, and I was moreover, the representative of the Order in this place, I determined to lay aside any diffidence I might feel on the subject and commenced the correspondence of which I send you a copy.

It is but justice to say, that before the death of that gentleman, which took place not many years after, all unfriendly feeling, and all want of confidence had been entirely removed from the minds of both parties, if any had ever existed; and there was a kindness and affection in their intercourse which has left a deep and lasting impression on the mind of the survivor. I take great pleasure, also, in saying that no allusion was ever made to our former difference; and I never afterwards heard of his mentioning the subject of Masonry, except to regret that he had ever interfered with it.

REVEREND AND DEAR SIR,—I have lately been informed that you are unfriendly to the Institution of Freemasonry, and that certain books on that subject have been sent to you for distribution, with a view to denounce that Institution as injurious to the cause of morality, social order and religion; and I hope you will allow me so far to call on your patience, and to trespass on your valuable time, as to offer a few remarks in its defence.

I have never read any of the publications to which I allude; and if I had, I could not, in the limits of a letter, give a formal answer to all the objections which may have been urged in them. One of the principles of the Institution teaches us never to engage in controversies and arguments, with those who may ridicule it, through an ignorance of its character. But we are not forbidden to offer a reasonable defence, when there is a probability of throwing some true light on the subject, without the danger of incurring the evil consequences of passionate argument.

I will begin with the objections I have heard brought forward against Masonry, and endeavor to answer them as they occur to me.

1. It requires no religious test; and admits those who are not Christians. Masonry, in its present form, is derived from the time of Solomon, who was at the head of the order. How long it may have existed, or whether it did exist as a separate body, previously to his time, is not certainly known to us. There have been, undoubtedly, some changes in the ceremonies, and some additions taken from those parts of the Bible which have been written since that period, together with the unavoidable alterations in phraseology which must have taken place, in the numerous successive translations which human language has undergone; but the mysteries, as we are informed by Masonic tradition, have remained the same. This assertion is supported by the fact, so well known among us, that they continue to be used, without any variation, in all countries, and in all languages. Seeing, then, that the Institution derives its origin and organization from a period anterior to the Christian religion, and that at the introduction of the gospel it had already extended itself over different nations, it is not to be wondered at that we find it among those who do not believe in the Christian faith. The Jews and Mahometans are as much entitled to its privileges as Christians; and the only religious test which we make indispensable is a belief in the being and existence of God. We are informed by Masonic tradition that many of the zealous supporters of the Christian Church, in its infancy, were members of the Masonic Order, among whom were St. Paul, and the two St. Johns. All Christian Lodges, in whatever country they are held, are to this day dedicated to the two last named Saints.

2. It is objected to because it is not made known to the world. The mysteries of Masonry are, of themselves, of no importance, except so far as they go to perpetuate the Order, and to keep it distinct from all others. If its benefits were calculated to bear exclusively upon the future condition of mankind; or if it offered the means of salvation to the whole human race, then it would be both improper and criminal to withhold it from any one. It is not, however, of this character. It was, at its first institution, an operative profession, all the members of which were associated by particular ties and duties, and possessed certain mysteries, by which they were enabled to distinguish each other, to make themselves known, and to prove their claim to the charity, protection, and support of the Fraternity. In this situation it existed for many centuries, until some persons of distinction, who were not operatives, were admitted; and it became from that time a speculative Order. They were at all times ready to admit to equal privileges all who were found worthy; but extending them to all, whether worthy or unworthy, would effectually destroy the Institution, and break up the correcting ties of the individual members. The strongest duties of Masons are those which they owe to each other. These are so blended with their secret ceremonies, that it is impossible for any but themselves to know and feel them; and if they were extended to all the world, good bad and indifferent, the burden would fall only upon those who would obey the dictates of conscience, while the abandoned and desperate would derive the only advantage from the social compact. What sort of a Christian Church would it be, which would admit all the world, without inquiring whether they possessed the requisite qualifications? Yet Christianity is designed for the salvation of all. What would you think of an association which would compel you to take up the merest sot that ever rolled in a kennel, embrace him as a brother, and receive him upon terms of perfect equality? You would immediately renounce it. You see, then, the impropriety of extending it to all.

I believe that many are displeased with Masonry, after having taken its degrees. The reason of this is, that it calls on them for feelings which they have not, and enjoins on them certain performances which are repugnant to their natural tendency. You can imagine the situation of one who has professed the Christian religion, and afterwards found that he had deceived himself. His heart still inclines to evil, and he wears the restraint which his professions have placed on his conduct as a galling chain. He is finally compelled either to retract, or to cover the natural wickedness of his heart with the veil of hypocrisy—thereby becoming the most miserable, as well as the most despicable of human beings. Such, to a certain extent, is the situation of one who takes upon him the performance of moral and social duties at which his heart revolts.

3. It does not admit females. This objection is at once overcome, when we recollect, that it was formerly an operative profession, and as it was not customary for females to perform the labors of a carpenter, or a stone mason, so, when it became a speculative Order that ancient regulation could not be altered. I have seen only one instance on record of a female who had taken the degrees of the Order. She was the daughter of a nobleman in England, who held a Lodge in his own house. By some means this young lady became acquainted with the ceremonies, being detected, was regularly taken into the Lodge. She made great proficiency in the degrees, and was several times called to preside as Master. She lived to an advanced age, a pattern for the female character, exemplary in all her conduct, and died regretted by all, after having liberally bestowed charity upon all the distressed within her reach. It was her uniform custom to take the head of all Masonic professions in her carriage.

4. It is said to encourage dissipation. This objection has been, in some degree, founded in truth. They who had assembled as Masons would, sometime, when the duties of the Lodge were over, remain together as friends, and allow their enjoyments to go beyond the bounds of prudence; and a fault which has brought discredit upon the Fraternity. But I assure you that all kinds of disorderly conduct, immorality, and dissipation are in direct opposition to the principles of the Order; and so long as I have been a member of it, I have never once seen ardent spirit or wine in a Lodge. I have known many Masons to be expelled forever, from all the benefits and privileges of the Institution, on account of dissipation, or other unmasonic conduct.

I am willing to acknowledge that there are many unworthy members, who bring scandal upon the Fraternity; and a happy thing would it be for us if we could get rid of them. But this is the misfortune to which all human societies are liable; and until the nature of man can be made more perfect, there will be this misfortune grafted upon his constitution. When we examine the chain of creation, we find

"There must be, some where, such a link as man, poor, weak fallible man, with all his frailties and imperfections upon him. Wherever human nature and human feelings are brought into action, there must be something wrong. The Christian religion, with the purity of which nothing earthly can dare to compare, is not free from this evil; and even the Saviour of mankind had a Peter to deny, and a Judas to betray him.

5. It is believed by many that the members of this Order rely on it as a means of salvation. Nothing can be more incorrect than this opinion. It cannot be considered as going further than the social and moral virtues. But I may safely assert that, if we would faithfully pursue the excellent precepts and tenets laid down for the government of our conduct, we should come as near to perfection as the nature of man could arrive without revelation. Our system of ethics is taken from the Holy Bible, and there are blended with the ceremonies and charges many of the precepts delivered by the fathers of the Christian Church.

6. It is thought by some to be designed only as an imposition on the credulity of the ignorant. The high character for intelligence and piety possessed by many of its members will, at once, set this objection at rest, in the minds of all liberal people. Many ministers of the gospel are, of my own knowledge, conspicuous and zealous members of the Fraternity, and are not ashamed, at all times, and in all companies, to avow their partiality for its principles. Its good offices are sometimes exerted in aid of the doctrines of the Christian Church. The Rev. Mr. W. once presented to the Presbytery of North Carolina the sum of fifty dollars, as a donation from the Lodge in Hillsborough, of which he was a member, to be applied to the use of the Bible Society. Many other instances might be added to prove the sincerity of their charitable purposes, and the benevolence of their designs.

7. It is said to make no beneficial change in the lives and characters of its members. This is in many instances true; but it would be equally illiberal and unfounded to say that it was always so. There is nothing in the constitution of Masonry to make any person worse; but there are many inducements for them to become better. As I before remarked, the principle duties incumbent on us are blended with the secret ceremonies, and are practised toward each other, in such a manner that they are not presented to the world; and if we do not avail ourselves of the instructions and admonitions which our Institution gives us, with regard to our general character, it is not the fault of the Institution, but of us. If sinners be lost, they have to blame themselves for refusing the terms offered to them and not the Bible which offers them. I can say with truth, and without fear of contradiction, that where none are made worse, many are made better.

8. Some of its members have been accused of the abduction and Murder of Morgan. Of this accusation I can only say I am entirely ignorant; and if it be true, the act is looked upon with abhorrence by all good citizens and lovers of public order—and by none more so than the body of Masons themselves. I consider it entirely questionable, however, whether the charge be true to the full extent alleged. Were we to admit the fact, however, it does not prove that the general tendency of Masonry is evil, or that it is an Institution which ought to be put down. It only proves the misguided zeal of a few ignorant brethren, whose error we ought to pity, at the same time that we wish justice to fall upon them. If it be true, it affords the only instance of oppression or violence committed by the Fraternity, since the existence of the Order—and that not sanctioned by authority, but undertaken on the responsibility, and at the risk of individuals.

[To be concluded next week.]

MISCELLANY.

THE WITNESS BOX.

BY THEODORE S. FAY.

The nominal purpose of a court of justice is to seek the truth; but I question whether the truth is ever in other places more attacked, sneered at, brow-beaten, ridiculed and put out of countenance. It is the truth, which every one in his turn finds it his interest to conceal. It is truth that every one is afraid of. Even the party most unequivocally in the right is anxious to exclude the truth from the other side, lest it may seem to contradict his own; and all the lawyers, and even the judge, seem as much on the watch to stop the witness's mouth every two minutes, as they have been to make him come there to open it. To me, one of the most ridiculous things in the world is a witness in the box, trying (poor fellow!) to give in his testimony. He is, we will suppose, not in the slightest degree interested in either of the parties, and doubtless, wishes them both tied together by the neck, and at the bottom of the Thames. He comes into court, not voluntarily, but dragged, if he resists, by two or three scowling ministers of the law, who, from the mere fact of his being presumed to know something about the pending suit, think themselves entitled to treat him as if he had been brought up for robbing a hen roost. He is forced from his business or amusements for the purpose of speaking the truth, and he inwardly resolves to tell the whole story as soon as possible, and get rid of the business. He thinks he knows the worst. He thinks the loss of time, and the awkwardness of speaking the first time in his life in public are the extent of his sufferings. Unsuspecting victim! He no sooner enters the box than he finds himself at once the centre of a circle of enemies, and holding a position not greatly unlike that of a prisoner in an Indian war-dance. He tries to tell his story.

Witness. I was going down Maiden-lane—

Mr. Sergeant Bowwow. Stop sir.

Counsellor Botherall. Don't interrupt the witness.

Counsellor Badger. The witness is ours.

Counsellor Bluster. (fiercely and indignantly.) We want the fact.

Judge. Let the witness tell his story.

Witness. I was going down Maiden-lane, where I live—

Bowwow. We don't want to know where you live, sir.

Botherall. That is part of his testimony.

Badger. You can take the witness into your own hands when we have done with him; at present he is ours.

Bluster. (sarcastically.) Very well, sir.

Judge. Gentlemen, I beg you will sit down.

One of the Aldermen. Officer, keep order.

Officers. (in a tone of thunder, and with a scowl of more than oriental despotism upon the spectators, who are not making any noise that they are aware of) Silence.

Witness. I was going down Maiden-lane, where I reside, as I said before, when—Bowwow. You don't come here, to repeat what you said before!

Botherall. I beg.

Badger (starting to his feet). I demand.

Bluster. My Lord, I appeal to you to protect me from the impertinence of this witness.

All the Counsellors and Judge together. The witness must.

Officer (looking at the audience again, and in a voice of thunder). Silence!

Judge. Gentlemen, it seems to me that the best way to come at the truth is to let the witness go on, and I will call him to order if he wanders from his duty.—Witness.

Witness. My lord.

Judge. Tell the plain fact of this assault—tell the jury what you know about it. Remember you are here to speak the truth. Raise your voice, and turn your face to the jury. What do you know of this affair?

Again the witness commences, the lawyers continuing to skirmish around him all the while, like a parcel of wild Arabs fighting for the clothes of some unhappy prisoner. So far from getting a chance to say the truth the witness cannot get a chance to say anything. At length, bewildered out of his recollection—frightened, insulted, and indignant—however really desirous of telling the truth, he stumbles upon some inconsistency: some trifling, or not trifling paradox—accounted for at once, and to every one's entire satisfaction, by the idea that he has forgotten. But then comes the cross-examination: then the scientific artillery of a cool, able lawyer sharpened by thirty years of similar practices, is brought to bear upon one trembling and already nervous stranger—perhaps ignorant, perhaps a boy. Then comes the laugh of judge and jury, the murmur of astonishment from the crowd, that a person could be found degraded and base enough to say that "the defendant wore a little-rimmed hat," when he acknowledged subsequently, off his guard, that the hat had "a tolerably large rim." Then the poor fellow, sore all over, and not quite sure that he will not be sent to prison and hard labour, for perjury, before the week has rolled away, although he is the only person in court who does not in a greater or less degree merit that punishment, is dismissed to a bench a few yards off, where he is obliged to remain to hear the lawyers, in their address to the jury, tear his character to pieces with fine turns of rhetoric, and yet finer gesticulations.

"What, gentlemen of the jury," said Mr. Sergeant Bowwow, in a tone of deepest contempt, what does the next witness, this Mr. John Raw, say? Gentlemen, he comes forward under the most peculiar circumstances. A dark mystery shrouds his motives, which I shall not endeavor altogether to dissolve; but he comes forward, and he takes his place in that witness-box with the open, the avowed, the undisguised, the unaffected, the determined resolution to fix upon my client, the injured Mr. Savage, this foul and unnatural assault and battery. You saw him, gentlemen, when I cross-examined him, tremble under my eye—you saw him hesitate and turn pale at my voice." (Sergeant Bowwow, very probably, has a voice that would intimidate a bear.) "You heard him stammer and take back his words, and say he did 'not recollect.' Is this, gentlemen of the jury, an honest witness? The language of truth is plain and simple—it requires no previous calculation. If I ask you if you saw the sun set to-day, you answer yes or no—you do not hesitate, you do not tremble. You do not say, 'yes, I did,' and in the very next breath, 'no, I did not.' You do not first tell me, 'I walked ten miles yesterday,' and afterwards say, 'yesterday I was all day ill in bed.'"

"Now, gentlemen, what does this witness say? He commenced by telling you, gentlemen, that he lived in Maiden-lane; that he was going home on the day when this ridiculous and unnatural assault is said to have taken place; that he saw a crowd; that he approached; that he saw Mr. Savage, my client, the defendant in this action, come up to the plaintiff, Mr. Wiggins, hit said plaintiff, a blow with a bludgeon.—But, gentlemen, when I come to sift this plausible story, you heard him equivocate, and contradict himself. 'What sort of a hat had Mr. Savage on?—A black one. 'Of what breath was the rim?'—'About an inch.' He thought, doubtless, that he was to have everything his own way, till I brought into the witness-box to confront him the hatter who made and sold the hat, and who proves to you that the rim was broad. You cannot morally doubt that the hat worn on that day by Savage was a broad-brimmed hat; all the witnesses for the defendant swear it, and even Mr. John Raw himself, when closely questioned, acknowledged that it might have been a broad-brimmed hat. Next, gentlemen, the pantaloons. 'What colour were Mr. Savage's pantaloons?'—'Black,' said this Mr. John Raw. Gentlemen, I have produced these pantaloons in court. They have been identified beyond the possibility of doubt. What was the result? You saw, yourselves, gentlemen, the pantaloons were pepper and salt.

A cry of admiration throughout the court. The officer cries order.

The poor witness unfortunately occupied a conspicuous seat, and all eyes are fixed upon him with the most virtuous indignation.

"Furthermore, gentlemen, I asked this witness to describe the bludgeon. He could not. 'Had it ivory or gold on the handle?' He could not tell. 'Was there a ferule upon the end?' Did not know. 'Was it heavy?'—'Yes.' 'Had he ever handled it?'—'No.'—How could he tell the weight of a thing which he had never handled? (Another buzz of admiration.) 'Was he personally acquainted with Mr. Savage?'—'No.'—'Had he ever seen him?'—'No.' 'Since?'—'No.'—'Could he tell whether he had an aquiline nose or not?'—'No.' 'Was he not a friend of Mr. Wiggins?'—'Yes.' 'Had he not expressed an opinion upon this case?'—'Yes; he had said the scoundrel ought to have been ashamed of himself. 'Was Mr. Wiggins's hat knocked off?'—'No.' But, before he left the witness-box, he said he saw the blood on the top of the plaintiff's head. How could he see the top of his head unless the hat had been knocked off?

Another buzz. The witness here rose, and said, "Mr. Wiggins took it off to show me."

Officer. Silence, there!

Judge. Witness, you must not interrupt the counsel. You have had the opportunity of saying what ver you pleased. If you are again guilty of so great an indecorum, I shall be obliged to commit you.

Witness stands stupid.

Officer. Sit down! (in a tone of indignant command.) Witness sits down. Officer scowls at him as if he would snap his head off.

I shall not follow the learned gentleman further. I only appeal to every witness that has ever been brought into a court of justice, whether he has not found it often the most difficult place in the world to tell the truth in, and whether, when the truth was at length told, there ever were so many attempts made to mystify it? Whether so much of what every one present knew in his heart to be the truth, could anywhere else be so deliberately rejected, and whether, when this poor, lacerated, mutilated, unhappy truth, so much demanded, was at length produced, it did not have such an aspect so disguised that its own mother might not have known it?

THE DEAD.

To those whose thoughts are prone to dwell upon the 'cold obstruction' of the grave; who are wont to look upon the lowliest stone, in a durable erection, with the thought that it will exist, when the artisan's hands that placed it there, have mouldered into clay, and his own form shall have become a brother to 'the clod that the rude swain turns with his share and treads upon;' to such, we recommend the following from Smith's 'Theory of Moral Sentiments.' It explains and exposes a delusion, that is the fruitful source of wide unhappiness. 'It is a common thing,' says an old writer, 'for the countenances of the dead, even in their fixed and rigid state, to subside into the long-forgotten expression of sleeping infancy, and settle into the very look of early life; so calm, so peaceful, do they grow again, that those who knew them in their happy childhood, kneel by the coffin's side in awe, and see the angel even upon earth.' There is something in this beautiful passage, confirmatory of the accuracy of the following reasoning:

'We sympathize even with the dead; and overlooking what is of real importance in their situation, that awful futurity which awaits them, we are chiefly affected by those circumstances which strike our senses, but can have no influence upon their happiness. It is miserable, we think, to be deprived of the light of the sun; to be shut out from life and conversation; to be lain in the cold grave, a prey to corruption, and the reptiles of the earth; to be no more thought of in this world, but to be obliterated, in a little time, from the affections, and almost from the memory, of their dearest friends and relations. Surely, we imagine, we can never feel too much for those who have suffered so dreadful calamity. The tribute of our fellow-feeling seems doubly due to them now, when they are in danger of being forgotten by every body; and by the vain honors which we pay to their memory, we endeavor, for our own misery, artificially to keep alive our melancholy remembrance of their misfortune. That our sympathy can afford them no consolation seems to be an addition to their calamity; and to think that all we can do is unavailing, and that what alleviates all other distress, the regret, the love, and the lamentations of their friends, and yield no comfort to them, serves only to exasperate a sense of their misery. The happiness of the dead, however, most assuredly, is affected by none of these circumstances; nor is it the thought of these things which can ever disturb the profound security of their repose. The idea of that dreary and endless melancholy which the fancy naturally ascribes to their condition, arises altogether from our joining to the change which has been produced upon them, our own consciousness of that change, from our putting ourselves in their situation, and from our lodging, if I may be allowed to say so, our own living souls in their inanimated bodies, and thence conceiving that would be our emotions in this case. It is from this very illusion of the imagination, that the foresight of our own dissolution is so terrible to us, and that the idea of those circumstances, which undoubtedly can give us no pain when we are dead, makes us miserable while we are alive. And from thence arises one of the most important principles in human nature, the dread of death, the great poison to the happiness, but the great restraint upon the injustice of mankind, which, while it afflicts and mortifies the individual, guards and protects society.—Knickerbocker.

DOMESTIC HABITS OF NAPOLEON.

At nine o'clock the Emperor came out of his sleeping apartments, dressed for the whole day. First the officers on duty were admitted, and received their orders for the day. Then the grandes entrees and the officers of the household not on duty were introduced; and if any one had any particular communication to make, he staid till the public audience was concluded. At half after nine o'clock Napoleon breakfasted, on a small mahogany table with one leg, and covered with a napkin. The prefect of the palace stood close by this table, with his hat under his arm. The breakfast rarely lasted beyond eight minutes. Sometimes, however, men of science or literature, or distinguished artists, were admitted at this time, with whom Napoleon is represented to have conversed in an easy and lively style. Amongst these were M. Monge, Costax, Denon, Barthelet, Corvisart, David, Gerard, Isabey, Talma, and Fontaine. Dinner was served at six o'clock; the emperor and the empress dined alone on the common days of the week, but on Sunday all the imperial family attended, upon which occasion Napoleon, the empress, and Madame Mere had arm-chairs, and the rest chairs without arms. There was only one course.—The emperor drank no wine but Chambertin, and that usually mixed with water. Dinner lasted in general from fifteen to twenty minutes. All this time the prefect of the palace had to superintend the affair en grand and to answer any questions put to him. In the drawing-room a page presented to the emperor a waiter with a cup and a sugar stand. Le chef d'office poured out the coffee; the empress took the cup from the emperor, the page and the chief d'office retired; the prefect waited till the empress had poured the coffee into the saucer and given it to Napoleon. After this the emperor went to his papers again, and the empress played at cards. Sometimes he would come and talk a little while with the people of the household in the apartments of the empress, but not often, and he has never staid long. Upon his retiring, the officers on duty attended the audience du coucher, and received their orders for the morrow. This was the ordinary economy of the emperor's time, when not with the army.

Napoleon read the English newspapers every day in French, and M. de Bausset says the translation was rigorously exact. One day in January, 1811, the emperor gave some of these extracts to de B., and ordered him to read them aloud during dinner. The prefect got on pretty well, till he stumbled at some uncouth epithets, with which he was puzzled how to deal, especially in the presence of the empress, and a room full of domestics. He blew his nose, and skipped the words—"No!" said Napoleon, "read out! you will find many more." "I should be wanting—" "Read, I tell you," repeated the emperor, "read every thing!" At last de B. ran upon "tyrant or despot," which he commuted for "emperor." Napoleon caught the paper, then ordered M. de B. to continue. These translations used to be made by Mare; Duke of Bassano.

HATCHING FISH.

The Chinese, it is said, have a method of hatching the spawn of fish, and thus protecting it from those accidents which ordinarily destroy so large a portion of it. The fishermen collect it on the margin and surface of waters, all those gelatinous masses which contain the spawn of fish. After they have found a sufficient quantity they fill with it the shell of a hen's fresh egg, which they have previously emptied, stop up the hole, and put it under a sitting fowl. At the expiration of a certain number of days, they break the shell in water warmed by the sun. The young fry are presently hatched, and are kept in pure fresh water till they are large enough to be thrown into the pond with the old fish. The sale of spawn for this purpose forms an important branch of the trade in China.

Advertising Flour.—At what is called a "Pretracted Religious Meeting," held in a neighboring city Brother W—, a staid, respectable man, engaged in the flour business, rose to exhort. He said—"Brethren and sisters, it is our duty to attend immediately, to the ensuring of our salvation, and in order to this we must believe in the Scriptures. Brethren, I fully believe in them, as fully as I do that I shall receive for sale tomorrow, 200 barrels Howard street flour, and very good flour it will be too." At this moment the good old parson present, rose and said, "tut, brother W—, do not advertise your flour here, if you please."

Awkward position of a British Deserter.—When the steamboat Hamilton was about leaving Toronto last week, the mate escorted a large box to the wharf, which was directed to an individual in Coburg. The Captain of the Hamilton was on the boat when the mate came on board: and observing that he was intoxicated, he discharged him, but took the box on board. Of course the box was stowed away among the other freight, and nothing more was thought of it, until it reached its place of destination, where the denouement occurred.

When the hands were removing the box in question to the wharf at Coburg, it was, that the top fell off and unfolded to the astonished beholders, the living lineaments of a human face!

Gazers and gazee were equally astonished—the one to find such singular freight, and the other to be frightened so singularly. Of course, the boxed bundle of humanity was overhauled; and upon being questioned, acknowledged that he had been induced, when intoxicated, to attempt desertion in this novel mode.

He was servant of one of the Colonels at Toronto, and, from letters found with him, it is supposed he intended to go back of Coburg some distance, marry his sweetheart, and make tracks for the land of the free.—The drunkenness of the mate and his consequent discharge, of course, frustrated all the arrangements, as it is supposed that he was a party in the affair, and intended, during the night, to uncover the box, let out the gentleman, dress him in citizens clothes and then pass him off as a regular deck passenger. Instead of this, however the poor fellow was kept caged up for twelve or fourteen hours, only to be caught and punished.

The mate should share the punishment—if not for assisting in the desertion, at least for getting drunk when business so important was entrusted to him.—Rochester Dem.

An American told me one day, that a company had been working a coal mine in an Eastern State, which proved to be of a very bad quality, they had sent some to an influential person as a present, requesting him to give his opinion of it, as that would be important to them. After a certain time he forwarded to them a certificate couched in such terms as these; "I do hereby certify that I have tried the coal sent me by the company at—, and it is my decided opinion, that when the general conflagration of the world shall take place, any man who will take his position on that coal-mine will certainly be the last man who will be burnt."

That most amusing and really gifted author, Thomas Hood, has addressed a memorial to the British Parliament concerning Sergeant TALFOURD's law of copyright. It is marked with his usual punning characteristics which to Philadelphiaans especially, as well as to several counties, have rendered him extensively and favorable known.—Phil. Gaz.

"That your petitioner hath two children, who look up to him not only as the author of the Comic Annual, but as the author of their being. That the effect of the law, as regards an author, is virtually to disinherit his next of kin, and cast him off, with a book instead of a shilling. That your petitioner is very willing to write for posterity on the lowest terms, and would not object to a long credit, but that when his heir shall apply for payment to posterity he will be referred back to antiquity.—That as a man's hairs; whereas, on the contrary, your petitioner has ascertained by a nice calculation that one of his principal copyrights will expire on the same day that his oldest son should come of age. The very law of Nature protests against an unnatural law, which compels an author to write for every body's posterity—except his own.

Finally, whereas it has been urged 'if an author writes for posterity, let him look to posterity for his reward'—your petitioner adopts that very argument, and on its very principle prays for the adoption of the bill introduced by Mr. Sergeant Talfourd, seeing that, by the present arrangement, posterity is bound to pay every body, and any body but the true creditor. And your petitioner shall ever pray. THOMAS HOOD."

POPULAR TALES.

THE PHANTOM FUNERAL.

At the distance of several miles from the scene which in a former legend we described, there is a winding passage through the hills, which leads to a very narrow and precipitous defile, called Glenshee, or Glensheich—that is to say, the Valley of Spirits.—The glen itself is formed by the bases of the mountains, which fall, many of them, in a sharp declivity, for several hundred feet, and is in its gorge filled with the waters of a small dark lake over which no ray of sunshine has ever been known to shed a character of gladness. Along its farther margin there occur here and there nooks or corners of table-land. Narrow they are, and always of a grotesque formation; for the hills are peculiarly wild and sterile in their character, inasmuch as a shelving mass of debris is the only surface which many of them present, while others are composed entirely of broken and rugged rocks. Yet, although narrow, there was a time when one, and not the broadest, of these table lands sustained a hearth round which a poor but honest family were wont to assemble. The hut which contained that hearth was indeed of the very humblest order. It lay beneath the shelter of the precipice; and, save that its wicker chimney emitted at all seasons a delicate wreath of smoke, something more than a careless glance would have been required to convince you that such a thing was there. Moreover, round it, or near at hand, were such traces of man's industry as such a spot might alone be expected to exhibit. A patch of green was beside the cabin door, which, from the strong contrast it presented to the brown and stunted herbage near, you were at no loss to determine must be a potatoe field. A couple of goats, too, were tethered beside the threshold; while a few fowls, less than half-domesticated, scraped a scanty subsistence for themselves from among the roots of the heather. But in other respects sign there was none, that in this melancholy defile man had set up his rest; for the very roof of the cottage waved with long rank grass, and the blue-bell and wild thyme were abundantly intermixed with it.

Wild as Glenshee, is, however, and desolate and lonely, there are not wanting features here and there which effectually redeem it from the hazard of being condemned as utterly repulsive. A clear mountain stream comes tumbling down the hill, making the ear glad with its everlasting music, and falls into the lake, not till it has threaded its way for a long space amid overhanging rows of mountain-ash and the delicate alder. Over its banks, too, the sward grows rich and sweet, as if the soil were fertilized by the course of the torrent; while here and there the intervention of a rock gathers the waters into a heap, that they may spring off again in a tiny cataract of the most pellucid beauty. But this is not all. The rivulet in question flows westward a circumstance not to be overlooked, as connected with the burden of our history; for streams which take this course have a virtue peculiarly their own. When the shadows of the trees fall on them, or of the rocks, or even of the clouds above, they become scrolls in which the favoured among men "may read strange matters;" and many a time and oft has this particular rivulet shown to the eyes which studied them events that were to come.

A good many years ago, the hut of which I have spoken was inhabited by old Robin Ure, the shepherd of Glenshee, a thoughtful and somewhat contemplative man, who had arrived at one of the latter stages of human existence, through some enjoyment, and a good deal of suffering. Robin was one of those philosophers of nature's forming, who feel that happiness is not to be expected upon earth, and who therefore school themselves to bear with patience, to look back with resignation and forward in hope. Robin was also a religious man in his own peculiar way; for, though he seldom went to church, from which, indeed, his occupation cut him off, he carried his Bible with him to the hill-side, and read it gratefully. And much need there was that Robin should find both there, and in the world of imagination which his native poetry created, some solace for the trials which the world of busy men brought him. He had a kind, cheerful, and industrious partner, to be sure, who used her best endeavours to render his home happy; but, woe is me! even the tenderness of a wife will not always suffice if it come alone. Out of the seven children, all of them daughters, whom God had given them, one only survived; and she, albeit the very apple of their eyes, was to her parents of a source of unrelenting anxiety. She was a fragile and a delicate thing, tender, and sensitive in her frame, which was but little adapted to struggle against the rude blasts of her native glen, and the privations to which at times she was subjected. Indeed Mary, or, as the wild and poetic dialect of the glen has it, Mari, was a living instance of that caprice of nature, which plants flowers in a glacier, and scatters rills through a desert waste. Yet hers was not a mere physical debility, that is to say, the feebleness of the frame had a deeper source than ordinary disease. The order of her destiny had entailed upon Mari a supernatural gift, which sapped the foundations of her life, and stript her of every source of interest and enjoyment belonging to her sex and to her nature. She was born to the inheritance of the second-sight—that strange and most mysterious faculty, which may be traced no where except in the Highlands of Scotland, and the consequence was, that from her very cradle she had been an object of awe, I had almost said of terror, even to those who loved her with the tenderest affection. Accordingly the poor child grew almost to woman's estate without having even an ordinary acquaintance with any beyond her own narrow family circle; and, as Robin and his wife could not fail to fall in some degree under the shadow of their unhappy child's proscription, a stranger within the narrow vale of Glenshee—unless, indeed, it might be Murdoch, the shepherd of the opposite mountain, who sometimes came with a bonnet-full of black-berries, or a lamb's-skin for Mari's winter bed-quilt—would have been almost as much an object of curiosity as Gulliver in Brobdingnag, or the first ship to the South Sea Islanders. Yet, as matters stood within, the household of Glenshee was by no means an unhappy one, when the spirit of the lonely maiden rested from the trouble of its waters; for in the long nights of winter, when the wooden boards were drawn snugly over the window, and the logs of dried fir glowed and crackled on the hearth, the good wife turned her wheel cheerily, and Mari rested her chin upon her father's knee, and turned up to him the lustrous eyes which seemed to form quite the largest half of the pale face they lighted, to listen to the wonders of wild poe-sie which he drew from a Gaelic volume of Ossian—the commonest study of such among the Highlanders as study at all. When summer came again, the wizard maiden loved well to carry to the mountain's brow afar off the broth or sowens which formed her father's simple meal, and to linger upon some bare peak which overhung the lake, till the sun went down in his glory, and the stars came forth in their gentleness. For it is one of the peculiarities of this strange malady, if malady it may be called, that the fit of inspiration neither comes when the seer may desire its coming, nor admits of control or repression. There is, and there has been, divination everywhere. The Pythoness of old, the astrologer of the middle ages, the fortune-teller of our own times, all have, or pretend to have, intercourse with unseen powers which they control; but the second-sight is peculiar to the Scottish Highlanders, a heavy burthen it is upon those individuals on whom destiny may lay it.

Mari was standing on the threshold of her fifteenth year when my tale commences, though her weak frame and stunted proportions did not seem to claim, by several years, a period of life so far advanced towards maturity. If the healthful breeze of the mountains had blown upon her cheek with the invigorating influence which so often attends upon it, she would probably have been a beautiful specimen of her peculiar style of peasant loveliness; for her features were regular and open, and in the period of health, which she occasionally enjoyed, wore an expression of touching sweetness which spoke to the heart. She had a beseeching light in her deep grey eyes, which gave you an impression that there was some fervent and unuttered desire within which this world could not grant; and the melancholy languor of the other features, and the frequency with which her face was turned towards heaven, suggested the idea that her longing was to be at rest.

One clear, blue, biting evening at the end of October, that beautiful Scottish season when the varied covering of tree and mountain is yet stationary under the bright frosty atmosphere of winter, Murdoch, the shepherd, took his way up the margin of Lochshee with his plaid drawn round him, and his bonnet pulled over his eyes, in testimony of the sharpness of the air. The breeze came keenly over the mountain-tops, and swept the atmosphere of every trace of cloud or haze; but without rippling the surface of the water, which lay, as usual, dark, clear, and motionless, as if under the spell of some viewless influence. The leaves of the mountain-ash were falling with that sad sighing motion, which seems to say that they are grieving to resign their bright and brief existence; but the hardier wychelms yet retained their dark green foliage, and, though rare and straggling, they connected the bright blue sky and the delicate tint of the sunset with the departing season to which they seemed to belong.

Murdoch took less heed of the beauty of the evening than we have done, for he was pushing briskly forward, and appeared to view with some complacency the unusual breath of the column of smoke which rose from the cottage chimney, as if betokening the additional warmth of the blaze within. The shepherd had rounded the last turn of the rocky footpath, which led him by a long sweep from the opposite margin of the lake, and had put his foot upon the nearest of the stepping-stones which were to take him dry-shod over the broad part of the stream, as it flowed over the level ground, when his eye caught the flutter of a plaid, and he looked hastily up the river to discover the owner of it, not doubting that Elspeth's hour of milking had arrived, and that she had wrapt herself up to follow its duties out of doors. The plaid, however, as his quick eye soon perceived, was suspended from a tree, and its folds prevented him from tracing any figure to whom it might belong, or which might have sheltered behind it. The thought glanced across him that that Mari might have retreated to her favourite haunt, and he pushed his way through the brechans, with the intention of winning her home out of the chill autumn air to her mother's warm hearth; but when he drew aside the plaid, which hung like a screen from some hazels, he became like one transfixed at the vision which met him. The poor child stood like one spell-stricken, close by the verge of the streamlet, with her small fleshless feet touching the water, her hands pressed convulsively over her breast, and her eyes fixed with a wild and rigid stare upon the surface of the stream, while the masses of long black hair, which waved by the action of the wind back from her unearthly and colourless features, gave her, even in the eyes that were familiar with her wildest moods, an expression of frenzied excitement.

Murdoch hesitated for a moment, in doubt whether or not he could with safety arrest the young Pythoness in her mood of inspiration; but apprehension for the afflicted creature's bodily health prevailed, and he advanced slowly, yet with a warning noise, to her side, and said softly.

"The burn side is ower chilly for you, Mari dear; come with me to your mother's fire. See how the chimney smokes; I warrant it is cozier by the nook this better even than standing there without plaid or brogues upon you. Come your ways, Mari."

And he advanced nearer and nearer, with always a deeper tone of entreaty. The maiden stretched out her hand without looking towards him, and drew her friendly visitant closer to the water's edge.

"Look you there, and see what your morning work will be. You are come to ask Robin Ure to hunt the fox on Craig Caillach—ay, ay; but Heaven sends me the power to keep him. And I would keep you too; for you are one half o' my treasure of dust. There! there! Will you do as I have warned you, or will ye dree the weired that mun surely come!"

Murdoch looked eagerly into the water, but his gaze discovered nothing, except a dark spot upon its surface, caused by the shadow from one of the sharp cliffs as it deepened in the increasing twilight.

"Well, well, Mari dear," answered he at last, "there is nothing but the figure of the craig—there is surely nothing to frighten you in a rock near which you have lived all your life. And if I do wile your father to the fox-hunt the morn, he kens all the wild places in the corriower well to make it a dangerous chase to him."

Mari made a movement of impatience, and exclaimed hastily, and as it seemed angrily.

"Ah! dull dark eye-balls—clogged with worldly wisdom—see you not that withered cluster of beechen leaves that floats upon the burn—there is blood in its track, and it has lodged in the shadow of the Devil's Dyke. See!—see!—it shivers and trembles, and the water gurgles under it. Blood—blood and brains!—God be with us, Murdoch!—one o' ye will find his last chase on you crag to-morrow. Come—come!"

The unfortunate young prophetess, overcome by the terrible frenzy of her vision, staggered backwards, and fell into the arms of the terrified and compassionate shepherd.

Murdoch's blood ran cold at the mysterious language of the excited creature before him. That he had sought the cottage of Glenshee for the express purpose of persuading Robin to join in the sport to which she had alluded was true; but it was equally certain that no living thing had as yet been apprised of that intention; and the information of Mari must have been conveyed by a channel which Murdoch was too genuine a Highlander to contemplate without a shudder. He carried his unconscious burthen to her home, and committed her to the mournful and anxious attendance of Elspeth, who found a ready solution to the riddle of Murdoch's scared and solemn looks in the situation of the poor little sufferer, whom he loved, as she well knew, like a sister, and whom he had but seldom before seen in the paroxysms of her disease. Robin was from home far over the mountain, and although the good wife was in hourly expectation of his return yet Murdoch was not to be prevailed upon to wait for him, but avowed his intention of returning straight to his home, as the business which brought him to the glen was not of so pressing a nature as to demand his longer sojourn. He satisfied himself, accordingly, that the hour of Robin's return from a toilsome trudge over the hill would place his accidental attendance on the fox-chase out of the question; and having so secured the safety of the old man from the perils which threatened him, he availed himself of the good wife's proffered repast of cheese and bannock's and once more retraced his steps down the side of the lake, forbearing, from motives which may be traced to the sensitiveness of the superstitious, to lighten the load that weighed him down with its mystery by imparting any portion of it to the maternal heart of Elspeth.

A fox-chase over the giant hills, cliffs, and crags of the Highlands is, no doubt, a piece of amusement that may prove somewhat startling to the ear of a southern sportsman; but when the hunt is described as performed on foot, and for the sole purpose of exterminating the creature, which the sheep-farmer finds so inimical to the interests of his fold, the practicability of the exploit may be admitted, though the perils attending it continue as before; for they who have had an opportunity of seeing the stout and fearless agility with which the young Highlander springs from crag to crag after his prey, or follows the hounds down the shelving sides of scaur and corrie, will confess that the chamois is won through scarcely superior hazard. Accordingly, Mari's prediction of danger to the hunters on that rugged and most dangerous promontory of the mountain called the Devil's Dyke was by no means chimerical, as Murdoch with all his strength of limb and nerve, acknowledged; and he waited in considerable anxiety the reports of the chase throughout the early part of the morning that followed its occurrence. It was not long that his suspense continued; for before noontide a gilly from the other side of the hill came over to tell him that Angus Bane had slid from the uppermost pinnacle of the crag, and dashed his head to atoms among the rocks at the foot of the corrie called the Devil's Stair, and to bid Murdoch come over to his funeral on the day following.

A thoughtful and an awe-stricken man was Murdoch that evening, as he once more took his solitary way over the path that led him to Glenshee. His blood curdled in his veins as he considered the verification of Mari's prophecy, with the natural timidity which, even among the most steady believers in the supernatural, fails not to assail them on any immediate experience of its effects. He longed to be himself the first to communicate to the girl the fulfilment of her wild prediction, partly because he wished to judge of her faith in her own powers by her manner of receiving it, and partly because he was apprehensive of evil consequences, should she hear of the accident from a less heedful informant. His heart beat quickly as he passed the scene of his last night's adventure, and he asked himself if it were possible that a frame so feeble could struggle long with such fierce emotions as he had witnessed there; and, as the question arose, he involuntarily quickened his pace, as if in anxiety to learn the well-being of the unfortunate Mari. The shadows had deepened as he sped along, and before Murdoch had crossed the burn, its surface was dimmed by the descending night; but a bright spark glowed from the cottage window, and the wayfarer strode forward enlivened, and almost reassured, by the picture his fancy presented of the snug group, and the warm welcome which awaited him. His visions, were interrupted; for before he crossed the threshold the door was open, and a figure closely muffled, which he, nevertheless, recognized to be Mari, stepped out into the darkness. He drew aside for an instant to watch her motions, half afraid to cross the young prophetess for the second time by his presence, and yet determined, if possible, to prevent so dismal a triumph of her disease as that to which he had been witness on the previous night. He was concealed under the hazel bushes as she passed, but her garments touched him, and from within the folds of her plaid he heard a loud sob and pining sound, that convinced him she was weeping bitterly, and there was something in the natural and familiar evidence of such suffering which transformed the afflicted being before him from an object of dread and horror to one of sympathy and compassion.

"Is it you, Mari dear?" said he, in a gentle voice, and walking up to her from behind. "What's takin' you at this time o' night, an' the sky sae dark an' the wind sae snell as it is e'en now? Surely the beasts are a' closed in by this time; an' your mother could ha'e nae bit errand to tak' ye doon the loch side after gloaming. Come your ways hame again, dearie, and leave that silly moon to look frae behind the clouds at her ain white face in the water, an' ye shall see her some other night, when there is nae wind to drive the black curtain ower, an' to cut ye through as this does."

The girl turned round to him at once, and answered in a plaintive and sorrowful tone as she withdrew the screen from her face.

"Is it you, Murdoch? I am thankful to God for sending you to me. I would have had a cold walk over Ben Shee if you had not come."

"Ben Shee!" repeated the Shepherd. "Was it over Ben Shee that you were bound, Mari, and in search o' me? What can I do for you? Tell me that. I'll do it, whatever it may be," and he drew her towards him, and wrapped the sheltering plaid round her shivering frame, while she continued to weep piteously, and clung to his strong arm, as if in entreaty.

"Promise me one thing, Murdoch of Ben Shee—promise me," said she, in a paroxysm of anxiety—"promise, as you would on a dying bed, one thing that I shall ask you; if you refuse, it will bring me to the grave. Old Robin Ure, my father, the kindest of fathers, and the wisest and the best, he that would not break one of the least of the commands of God's nor teach others to disregard them, has refused me, and the sin shall be upon his head, and the suffering upon mine. Promise me that you will be less headstrong, Murdoch, and that you will add your words to mine, that we may move the old man from his purpose; promise that you will not attend the funeral of Angus Bane."

TO BE CONCLUDED NEXT WEEK.

THE MAHOMEDAN CREED.

Mr. Hoffman—In your last paper, I read with interest, an article on the subject of this Impostor. If the following account of the absurdities of the Mahomedan Faith, which I have taken the trouble to condense, from the best authorities, will interest your readers, I shall conceive myself richly repaid for my trouble.

That both Mahomet, and those among his followers who are reckoned orthodox, had and continued to have just and true notions of God and his attributes, appears so plain from the Koran itself, and all the Mahometan divines, that it would be loss of time to refute those who suppose the God of Mahomet to be different from the true God, and only a fictitious deity or idol of his own creation.

The existence of angels and their purity, are absolutely required to be believed in the Koran; and he is reckoned an infidel who denies there are such beings, or hates any of them, or asserts any distinction of sexes among them. They believe them to have pure and subtle bodies, created of fire; that they neither eat nor drink, nor propagate their species; that they have various forms and offices, some adoring God in different postures, others singing praises to him, or interceding for mankind. They hold, that some of them are employed in writing down the actions of men; others in carrying the throne of God, and other services.

As to the Scriptures, the Mahometans are taught by the Koran, that God, in divers ages of the world, gave revelations of his will in writing to several prophets, the whole and every one of which it is absolutely necessary for a good Moslem to believe. The number of these sacred books were, according to them, one hundred and four; of which ten were given to Adam, fifty to Seth, thirty to Edris or Enoch, ten to Abraham; and the other four, being the Pentateuch, the Psalms, the Gospel, and the Koran, were successively delivered to Moses, David, Jesus and Mahomet; which last being the seal of the prophets, those revelations are now closed, and no more are to be expected.

The number of the prophets which have been from time to time sent by God into the world, amounts to no less than 224,000, according to one Mahometan tradition; or to 124,000, according to another; among whom 313 were apostles, sent with special commissions to reclaim mankind from infidelity and superstition; and six of them brought new laws or dispensations, which successively abrogated the preceeding: these were Adam, Noah, Abraham, Moses, Jesus and Mahomet.

The time of the resurrection the Mahometans allow to be a perfect secret to all but God alone; the angel Gabriel himself acknowledging his ignorance in this point, when Mahomet asked him about it. However, they say, the approach of that day may be known from certain signs which are to precede it.

As to the punishment of the wicked, the Mahometans are taught, that hell is divided into seven stories or apartments, one below another, designed for the reception of as many distinct classes of the damned.

Mahomet has, in his Koran and traditions, been very exact in describing the various torments of hell, which according to him, the wicked will suffer both from intense heat and excessive cold.

The righteous, as the Mahometans are taught to believe, having surmounted the difficulties, and passed the sharp bridge above-mentioned, before they enter Paradise, will be refreshed by drinking at the pond of their prophet, who describes it to be an exact square, of a month's journey in compass; its water, which is supplied by two pipes from al Cawthay, one of the rivers of Paradise, being whiter than milk or silver, and more odoriferous than musk, with as many cups set around it as there are stars in the firmament; of which water whoever drinks will thirst no more for ever. This is the first taste which the blessed will have of their future and now near approaching felicity.

Though Paradise be so very frequently mentioned in the Koran, yet it is a dispute among the Mohometans, whether it be already created or to be created hereafter.

They say it is situated above the seven heavens, (or in the seventh heaven,) and next under the throne of God; and, to express the amenity of the place, tell us, that the earth of it is of the finest wheat-flour, or of the purest musk, or as others will have it, of saffron; that its stones are pearls and jacinths, the walls of its building enriched with gold and silver, and that the trunks of all its trees are of gold; among which the most remarkable is the tree called tuba, or the tree of happiness. Concerning this tree, they fable, that it stands in the palace of Mahomet though a branch of it will reach to the house of every true believer; that it will be laden with pomegranates, grapes, dates, and other fruits, of surprising bigness, and of tastes unknown to mortals. So that if a man desire to eat of any particular kind of fruit, it will immediately be presented him; or, if he choose flesh, birds ready dressed will be set before him, according to his wish. They add, that the boughs of this tree will spontaneously bend down to the hand of the person who would gather of its fruits, and that it will supply the blessed not only with food, but also with silken garments, and beasts to ride on ready saddled and bridled, and adorned with rich trappings, which will burst forth from its fruits; and that this tree is so large, that a person mounted on the fleetest horse, would not be able to gallop from one end of its shade to the other in one hundred years.

But all these glories will be eclipsed by the resplendent and ravishing girls of Paradise, called, from their large black eyes, Hur al oyun, the enjoyment of whose company will be a principal felicity of the faithful.—

These, they say, are created not of clay, as mortal women are, but of pure musk; being as their prophet often affirms in his Koran, free from all natural impurities, defects, and inconveniences incident to the sex; of the strictest modesty, and secluded from public view in pavillions of hollow pearls, so large, that, as some traditions have it, one of them will be no less than four parasangs (or, as others say, sixty miles) long, and as many broad.

God's absolute decree and predestination both of good and evil. The orthodox doctrine is, that whatever hath or shall come to pass in this world, whether it be good, or whether it be bad, proceedeth entirely from the divine will, and is irrevocably fixed and recorded from all eternity in the preserved table; God having secretly predetermined not only the adverse and prosperous fortune of every person in this world, in the most minute particulars, but also his faith or infidelity, his obedience or disobedience, and consequently his everlasting happiness or misery after death; which fate or predestination it is not possible by any foresight or wisdom to avoid.

Religious practice. The first point is prayer, under which are also comprehended those legal washings or purifications which are necessary preparations thereto.

Fasting is a duty of so great moment, that Mahomet used to say it was the gate of religion; and that the odour of the mouth of him who fasteth is more grateful to God than that of musk.

The pilgrimage to Mecca is so necessary a point of practice, that, according to a tradition of Mahomet, he who dies without performing it, may as well die a Jew or a Christian; and the same is expressly commanded in the Koran.

AMERICAN MASONIC REGISTER.

ALBANY, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 21, 1839.

The Editor of the Canajoharie Radii, who is a mute, proposes publishing a Mute's Almanac, which is to be ready for sale in about two weeks.

The following gentlemen have kindly offered to act as our Agents, in receiving subscriptions and monies, on account of the Register, in the vicinities in which they reside:

Br. S. C. Legget, Troy.
 " Abel Whipple, Lansingburgh.
 " Joel D. Smith, Castleton, Rens. Co.
 " Cornelius Hovey, Watervliet.
 " Blanchard Powers, Bennington, Genesee Co.
 " James Cavanagh, Watertown, Jeff. Co.
 " James Tefft, Coeymans.
 " Talmage Fairchild, Coxakie, Greene Co.

To Correspondents.—What has become of Triptolomous Tindall, z. z. His strictures were well received, and we should like to hear from him again.

Philothorus, has been received, but at too late an hour for to-day's paper. His subject, we must confess is a queer one. We like the structure of his verse, and think the interest would be heightened, by dropping one or two stanzas.

The "Tale of Slander," commenced in our first No. is from the pen of a young lady, residing two hundred miles from here. We have received the second part, but as it is yet unfinished, we have concluded to wait for the remainder, before publishing it, which will probably be the next week.

We have several other communications on hand, which were undoubtedly dug from the ruins of Pompeii, or some other classic place. We shall insert them as soon as they can be translated. If Dr. Mitchell was living, they would hold an enviable place among his curiosities. Foster would frame them as unique specimens of chirography. How unfortunate it is, that writing a readable hand, is considered so vulgar now-a-days.

City Improvements.—We rejoice to see so many parts of our city rapidly changing from their before neglected, and in some instances, dismal appearance to those of comfort and elegance. The improvements, Mr. McIntyre, one of our most enterprising citizens is making in the vicinity of Pearl street, are alike creditable to himself and the city. The old-elm, corner of State and Pearl must feel gladness of heart, as he reflects upon the difference between the scenes that surround him now and those of former years. Truly the originators of that improvement deserve the thanks of all who chance that way. The new Sate House, Exchange and several buildings about being completed, are monuments of enterprise and taste, that will not soon pass away. We look upon our city as being possessed of the right spirit in reference to all her public works. She seems to begin them not with the mere thought for the present, to answer temporary purposes; but the future—"the bright the glorious future"—seems to share her consideration.

The Annuals.—Many of the annuals for the coming year have already been received by Mr. Little of this city. To say that they are equal to those of any former year, would be but a poor compliment. We have never looked at a better collection, both for mechanical skill and literary merit. Those of American origin are not inferior in either of these points to those of English origin. The engravings are by the best artists, giving stronger indications of a spirit that will not stop this side of perfection. The articles, both poetic and prose, defy criticism; not because they "smell of the lamp," or were written in the attic, but because they claim their parentage in the nobility of mind. Among all of them we notice one in particular viz: "American Poets" by John M. Keese. This should be preferred above all the rest, principally because it is a plant of indigenous growth. We have too long neglected our own parterre to cull the sweets from exotic plants. Now that a work has made its appearance purely American both in its literature and pictorial embellishments, let us patronize it to the utmost of our abilities. It is as proper an annual for the drawing room, as those which come recommended by and dedicated to princes and kings. Let us show our republicanism by encouraging the products of republican soil.

There is an occasional bright spot in the cares and perplexities, incidental to the labors of the "craft"—we mean the type craft this time. Br. — of Watertown, to whom we sent our first No. and a prospectus, writes us,—"I think the whole fraternity feel the necessity of your paper, and I believe it is deservedly appreciated. Please send twelve copies to the following brethren. I think you may expect many more subscriptions from this section, which I will forward. If every br. to whom we have sent a prospectus, will feel the necessity of having a paper, devoted to the interests of the Order—and then feel the kindred necessity of going and doing likewise, a fraternal communication can be established as in by-gone days. Our brethren must be aware of the difficulties we are compelled to labor under, in the present peculiar state of things, in the apathy of some, and the prejudices of others. We therefore look to those who have not forgotten their "first love," to make a little extra exertion, and the thing is accomplished. Light is dawning in the East.

Riding a Horseback.—We perceive, with much pleasure, this amusement is fast becoming fashionable. Hardly a day passes but that parties of ladies and gentlemen make their way to the environs of our city, enjoying this healthful exercise. We shall hazard no part of our reputation as prophets, by predicting for those who pursue this delightful sport, ruddy cheeks, and spirits as free as the air around them.

The Guitar.—We listened, and with great satisfaction, a few evenings since, to the performance of Mr. Ricci, upon the guitar. He intends becoming a permanent resident of Albany, and we feel assured all amateurs upon this favorite instrument, will not neglect this opportunity of acquiring a perfect knowledge of it. Mr. Ricci, beside having had a natural fondness for his art, has had the advantage of the best instruction, Italy, his native land, could afford.

* * The article on our first page, entitled "Objections to Masonry, Answered," we particularly commend to the perusal of those of our readers, who are not Masons. It answers the various objections, which have been from time to time strongly urged against the order, in an argumentative and candid manner. It asks for the institution, only what its friends claim for it, and fairly meets the prejudices which the fraternity have been compelled to sit under so long.

INTELLIGENCE.

THE LATE LADY FLORA HASTINGS

The following touching letter was written by Lady Flora Hastings, and addressed to her uncle, and by him recently made public. Its publication caused considerable sensation:

From the Lady Flora Eliz. Hastings to Hamilton Fitzgerald, esq.

Buckingham palace, March 8, 1839.

My Dear Uncle—Knowing what a very good natured place Brussels is, I have not a hope that you have not already heard a story with which I am told London is ringing; but you shall at all events have from my own pen the account of the diabolical conspiracy from which it has pleased God to preserve the Duchess of Kent and myself; for that it was intended to ruin the whole concern, though I was to be the first victim, I have no more doubt than that a certain foreign lady, whose hatred to the Duchess is no secret, pulled the wires, though it has not been brought home to her yet.

I told you I was ill when I came to town having been suffering for some weeks from bilious derangement, with its disagreeable accompaniments, pain in the side and swelling of the stomach. I placed myself immediately under the care of Sir Jas. Clark, who being physician to the Dutchess as well as to the Queen, was the natural person to consult. Unfortunately, he either did not pay much attention to my ailments, or did not understand them, for in spite of his medicines the bile did not take its departure. However, by dint of walking and porter I gained a little strength; and, as I did so, the swelling subsided to a very remarkable degree. You may therefore, guess my indignant surprise, when, about a fortnight since, Sir James came to my room, and announced to me the conviction of the ladies of the palace I must be privately married, or at least, ought to be so; a conviction into which I found him completely talked over. In answer to all his exhortations to confessions, "as the only means of saving my character," I returned, as you may believe, an indignant but steady denial that there was any thing to confess.—Upon which he told me that nothing but my submitting to a medical examination would ever satisfy them and remove the stigma from my name.

I found the subject had been brought before the Queen's notice; and all this had been discussed, and arranged, and denounced to me, without one word having been said to my own mistress, one suspicion hinted, or her sanction obtained for their proposing such a thing to me. From me Sir James went to the Dutchess, and announced his conviction that I was in the family way, and was followed by Lady Portman, who conveyed a message from her majesty to her mother, to say that the Queen would not permit me to appear till the examination had decided matters. Lady Portman (who and, you will grieve to hear, Lady Tavistock, are those whose names are mentioned as most active against me) took the opportunity of distinctly expressing her conviction of my guilt. My beloved mistress who never for one moment doubted me, told them she knew me and my principles, and my family, too well to listen to such a charge. However, the edict was given. The next day, having obtained the Dutchess's very reluctant consent, for she could not bear the idea of my being exposed to such a humiliation. (but I felt it right to her, and to my family and myself, that a point blank refutation should be instantly given to the lie) I submitted myself to the most rigid examination, and I have the satisfaction of possessing a certificate signed by my accuser, Sir James Clark, and also by Sir Charles Clark, stating as strongly as language can state it, that "there are no grounds for believing that pregnancy does exist, or ever has existed."

I wrote to my brother, who, though suffering from influenza, came up instantly. It would be too long to attempt to detail all his proceeding, but nothing could be more manly, spirited, and judicious than his conduct. He exacted and obtained from Lord Melbourne a distinct disavowal of his participation in the plot, and would not leave town until he had obtained an audience of the Queen, at which, while distinctly disclaimed his belief of any wish on the part of her majesty to injure me, he very plainly, but respectfully, stated his opinions of those who had counselled her, and his resolution to find out the originator of the slander, and bring him or her to punishment.

I am quite sure the Queen does not understand what they betrayed her into. She has endeavored to show her regret by her civility to me, and expressed it handsomely with tears in her eyes. The Duchess was perfect: A mother could not have been kinder, and took up the insult as a personal one, directed as it was at a person attached to her service, and devoted to her. She immediately dismissed Sir James Clark and refused to see Lady Portman, and would neither re-appear nor suffer me to re-appear at the Queen's table for many days—She has crowned her goodness by a most beautiful letter she has written to poor mamma, whom the accounts, kept from her while there was a hope that matters might not become public, would reach to day. I am told there is but one feeling, as respects me—sympathy for the insult offered to one whose very name should have been a protection to her, and that in many places the feeling is loudly expressed that a public reparation should have been offered me by the dismissal of the slanderers. This does not however, appear to be the view of ministers; and as personally I wish for no revenge on those who have insulted me, I cannot say I much regret it, though I doubt whether they are quite judicious as respect the general feeling. As respects parliamentary majorities they are, with regard to the ladies—And poor Clark, who has been the woman's tool, could hardly be sacrificed alone.

The Dutchess has stood by me gallantly, and I love her better than ever. She is the most generous-souled woman possible; and such a heart! This business made her very ill. It shattered me, too, very much, and I am wretchedly thin; but under Dr. Chamber's good management, I am getting round and hope soon to be well. Hasting says he has not yet done with the business, nor ever will while there is left to sift.

Good bye my good uncle; I blush to send you so revolting a tale, but I wish you to know the truth—the whole truth, and nothing but the truth—and you are welcome to it right and left.

You affectionate niece,

FLORA ELIZABETH HASTINGS.

To Hamilton Fitzgerald, Esq.
17 Rue de Namur, Brussels.

THE WHEAT CROP WEST.—The Michigan City Register says, in Le Porte county, as a general thing, wheat has averaged 40 bushels to the acre, and better cannot be found. A similar yield, we learn, has rewarded the labor of the husbandman in Wisconsin, but owing to the great scarcity of field hands, a vast deal will remain unharvested. In some parts of the country they are able to cut the grain, but having no barns to store it in, or conveniences for thrashing it out and getting it to market, have stacked it on the field. Buffalo Journal.

A large Beet.—Messrs. D. and J. Edwards, of Genesee, Allegany county, have now growing in their Garden a Seed Beet, of the common red or blood species, 9½ feet high.

Census of Utica.—Eleven thousand six hundred and ninety four, being an increase of about three per cent. per annum, since the census of 1835.

Hudson River Improvements.—The Schooner Hannibal, Capt. Newberry, from York River, Virginia, with 156 tons coal, and drawing nine feet water, came up yesterday without hindrance at the Overslaugh.—We now begin to realize the benefits of unobstructed navigation. The results must be truly gratifying to early and steady friends of this important improvement. —Journal.

Casualty.—The Jefferson, steam packet, came in this morning. We are informed that the wife of a Methodist Preacher jumped over board last night, about midnight two miles west of Dunkirk, and was drowned. Her husband and an infant about 9 months old were on board at the time. She was evidently laboring under aberration of mind. —Buffalo Com. Adv.

Two large arrivals of flour and wheat this morning. The schooner Franklin, Martin, master, brings 2227 bushels wheat, and 678 barrels flour from St. Josephs, Michigan, and the Harve, has 4358 bushels wheat 310 barrels flour and 30 barrels corn from Cleveland. The cargo of the Harve is of the new crop. —Buffalo Adv.

Big Business.—We learn from the Picayune, that a man named Staples alias Dickens, has been arrested in that city, with forged drafts about him to the amount of $6000. He had also forged letters of recommendation and credit. Booked for the Criminal Court.

The New York Commercial Advertiser states that the Rev. Dr. Kirk, of this city, who recently returned from Europe in the Great Western, has received a call to be the pastor of the congregation worshipping in "Lady Huntington's Chapel in Spa Fields," London, to which he has not yet given a definite answer.

Pedomotive Carriage.—A Mr. Merryweather, of England, has invented a carriage to be propelled by the hands and feet of the persons using it, on a level road, has travelled a mile in three minutes! The machine can, it is said, be comfortably worked at the rate of eight miles an hour by one person on a common road. There are three wheels, the two behind six feet in diameter, with a tripple or three crow crank axle, beneath which are pedals to be worked by the feet.

The cause of ladies' teeth decaying at so much earlier a stage of life than those of the other sex, is attributed to the great friction of the tongue upon them. —Exchange Paper.

A ladies' man of our acquaintance demurs to this theory altogether. He says it is entirely owing to the sweetness of their lips, as it is a fact established by every body's say so, that sweet things rot the teeth. —Hartford Courier.

Feminism.—A Mrs. Van Buren, of Canajoharie, N. Y., having suffered from a decline of health, was about two weeks since so terrified by a clap of thunder that she refused to take any sustenance. She fancied that the Lord had spoken to her and commanded her never to eat or drink more. After lingering for fifteen days, she died.

Shocking Death.—Samuel Wildrick, a steady, industrious young man, at the time engaged on the Auburn and Syracuse Railroad as a collector, was killed on Friday evening last, at the rail road depot in this village, by being caught between one of the cars and a door post as the train was leaving for Auburn. He attempting to get into the car. He expired in about 20 minutes during which time he was wholly insensible. We believe he had saved several hundred dollars from his earnings in this vicinity. —Onondaga Standard.

DEATH OF MATHEW CAREY.

We announce with sincere regret the death of Mathew Carey. A few days ago Mr. Carey was thrown from his carriage, receiving a contusion of the head and being otherwise hurt. It was believed that his injuries were by no means serious, but they may have aggravated an intermittent fever which proved the cause of his death. Mr. Carey was in his eightieth year. A native of Ireland, he came to this country during the last century and was engaged for many years as a printer and publisher, in which professions he realized an ample fortune. During his business life, but particularly since his retirement, Mr. Carey was actively employed in philanthropic pursuits. With a clear intellect, a sound education, a disposition to seek out objects of reform and amelioration in society, and the energy to carry out approved means, he possessed also the unbounded liberality which is the purest evidence of sincerity and soul of success.

As a writer he is remarkable for the concise array of facts which are brought to sustain his opinions. In questions of political economy Mr. Carey always evinced a deep interest, and even those who dispute his position must admit the ability and candor with which he maintained them. His latest writings, produced within the last two months are a series of papers entitled the 'Querist,' concerning the cotton trade, evincing industrious research and a mind unimpaired by the lapse of four score years. The attention of Mr. Carey was also directed to plans of public education and various means of elevating the condition of the laboring classes. His exertions in favor of indigent women were unremitting, and it is believed that in this city they were attended with gratifying changes in the condition of that unfortunate class.

We cannot at this moment present a biographical sketch of Mr. Carey or attempt to do justice to his memory. His name is familiar in this country and in Europe as a firm supporter of rational liberty, and a sufferer in its cause. Through a long life he devoted his energies with unquenchable enthusiasm to great and good purposes. His purse was as open for them as his counsel. In the death of Mathew Carey, the cause of sound republicanism has lost an advocate, the poor a benefactor, the oppressed a patron, and society a friend.

Physical infirmity limited the sphere of his personal exertions, but the scope of his benevolent desires reached the farthest verge of enlightened philanthropy. —National Gazette.

SERENADE.

Let me break thy gentle slumber,
Arbitress of all I feel—
Let my lute's devoted number
Within thy waking bosom steal!
It will tell of each emotion,
That the lip must fail to speak;
How the heart may feel devotion,
Though, like gems within the ocean,
Hidden from the owner's cheek.

List, oh, listen to its story,
Or I sink in fond distress—
With thy beauty bending o'er me,
Let me die in love's excess!
Can there be pain in dying,
If 'tis looked upon by thee?
No! each thought within me vying,
Tells the luxury of sighing,
And how sweet a pain may be.

Luna's silver rays soft glancing
Through the lattice, woo thee now;
Conscious breezes there are dancing,
Perfumed sweet, to kiss thy brow.
Rise, then, dear one—lo, the brighten
Tells thy hallowed form is near—
Purer than the marble's whiteness,
Shedding love's own gleam of lightness—
Dearest, let me linger there.

GOD—A POEM.

Translated from the Russian of Derzaviny by Mr. Bowring. It has been translated into Japanese, by order of the emperor, and is hung up, embroidered with gold, in the Temple of Jeddo. It has also been translated into the Chinese and Tartar languages, written on a piece of rich silk, and hung up in the imperial palace at Pekin.

O thou eternal One! whose presence bright
All space doth occupy, all motion guide,
Unchang'd through time's all-devastating flight:
Thou only God! there is no God beside!
Being above all beings! Mighty One!
Whom none can comprehend, and none explore;
Who fill'st existence with Thyself alone:
Embracing all—supporting—ruling o'er—
Being whom we call God—and know no more!

In its sublime research, philosophy
May measure out the ocean-deep—may count
The sands, or the sun's rays—but God! for Thee
There is no weight nor measure none can mount
Up to Thy mysteries; Reason's brightest spark,
Though kindled by Thy light, in vain would try
To trace Thy counsels, infinite and dark:
And thought is lost ere thought can soar so high,
Even like past moments in eternity.

Thou from primeval nothingness didst call
First chaos, then existence—Lord! on Thee
Eternity had its foundation—all
Sprung forth from Thee—of light, joy, harmony,
Sole origin—all life, all beauty Thine:
Thy word created all, and doth create,
Thy splendor fills all space with rays divine.
Thou art, and wert, and shalt be! Glorious, Great Light-giving, life-sustaining Potentate!

Thy chains the unmeasur'd universe surround—
Upheld by Thee, by Thee inspir'd with breath!
Thou the beginning with the end hast bound,
And beautifully mingled life and death!
As sparks mount upwards from the fiery blaze,
So suns are born, so worlds spring forth from Thee
And as the spangles in the sunny rays
Shine round the silver snow, the pageantry
Of heaven's bright army glitters in Thy praise.

A million torches, lighted by Thy hand,
Wander unwearied through the blue abyss;
They own Thy power, accomplish Thy command,
All gay with life, all eloquent with bliss.
What shall we call them? Piles of crystal light—
A glorious company of golden streams—

Lamps of celestial ether burning bright—
Suns lighting systems with their joyous beams!
But Thou to these art as the noon to night.

Yes! as a drop of water in the sea,
Yll this magnificence in Thee is lost.
What are ten thousand worlds compared to Thee
And what am I then? Heaven's unnumber'd host,
'Though multiplied by myriads, and arrayed
In all the glory of sublimest thought,
Is but an atom in the ballance weigh'd
Against Thy greatness, is a cypher brought Against infinity! What am I then? Naught!

Naught! But the effluence of Thy light divine,
Pervading worlds, hath reach'd my bosom too;
Yes! In my spirit doth Thy spirit shine,
As shines the sunbeam in a drop of dew.
Naught! But I live, and on hope's pinions fly
Eager towards Thy presence; for in Thee
I live, and breath, and dwell; aspiring high,
Even to the throne of Thy divinity,
I am, O God! and surely Thou must be!

Thou art! directing, guiding all, Thou art!
Direct my understanding then to Thee:
Controul my spirit, guide my wandering heart;
Though but an atom 'midst immensity,
Still I am something, fashion'd by Thy hand!
I hold a middle rank 'twixt heaven and earth,
On the last verge of mortal being stand,
Close to the realms where angles have their birth,
Just on the boundaries of the spirit-land!

The chain of being is complete in me;
In me is matter's last gradation lost,
And the next step is spirit—Deity!
I can command the lightning, and am dust!
A monarch, and a slave; a worm, a god!
Whence came I here, and how? so marvellously
Constructed, and conceived? Unknown! This clod
Lives surely through some higher energy;
For from itself alone it could not be!

Creator, yes! Thy wisdom and Thy word
Created me! Thou source of life and good!
Thou spirit of my spirit, and my lord!
Thy light, Thy love, in their bright plenitude,
Fill'd me with an immortal soul, to spring
O'er the abyss of death, and bid it wear
The garments of eternal day, and wing
Its heavenly flight beyond this little sphere,
Ev'n to its source—to Thee—its Author there.

O thoughts ineffable! O visions bless'd!
Though worthless our conceptions all of Thee,
Yet shall Thy shadow'd image fill our breast,
And waft its homage to Thy Diety.
God! thus alone my lowly thoughts can soar;
Thus seek thy presence—Being wise and good!
'Midst Thy vast works admire, obey, adore;
And when the tongue is eloquent no more,
The soul shall speak in tears of gratitude.

MASONIC ODE.

"Let there be light!" th' Almighty spoke!
Refulgent streams from Chaos broke,
To illumine the rising earth!
Well pleas'd, the great Jehovah stood,
The Power supreme pronounc'd it good,
And gave the planets birth.
In choral numbers Masons join.
And bless and praise this light divine.

Parent of Light! accept of praise!
Who shed'st on us thy brightest rays.
The light that fills the mind;
By choice selected, lo! we stand
By friendship, a social band,
That love—that aid mankind.
In choral numbers, &c.

The widow's tear—the orphan's cry—
All wants, our ready hands supply,
As far as power is given;
The naked clothe, the prisoner free;
These are thy works sweet Charity.
Reveal'd to us from heav'n!
In choral numbers, &c.

WOMAN.

Ah, woman! in this world of ours.
What gift can be compared to thee?
How slow would drag life's weary hours,
Though man's proud brow were deck'd with flowers,
And his wealth of land and sea,
If still ordained to breathe alone,
And ne'er call woman's heart his own.

My mother!—at that holy name,
Within my bosom there's a gush
Of feeling, which no time can tame,
A feeling, which for years of fame,
I would not—could not hush.
And sisters, they are dear as life,
But when I look upon my wife
My life's blood gives a sudden rush,
And all my fond affections blend
In Mother, Sisters, Wife and Friend.

Yes!—woman's love is free from guile,
And pure, as bright Aurora's ray
The heart will melt before its smile
And earthly passions fade away.
Were I the monarch of the earth,
Or master of the swelling sea,
I would not estimate their worth,
Dear woman—half the price of thee!

MASONIC.

From the Olive Branch:

OBJECTIONS TO MASONRY—ANSWERED. [CONCLUDED.]

In this particular our Institution presents a conspicuous exception to all others, of whatever origin or date. The propagation of the Christian religion, and the numerous and fierce contests among its different sects, have been stained with many crimes, and much bloodshed. Witness the thousands who were sacrificed in the Crusades; the horrors of the Inquisition; the scenes in India and South America; the persecutions of heretics in all countries the condition of the Huguenots in France—of the reformers in Germany—of the Puritans in England and Scotland—of the Catholics in Ireland—and of the different dissenters in every country—together with the consequent scenes of discord, crime and blood! But all these do not affect the truth, and purity, and beauty of the religion of Christ. These, and a thousand times as many, could not take away from, the sincere Christian that hope which forms his only reliance in futurity, and his greatest consolation in the hour of death. Would it be fair, then, to allow a single outrage, and that of a questionable nature, to overbalance centuries of peacefulness, and usefulness, and kindness and brotherly love? Is it just to visit the sins of a very diminutive portion of any community upon the whole; and with unrelenting, and unforgiving cruelty, "shut the gates of mercy" upon all—even those who disavow it?—and that too, against a community, the annals of existence cannot show another stain upon their character! Would it not be contrary to the requisitions of whose Christian charity—that charity which "suffereth long and is kind"—to condemn many thousands of worthy, enlightened, useful and pious citizens, all over the world, for a single crime of a few obscure individuals in the State of New York? and that even when they blame the rashness of the act as much as others. Instead of forgiving our brother "seventy times seven" offences, this would be denying him forgiveness even for one.

The savage, in the exercise of that revenge which has been taught him as the greatest virtue, retaliates indiscriminately on any of the kind of him from whom he has received an injury; but no one is condemned, in any civilized country, till he has been first accused, and put upon his defence, and then convicted.

The ferment which was excited against Masonry a few years past has been since continued for political purposes; and I have no doubt that many honest men have engaged in the opposition, who, if they would allow themselves to examine impartially in the case, would likely regret that their services had ever been lent to a party whose purposes were so base.

I am far from wishing to dictate to any one, particularly one who is so much better qualified to prescribe rules of conduct for me; one to whose instructions I have frequently attended with pleasure, and from whose advice and example I may yet hope to derive benefit. But so far as I may be allowed to speak of my own feelings, I am free to declare, that if Masonry inculcated any immorality of conduct, or had one individual principle, the practice of which tended to corrupt the mind and feelings, or injure the cause of humanity, civil order, or religion, I would not only renounce it myself, but would use my best exertions towards its entire destruction. I will say further, that although it is an institution in which I live, and expect to die; although I am willing to defend it with my best efforts, with my treasure, and with my blood; if any man can offer one argument which can shake my faith in it, or convince me of its evil tendency, I pledge myself to renounce it forever: and I could safely offer the same pledge for all the members of the Lodge over which I have the honor to preside.

With regard to the book, or books which have been published, purporting to reveal the mysteries of Freemasonry, there can be but one opinion in the minds of all who will give the subject an impartial examination. They are obliged to be, from the nature of the case, but garbled statements, brought forward by the exercise of some evil passion, or some interested feeling. No one can rely upon the authority of a man who in the face of his statement, acknowledges that he has violated a solemn obligation. What is the general impression with regard to the character of a perjured man? Would it not be most preposterous for me to solicit your confidence by gravely telling you that I had just sworn to what I knew to be false—or had violated an oath which I had taken in good faith?

But suppose, for a moment, that the mysteries have been revealed, of what use can they be to the world? or how can they be employed to our prejudice? They who had obtained them in an improper manner would never be certain they had the right, and could never make use of them, even if they had that certainty. They would be exactly in the condition of a person who had got a book he could not decipher, or an instrument of which he could never learn the use.

I have already told you that the mysteries are nothing, when unconnected with the principles, and precepts, and practices to which they lead; and consequently would be entirely useless to those who had obtained them clandestinely. What would be the value of your baptismal ceremonies, your prayers, devotions, and sacraments, if they did not point out to you the way to insure an eternal inheritance in Heaven? If they could be introduced into a community where the objects of religion were entirely unknown, and not explained to them, they would be as useless to them as the Masonic mysteries are to the uninitiated.

I do not wish to draw any invidious or improper comparisons with respect to the holy religion which you profess; but as it is the highest authority to which I can look, I have endeavored to take some examples from it. I have too great a reverence for it, and too high a regard for its worthy professors to say any thing which would indicate a want of proper feeling on the subject.

In one of the addresses which I take the liberty to enclose you, I have said that "Masonry has in all countries, and ages, been intimately connected with the progress of moral improvement." It will be acknowledged by all, that whatever has the effect of assisting man in advancing from his natural state of depravity and sinfulness, towards that moral condition at which he arrives in his highest degree of improvement must be highly beneficial to him, both as an individual, and a member of society. It must also be admitted, and the encouragement of all the social and moral virtues goes very far in preparing him for the reception of the reception of the Christian doctrines. Morality is evidently one step towards Christianity.

In order to prove the tendency which this Institution would have towards the attainment of these ends, we must refer to the principles established for our moral government. In the first place, we have the Holy Bible, which we are taught to regard as the rule and guide of our faith. That great light will direct us to all truth, and point out to us the whole duty of man. We have the Square to teach us morality—the Level equality—and the Plumb rectitude of life—the Rule and Line are to admonish us to press forward in the discharge of our duty, inclining neither to the right nor to the left—the Compasses are emblematically given us, to circumscribe our desire and keep our passions within due bounds, the Circle prescribes the boundary line of our duty towards God and man, beyond which we ought never to allow our passions, our prejudices, or our interests to betray us on any occasion—Bee-hive is to teach us industry, and recommends to us that we should never be contented while our fellow-creatures around us are in want, and it is in our power to relieve them, without injury to ourselves—the Pot of Incense is an emblem of a pure heart, which glows with gratitude to our great Creator for the many blessings he has bestowed upon us—the Hourglass serves to remind us how swiftly our time passes away, and how rapidly our lives are drawing to a close—the Scythe is figurative of time, and assures us that death approaches us all with rapid strides, and has no respect of persons. We have also the Spade and the Coffin, as emblems of mortality, and the Sprig of Evergreen to remind us that we have within us an immortal part which can never die. These last also admonish us, that as this transitory state is uncertain, and at best of short duration, it becomes us to make preparation for that which is to endure forever. The tenets of our Order are Brotherly Love, Relief and truth—and its cardinal virtues are Temperance, Fortitude, Prudence and Justice.

I insist upon it that when these precepts are acted on, according to the spirit and intent of the Institution, so far presenting any thing inimical to religion, or at variance with morality, they would afford a powerful assistance to the progress of both. I pledge myself as a man of truth and moral honesty, that these are the legitimate purposes for which these emblems are designed and that that no figure, character, or emblem is employed in a Lodge, but such as have some moral application, recommending the exercise of some social duty, or forcibly inculcate the practice of virtue. I further assert that it is the indispensable duty of the Master of every Lodge frequently to impress these truths upon the minds of the brethren.

Many of the beneficial tendencies of Masonry I am not at liberty to explain; because they are associated with the secret mysteries, and are to be derived from the particular duties we owe the Order, or the individual members.

Who among us in this happy country can contemplate the glorious events of the Revolution, and the political, civil, and religious liberty we thereby enjoy, without the most sincere gratitude to that Almighty Power, whose agency was so visible in that contest, and at the same time associating with that gratitude the warmest thanks to the human agents employed in it? Let us now inquire whether we are not indebted, in some degree, to the Order of Freemasonry for some of those liberties; and we shall find that without the direct agency of the members of that Institution, which has been so much reviled and scoffed at, and against which the bitterest feelings of human nature are now arrayed, those who are the foremost in calumniating it and would gladly blot it out of existence, would at this moment, have been bowed down by the oppressions of tyranny, and would not have dared to raise their voices in their own defence. This opinion is founded on the fact that all the Generals of the Revolutionary armies, (to say nothing of inferior officers and privates) including the commanders of the French fleets, were members of this Fraternity, except a solitary instance; and that individual would have brought no credit upon any cause, when honor and humanity were concerned, for he became a dishonored man, and a traitor to his country.

If you will allow me again to mention myself I can say that I have enjoyed, perhaps, as good an opportunity of being instructed in the principles of Masonry as any other person you may ever meet with; having taken nine regular degrees, comprehending all that is known of ancient Masonry—been regularly installed Master of three separate Lodges, and admitted to the order of High Priesthood. All these degrees are as familiar to me as the alphabet, including mysteries, ceremonies, precepts, duties, lectures and charges. I state this to you, not for the purpose of boasting of my proficiency, but to prove that I have the means of forming correct estimate of the value of the Institution—so far as my judgment will go—of its tendency when applied to the different relations of life, and the moral influence it is calculated to exert under all circumstances. And I declare to you in the honesty of my heart, that there is not a single precept or principle in the whole, which would be unworthy of the Christian character, or which might not, with great propriety, be inculcated from the sacred pulpit. Were you in possession of the same means of judging, I feel assured that you would be as far from offering any injury to Freemasonry as I am, at this moment, from interfering with the spread of the holy religion which you profess.

This communication is not intended as a challenge, for yourself or any other person, to enter into controversy or argument on this subject; for that, as you must see, I would be bound to decline. But I offer it in that spirit of conciliation and friendship, which I hope always to entertain towards yourself, and all others for whose private virtues and public usefulness I entertain so high a regard. I offer it as a solicitation that, before you allow your feelings to be poisoned against an Institution which never has injured, and never wished to injure the cause of religion and its professors—an Institution of which I am a member, and the unworthy representative in this place, you would examine for yourself the evidences as well for as against it, "Audi alteram partem" is a maxim which charity would recommend, and which I am sure your own candor and liberality would approve. This is all I can ask—all I wish. We do not solicit the countenance, support or protection of any body; we do not expect or desire to make proselytes; but the only favor we ask of the world, is to be left alone, to the enjoyment of our peaceful privileges, and unobtrusive exercises. When we interfere with the will, it would be but an act of retributive justice that we should receive the same treatment in return; but before that time, charity would dwell upon the hope that we might be allowed to live in peace. I need not remind you that the Book from which we derive all wisdom, and all truth, recommends to us charity for the failings, as well as the misfortunes of our fellow-creatures, and admonishes us in the most impressive manner, to "judge not."

Your life has been spent in acts of benevolence, and endeavors to render services of vital importance to your fellow-creatures. Your mission is one of charity, and I sincerely hope it may be one of success. In the performance of the duties to which our sacred office calls you to cry out against every thing which carries with it even the appearance of vice; and if, in your laudible zeal to discharge this duty, you should raise your voice against that which is not vicious, I believe it is not the consequences of your having mistaken its real character.

I do not pretend to offer a defence, nor even a palliative, for all which has been done by Masons; it is only the true character of Masonry which I wish to bring to light. It is not in my power to correct all the abuses which have grown up under it; but so far as my poor influence will go, it is, and constantly shall be employed towards the correction of as many as may come in my way. Had I the power, I would with an unsparring hand, and a joyful heart, lop off many excrescences, which hang upon us like a morbid growth, or stand "like a mildewed ear, blighting its wholesome brother."

I shall not presume so far to question your sense as to caution you against the many libels contained in those scurrilous periodicals which call themselves "Anti-Masonic." All I have to request is that you would examine both sides, and carry into that examination an unprejudiced mind, and your own judgment, upon such evidences as may be presented to you. I take the liberty of inclosing two addresses I delivered to a Lodge over which I presided in 1826 and 1827. These, as you may see, were not intended for publication, but were designed exclusively for the instruction and benefit of that Lodge. I hope that this occasion will afford sufficient apology for my having converted them to a different purpose from that originally intended. They will serve to prove to you, that this vindication is no trick, got up for the occasion; and by giving you a peep behind the scenes, will let you see what the actors do in their own proper capacity. I would also hand you a copy of the by-laws by which this Lodge is governed, but that they are now under revision, and are in the hand of a committee. As soon they shall have been regularly adopted, they may be seen at any time, by any body. We have, also, several printed books on the subject, which are at all times open to the inspection of all persons who do not evade or fear examination.

I must here apologize for the trouble I have given you, and shall rely confidently on your pardon, for any apparent impropriety into which my zeal may have carried me, when I assure you, that whatever I have done, has been done, under the influence of the highest personal regard for your self, and a proper reverence for the sacred office which you fill, with so much credit to yourself, and so much benefit to the community. CAPTURE OF MADRID BY NAPOLEON.

After the tumult of the 2nd of May, the city of Madrid remained in quiet submission to the French, until the close of July, when the surrender of General Dupont's army to the Spaniards, at the battle of Baylen, induced Joseph Buonaparte, who had been placed on the throne by his brother Napoleon, to withdraw from the capital, and take a more secure position in the north. But the release which the inhabitants enjoyed from the presence of their invaders was of short duration; Napoleon himself came from France to ensure the subjugation of Spain, and, at the close of November, appeared at the foot of the mountains which cover the approach to Madrid from the north. The pass of Somosierra, through which his route lay, being forced, the way to Madrid was open to the French; and certainly the state of the capital offered little that was likely to impede its capture. Before the pass had been forced, orders had been issued to arm and embody the inhabitants; other measures were also taken; but the preparations had been delayed too long to be now of any essential service. The people were ready, and willing to do their duty; but there was none to guide them in such an emergency. They demanded ammunition, and among the cartridges which they received there happened to be some which contained sand instead of gunpowder. A cry of treason was instantly raised, and the mob began to look for victims on whom to wreak their fury. Some one accused the Marquis of Perales; the rabble at once rushed to his house, murdered him, and dragged his body through the streets, exulting in what they believed his deserved punishment. "Many others, of inferior note, fell victims to this fury," says Colonel Napier; "for no man was safe, none durst assume authority to control, none durst give honest advice: the houses were thrown open, the bells of the convents and churches rang incessantly, and a band of ferocious armed men traversed the streets in all the madness of popular insurrection."

On the 2nd of December, the French cavalry came within sight of Madrid, and took possession of the heights; Buonaparte arrived at noon, on the same day and then gave orders for summoning the town to surrender. An advance camp of Marshal Bessieres was sent on this duty; he was seized by the people, and was on the point of being massacred, when the Spanish soldiers, ashamed of such conduct, rescued him. The infantry came up the same night, and in the following day an attack was made on the palace of the Buen Retiro, a weak irregular work, which was of importance as commanding the city. A thousand Spaniards fell in its defence, but the place was carried; other advantages were gained by the French; and on the 4th, the town was again summoned by Marshal Berthier, who used the most terrifying arguments to enforce the necessity of a surrender. "Immense batteries," he said, "are mounted; mines are prepared to blow up your principal buildings; columns of troops are at the entrances of the town, of which some companies of sharpshooters have made themselves masters. But the emperor, always generous in the course of his victories, suspends the attack till two o'clock. To defend Madrid is contrary to the principles of war, and inhuman toward the inhabitants." The leaders of the people were not the men whose daring boldness might lead them to resist such arguments as these, even if they had been true to their trust; the treachery of one of them, that one in whom the people placed their highest confidence—Don Thomas Meria—is now undisputed.

This individual, accompanied by another Spaniard, went out to Berthier's tent, and assured him of the willingness of the chiefs to surrender the city, but presented that they were unable, at the moment, to persuade the people to agree to such a step; accordingly, they requested a suspension of arms for a short time.—The "unworthy deputies," as Mr. Southey calls them, were then introduced to the presence of Buonaparte, who exhibited, on the occasion, one of those theatrical displays in which he delighted to indulge. "You use the name of the people to no purpose," he said; "if you cannot appease them and restore tranquillity, it is because you have inflamed them, and led them astray by propagating falsehoods. Call together the clergy, the heads of convents, the alcaldes, the men of property and influence, and let the city capitulate before six o'clock in the morning, or it shall cease to exist." He then reproached the Spaniards in bold language for their conduct towards himself, and read them a lecture on their bad faith, in not observing the treaty of Baylen—in suffering Frenchmen to be assassinated, and in seizing upon the French squadron at Cadiz. "This rebuke," says Sir Walter Scott, "was gravely urged by the individual who had kidnapped the royal family of Spain while they courted his protection as his devoted vassals; who had seized the fortresses into which his troops had been received as friends and allies; who had floated the streets of Madrid with the blood of its population; and, finally, who had taken it upon him to assume the supreme authority, and dispose of the crown of Spain, under no better pretext than that he had the will and the power to do so. Had a Spaniard been at liberty to reply to the Lord of Legions, and reckon with him injury for injury, falsehood for falsehood, drop of blood for drop of blood, what an awful balance must have been struck against him!"

The conclusion of this harangue was decided. "Return to Madrid I give you till six o'clock in the morning; come back at that hour, if you have to announce the submission of the people; otherwise, you and your troops shall be put to the sword." "Had there been a Spaniard present," says Mr. Southey, "to have replied as became him on behalf of his country, Buonaparte would have trembled at the reply, like Felix before the Apostle." There was none such, however, to be found; and Napoleon's threats produced their full effect. On the morning of the 5th, Madrid surrendered; General Belliard marched in and took possession of the city, the Spanish troops having quitted it on the opposite side during the night.

The capital remained in the possession of the French until the middle of 1812; the decisive victory gained by Lord Wellington at Salamanca, in the month of July in that year, compelled Joseph Buonaparte, to quit Madrid, leaving in it only a small garrison.

Proscription of Mourning Apparel.—A meeting has been held by the citizens of Cazenovia, N. Y., when it was resolved that the wearing of mourning clothes for the dead was useless, and proceeded more from ostentation than sincere regret. The meeting therefore, determined to use their influence to abolish the fashion, from society.

SKETCHES OF TRAVEL.

THE GRAVE OF BYRON.

The church stands rather apart from the village, at the further end of it. It is a modest, quiet, lowly country sanctuary, and presents no subject for observation, either in its architecture or ornaments. The clerk shows the church, and rejoices in the very uncommon name of Green. He is a little, active old man, bordering on seventy, with dark eyes, and nimble gait, and is blessed with a most voluble tongue. He lives at some little distance from the Church; but, as he holds the keys, his presence and good offices are indispensable.

The poet lies under the chancel; his feet pointing to the outer wall. His coffin is placed upon his mother's, and exactly covers it. The children of the Sunday school—for it is kept in the chancel—are taught over his grave! The inscription on his mother's coffin runs thus:

The Honorable Catherine Gordon Byron,
of Gight;

Mother of George, Lord Byron, and lineal descendant, of the Earl of Huntley, and Lady Jean Stuart, daughter of

King James the First of Scotland;
Died in the 45th year of her age.

August 1st, 1811

The family pew is a large square seat, close to the pulpit, and belongs to the estate. Lord Byron, when a boy, and his mother, are recollected to have occasionally occupied it.

At the back of the seat, and between it and the small chancel door, is the simple marble tablet erected by the poet's affectionate sister, the Honorable Augusta Mary Leigh, to his memory. "She waited," the clerk said, "a whole year, in the hope that one nearer allied to him than herself would do honor to his memory; and yet, at the end of that period, finding no step had been taken, planned the tablet you see, and wrote the inscription,

In the vault beneath,

Where many of his ancestors and his mother
are buried,

Lie the remains of

George Gordon Noel Byron,

Lord Byron, of Rochdale,

In the county of Lancaster;

The author of Childe Harold's Pilgrimage.

He was born in London, on the 22d of January, 1785.

He died at Missolonghi, in Western Greece, on the 19th of April, 1824,

Engaged in the glorious attempt to restore that country to her ancient freedom and renown.

His sister.

The Honorable Augusta Mary Leigh,

Placed this tablet to his memory.

Below the tablet are his arms, and the motto, Crede
Byron.

The three concluding lines of the inscription will always excite very painful feelings. Strange that on his sister should devolve the duty of perpetuating his memory! Where was his wealthy widow! Where his only child? Was the remark, then, just, which the most melancholy of all his letters contains, that "the only being who ever really loved him was his sister!"

The visitors to his grave have been most numerous. The names of many distinguished foreigners are to be found in the album kept by the clerk; and during the summer months rarely a day elapses without bringing to this remote sanctuary one or more parties desirous of doing homage to the poet's shade. Among the many distinguished names which the clerk's record contains, I noted his who has written such a touching account of his visit to Newstead. It is entered thus:

"Washington Irving, January 8th 1832."

"Ah!" says the clerk, he was a very sensible, feeling, reflecting gentleman! I remember him well. He was calm and quiet; lost in thought, seemingly; and did not seem to conduct himself in the extravagant and unaccountable manner some of many customers are pleased to do."

"Extravagant! how so?"

"Why, sir," says Mr. Green, seating himself somewhat daintily upon a little round stool that was considerably the worse for wear, and assuming an oratorical attitude, "we have visitors here from all parts of the world: and the manner in which some of them conduct themselves is, to my mind, quite irrational. Some weep when they see his grave, and others appear stupefied—quite overcome by their feelings. Some stand upon it, and repeat stanzas from 'Childe Harold,' or 'Lara;' some—I'm shocked to say it—verses from 'Don Juan.' One young gentleman—he was an American poet—wanted to be shut up in the church all night by himself!—as if, in my responsible situation, I could listen to such proposals for a moment! Some—They were foreigners—have knelt down upon the stone and kissed it. In truth, sir, there's no end to the megrims of the gentlefolks who come here."

"They should have buried him elsewhere," said I, musingly.

"Why, so they would—in Westminster Abbey, no doubt; but, you see, nothing sacred found favor in his eyes, nor had he any very great respect for constituted authority! So the dean declined having him. And a very happy thing it was for me, that the dean came to such a proper resolution.

"But he should have been buried there, nevertheless."

"Why so?" says the clerk, pettishly. "After all, what did he do for mankind? Did he discover the steam engine, like Watt? or the safety-lamp, like Davy? or the spinning-jenny, like Arkwright? He was a fashionable poet, and wrote fine verses with bad morals."

"Amid the multitude," said I, anxious to change the subject, "who have bent their steps hither, do you chance to recollect whether his widow or daughter is included."

"Not to my knowledge. I rather think not. I invariably keep the key, and I am quite sure I should recollect the person of Lady Byron. The Duke of Orleans, and I rather think the Duke of Sussex, asked me the same question, and so did Sir Robert Wilmot Horton. His sister, Mrs. Leigh, visited his grave soon after the erection of the tablet, and wept over him long and silently.—She loved him fondly, sir, and so does Col. Wildman, of the Abbey. He's a fine specimen of an English gentleman. He buried old Joe Murray, the boatman, an old retainer of my lord's, very near him—just were you are standing, sir—because he recollected my lord's partiality for old Joe, and thought it was 'a fellowship in death' which even he would not disapprove."

The moon by this time had risen, and beaming through the chancel window, fell brightly on the burial vault, and tipped the marble tablet with softened and silvery radiance. Burke's affecting apostrophe occurred to me, "What shadows we are, and what shadows we pursue!" I turned to gaze for the last time on the poet's resting place.—The thought of talents abused, and opportunities wasted, and energies misdirected rushed painfully across me; and forgetting for a moment that I belonged to another and a purer communion, humbly and earnestly did an ejaculation escape me for the rescue and repose of his soul!

HUMOUR.

Definition of Humbug.—An English journal contains the following clever and humorous observations respecting humbug. We find it in Sylvester's New Reporter. The editor has stripped it of the political allusions, and given it an American dress.

"There is a word, a plain English word, the strict orthodoxy of which is less clear than its conventional force. That word is humbug—a word much in use, but never yet, we believe, properly defined. Humbug is either abstract or personal—either a certain thing or a certain individual practising, professing, or otherwise remarkable for, that thing. But let us set forth, with due ceremony, and transfer the word at once to the pages of the dictionary. The reader must not be startled at some novel derivatives from the great word, which are demanded by the times.

Humbug—(hum and bug, probably from the Latin—

"Quo non atrocior unquam.

Verily do thinko, terris apparuit humbug.)

1. Any gabble, hubbub, hollabalo, row; fuss, or other commotion, raised about nothing at all, with intent to mystify and bamboozle simple people.

2. One who raises or conspires to raise any such gabble, hubbub, hollabalo, row, fuss, or other commotion, with intent to mystify, &c.

Humbug (verb).—To mystify and bamboozle simple people, by raising any gabble, hnbub hollabalo, row, fuss, &c. To do the public. To behave humbugously.

Humbugeous (the g soft).—Of or belonging to any gabble, hubbub, &c.

Humbugeously.—In an humbugeous manner.

Humbugeousness.—A natural alacrity in humbug.

A general disposition to humbugeous principles.

We have thought it right to carry out our derivatives thus far, for we conceive that a practical philologist never does a more acceptable service than when he recognizes the conversational wants of the public. Besides, neologism is allowed to be necessary in proportion to the spread of science—words ought to keep pace with things. Humbug is that mighty principle which controls, and, as it were, conducts the operations of mankind. It may be said to be "the air we breathe." The whole town is infected with it; it flies from house to house—darts, like the electric fluid, hither and thither—through the key-hole, down the chimney, along the bell-wires. It arrests us in the street, takes us by the button, overwhelms us, sends us home choking. Persons the least addicted to humbugeousness are found discharging on others the subtle elements with which they have themselves become unconsciously filled. The truthful and mendacious alike uphold the battery of falsehood—those at the nega.

Conveniences of a House.—A gentleman who had lately built a house, was showing it to a friend and with great glee was pointing out all its various accommodations. "My dear sir," interrupted the other, "have you made the staircase wide enough to bring down your own coffin?"

BY WORDS.

Hunt's Dog.—He is like Hunt's dog, will neither go to church nor stay at home. One hunt, a laboring man at a small town in Shropshire, kept a mastiff, which, on being shut up on Sundays, whilst his master went to church, howled so terrible as to disturb the whole village; wherefore his master resolved to take him to church with him. But when he came to the church-door, the dog, having perhaps formerly been whipped out by the sexton, refused to enter; whereupon Hunt exclaimed loudly against his obstinacy, which would neither go to church nor stop at home.—This shortly became a by-word for discontented and whimsical persons.

Blarney.—He has licked the Blarney stone; he deals in the wonderful. The Blarney stone is a triangular stone on the very top of an ancient castle of that name, in the county of Cork in Ireland, extremely difficult of access, so that to have ascended to it, was considered as a proof of perseverance, courage and ability, whereof many are supposed to claim the honor who never achieved the adventure: and to tip the Blarney, is figuratively used for telling a marvellous story, or falsity, and also sometimes to express flattery.

Curse of Scotland.—The nine of diamonds: diamonds it is said, imply royalty, being ornaments to the imperial crown, and every ninth king of Scotland has been observed for many ages, to be a tyrant and a curse to that country. Others say it is from its similarity to the arms Argyle; the Duke of Argyle having been very instrumental in bringing about the union, which by some Scotch patriots has been considered detrimental to their country. [Another explanation we have heard is, that the order for the massacre at Glenco in 1691 was written hastily on the back of a card which the commanding officer had that evening employed in playing with his victims.]

Choak Pear.—Figuratively, an unanswerable objection; also a machine formerly used in Holland by robbers; it was of iron, shaped like a pear; this they forced into the mouths of persons from whom they intended to extort money, and, on turning a key, certain interior springs thrust forth a number of points in all directions, which so enlarged it that it could not be taken out of the mouth; and the iron, being case-hardened, could not be filed; the only methods of getting rid of it were, either by cutting the mouth, or advertising a reward for the key. These pears were also called pears of agony,

POPULAR TALES.

THE PHANTOM FUNERAL.

(CONCLUDED.)

Murdoch gave the excited creature the promise she desired, and then stood silent for a few moments, surprised and bewildered.

"Oh, Murdoch! Murdoch!" said Mari, in a voice of utter despair, "what shall we do to keep my father at home? Remember my words last night, and then ask if any childish whim is on my spirit now. Murdoch, you can testify to the truth of mine observance. You can say whether phantasies struggle with truth within my brain till it be crazed. Oh, Murdoch! Murdoch! tell you the old man, that if he go to the burial, he will not return. Tell him that he will leave his child an orphan, and his wife a widow, and that his old bones shall whiten where never a voice will wail his coronach, nor kindly hand be nigh to close his eyelids, or to streak his corpse; that no lyke wake will be held over him, nor grass grow green upon his heart. Oh, Murdoch! Murdoch! is it not an awful thing to die unblest, and by our own wilful agency? to sleep with unhallowed things, and to leave those we love best without a prayer for them or ourselves?"

The poor girl stopped her gasping address, and her whole form seemed to heave with agitation. Murdoch soothed her for a while with promises of his utmost endeavours to move the resolution of her father, and she grew calmer under the hopes of success with which he strove to reassure her.

"An' what for should we no follow poor old Angus to his lang hame, Mari?" asked he at last. "Angus was one of your father's oldest friends on all Ben Shee; an' he must hae a gude reason for't before he agree to stay at hame, an' let others mourn for him. Tell me, Mari dear, what ye are afraid for?"

Mari flung the plaid far back from her face and head, and turned her forehead up to the white moonshine, till Murdoch could see that the beam itself was not more wan and deathlike. Her features were all at work with the spell of her malady; she waved her arms for him to follow, and then flitted past him to a small ridge, or knoll, on the margin of her favourite stream. When she had gained the summit, she stood with her back towards the waters, her face turned fully up to the sky, and her arms stretched out over the valley at her feet, the impersonation of an inspired priestess.

"See, see, they are coming," said she, in an eager and concentrated tone, and with her eyes fastened upon some object in the valley, which Murdoch fancied the dim night alone prevented him from tracing; "they are coming slowly—slowly—a bonny burial, an' six mourners at the bier; they are coming o'er the moor o' Chrom Dhu, and their black shadows are following them like spirits. Stand aside, Murdoch; they will pass even now, and we may count the bearers, and see if Robin Ure be among them."

Murdoch stared wistfully at the spell-bound creature before him, and, as he scanned the deathly features and gleaming eyes, his heart swelled with a compassionate longing to arrest, even in its progress, the destroying influence that was upon her. He felt that it could be no visible shadow on which her gaze was fixed with such a fearful intensity, for the moor of Chrom Dhu was far away over the other side of the mountain. He took both her cold hands, and, chafing them gently with his own, spoke kindly to her in words of comfort and remonstrance.

"Yon's no Chrom Dhu, Mari dear; it's your ain bonnie Glen-shee, an' there's nae living shadows moving on it; but the waving of your ain black firs you are looking at, and the clouds that are scudding so mirkily ower the moor. Let us go, Mari; ye will catch your very death in this dreary night."

"Trees and clouds!" said the maiden with a terrible laugh; "do they bury each other, and walk in such goddy ranks as these do? Kneel down, poor clay, and you shall see."

Murdoch almost unconsciously obeyed her, and she stood hanging over him, so as to bring their figures into the closest possible contact; then placing one hand upon her side, she made him look through the angle formed by her elbow, and speak not till his gaze was done. The prohibition was unnecessary. Murdoch drew his breath between his closed teeth, the blood stood still in his veins, his flesh moved, and his brain sickened with horror.

A funeral procession, in solemn and regular array, moved steadily along within a few paces of the spot where he stood. The pall, the bier, the coffin, and the mourning habiliments, all were as distinct and palpable as the commonest occurrences of life, and they gradually approached nearer and nearer with their slow and measured movement, and their noiseless tread, till the gazer felt his eye-strings crack as he measured the diminishing distance. On they come, dark, dismal, and solemn—nearer, nearer, and nearer—on they came with a dread which was the more horrible because it gave back no sound. Murdoch felt the atmosphere of a crowd; felt their garments stir the air as they passed him; felt the burial-pall flap beside his very cheek, and his soul shuddered with horror. The faces of friends and kinsmen were among that company of wraiths, and Murdoch felt the arm of Mari grasp his neck with a convulsive clutch as the last stragglers passed the spot. Another, and another lingered; one more—it was Robin Ure. A white mist fell upon the vision of Murdoch, and with a scream of agony, he fell senseless upon the heather.

When Murdoch awoke from his trance he was alone. Mari had disappeared, the sky was pure and cloudless, and the full moon shed light and gladness over the valley. The shepherd arose, with a heavy sickness at his heart, and a bewilderment in his brain, that rendered his memory dim. He was gradually conscious of some deadly peril that hung over his old and valued friend; a peril which he had promised all his efforts to avert, and which rendered his presence in the cottage an immediate necessity.

The next moment he had turned his back upon the shealing, and was wending his way with enfeebled steps towards his home. "I have seen the future," was his reflection, "and is mine hand to change the decrees of Providence?" Human companionship at that moment would have shaken again the scarcely-established intellect, and he walked homeward. Sleep was not destined to visit the eyes of Murdoch during that, nor many succeeding nights of his existence, and the whole of the next day he walked about like one in a dream, with the horrible spell of his memory clinging to him like a fiend, and making the very sunshine black with its presence.

A dreadful mystery was before him; he knew not what evil it portended, but, to look upon the similitude of the living, he well knew, was to number them shortly with the dead, and he felt, as it were, instinctively that he had seen Robin for the last time. A feverish desire was upon him to make one in that company of wraiths; and, despite his solemn vow to Mari, the temptation rose strong and vivid to follow in the train of Angus's funeral, and witness, even at the cost of participating in, the danger that threatened it.

The burial would take place at early morning; and, as the churchyard lay far away, it was necessary that he should set out overnight, that he might join the procession in its march. He was resolved to go. The clouds of the previous night had fulfilled their omen, for a heavy fall of snow continued throughout the day, and, by the hour of starting, had rendered the mountain-path neither pleasant nor safe to traverse; but Murdoch was determined to share the peril of which he alone had received the warning, and by midnight he was prepared to start. The storm still raged, and the wind drifted the snow about in wreaths, till the density of the atmosphere became appalling; yet the spell-stricken shepherd did not waver in his purpose. He folded his plaid about him, and quenched his solitary fire, and was about to extinguish the lamp before he went forth, when a low knocking at the door, and a feeble and continued moan, sent the blood to his heart, and the tremor to his limbs, which a less mysterious incident might have lent them in the present fever of his imagination.

After a few moments of hesitation, however, the knocking was repeated, and Murdoch advanced to the door, wondering if any human applicant could indeed seek shelter on such a night. The gust blew out the lamp as he slowly undid the fastening of the door, and looked abroad upon the tempest. A dim object lay half across the threshold, and he moved it with his hand before he could be convinced that thence issued the piteous moaning which met his ear. A very slight exertion was sufficient to place the creature—by whatever denomination it went—upon its feet, and Murdoch turned it to the half-open door, that the vague light of the sky might give him the means, which the darkened cottage withheld, of identifying it.

"God pity you, poor shorn lamb! is it you?" exclaimed the stout Highlander in a faltering voice, as the wasted lineaments, of Mari became visible from the folds of the plaid; "is it you, or is't your wraith that has breasted the wind and the storm for nae purpose but to scare the little sense that ye left me, clean awa?"

"Murdoch! Murdoch!" answered the poor maiden in a spent and feeble tone that sounded itself like the wail of the tempest, "come your ways; it was indeed the spirit that brought this wretched body over the mountain in life. Blessings on you, Murdoch, for expecting me; the laid and the brogues will not be to seek. Come quickly, Murdoch. My strength failed me, or I should have been earlier. Come—come! they are near the Chrom by this time," and she pulled the corner of his plaid, and turned once more towards the door.

"An' where is it ye would lead me now, Mari?" said the shepherd. "Ye are no able for a longer walk the night. Sit down, an' rest ye, Mari dear, and take off that snowy plaid, and I'll kindle up the logs again; and here's new milk in the corner, that I brought in, little thinking ye would need it, and you'll soon be warm and strong again; and by morning dawn, we'll set off to Glen-shee. Your poor mother will be half-crazed when she misses you." And he strove earnestly to lead her mind from the subject of her continued ramble, but it was all in vain; she stamped her foot upon the ground impatiently. "Warned and fed?" said she indignantly, "when I might be looking my last upon those who will never be warmed or fed again!—Man! I tell you to come with me, if you would not rue it to the last moment of your life," and she turned from him again with a gesture of command.

"Whither then, Mari," said the shepherd submissively, "whither am I to follow you? You cannot reach Chrom Dhu, were you as strong as I am, before morning, unless you climb the south shoulder of the Devil's Dyke; and, when ye are even on the top o' the crag, it takes a stronger limb and a firmer foot than yours to make its way down the other side."

"There is no need, Murdoch," answered the unfortunate in her former tone of helplessness. "We can but look upon the work of doom were we beside it, that may as well be done from the crag itself."

The storm was somewhat abated when they set forth, and, though the snow still fell heavily, there was no impenetrable mist of moving wreaths to make their progress one of danger as well as of difficulty. Murdoch was hurried along by his frail conductress with an activity that seemed the effect of some supernatural gift. She made her way through the drifted snow with a speed which taxed even his own powers; and glided up the toilsome ascent which led to the Devil's Dyke so quickly and easily, that Murdoch felt his blood chill with the remembrance that she was not gifted like himself. At length the summit of the crag was gained, and Mari stood fearlessly on its ridge, and looked over into the wild hollow of Chrom Dhu.

The Chrom was a lonely moor, or, rather a peat-hagg, leafless and trackless, that yawned in one long stripe of savage sterility at the foot of the precipice. In the middle of the waste lay a small sheet of moss-water, unfathomably deep, but generally discernible from all points, stagnant and motionless as it was, from the colour of its surface, which was esteemed a sufficient warrant for the safety of the cattle, that might otherwise have been tempted to its margin. The wild singularity of the Chrom was this night completely veiled by the pure covering of snow that lay deep and spotless upon its bosom. Even the black pool had been previously frozen up, and retained, in consequence, its share of the universal shroud. The dull white light of the sky, and the uniformity of the earth, made every object, even at the foot of the crag, distinctly visible; and Murdoch stood motionless, gazing downwards, expecting each moment that he numbered, to see, the funeral procession of Angus Bane enter the Chrom on its progress to the churchyard.

The snow had ceased, and the dawn was far advanced, leaving the whole sweep of the valley at their command; and before Murdoch had recovered breath from the steep ascent of the crag, the foremost of the train of mourners appeared in view. They came in one large group, closely gathered about the bier, and followed by one or two straggling lingerers, exactly as Murdoch remembered their arrangement in his vision of the night. On they went—their black figures clearly traced upon the white ground, and each one casting a long shadow, that loomed far over the earth, with a strange and frightful appearance in the solitude. On they came; and Mari's breath came in suffocating gasps and she tossed her arms wildly to the sky. Murdoch watched them with an eagerness that bound every sense into one long gaze. On they came, slowly, steadily—on and on, till they had reached the middle of the moor. Murdoch's heart quailed and sickened within him, and Mari laughed in her agony with a cry of madness.

"God be merciful! The pool! the pool!" shouted Murdoch, till his broad chest heaved and strained with the effort.

It was in vain; the doomed train had missed their way on that trackless desert, and were all in the centre of the lake before the treacherous ice gave way. It was the work of an instant. One crackling sound reached even to the ears of the watchers—one fell plunge, and the bier and the mourners, the dead and the doomed, were engulfed for ever. Murdoch caught Mari in his arms, as in her frenzy she would have leapt from the crag at the moment of their immersion, and, flinging her over his shoulder like a three years' child, he took his sorrowful way to the desolate cottage of Glen-shee.

The afflicted creature moaned and sobbed for awhile in his arms, as if the fury of her paroxysm were subsiding, and as each gasp came feebler and feebler, Murdoch pleased himself with the thought that her terrible exertions were repaid by sleep. At last the sounds of her mourning ceased entirely; her head hung heavier and heavier on his neck, and Murdoch reached the shealing like one who walks in a dream. Mari was dead; and Murdoch gave to poor old Elsepeth the body of her child, and the news of her widowhood, at the same moment.

Murdoch's experience of second sight was not fatal. He is still alive, and,

A better and a wiser man
He rose the morrow morn.

THE EDUCATION OF WOMAN.

Woman should be well educated. I apprehend there is no danger of educating her too well, though there may be, and there is, danger of educating her amiss.—All useful branches of science, every department of literature, demands a degree of her attention; but she should be careful not to allow any one study, or pursuit to engross her attention, to the neglect or exclusion of others, equally entitled to her notice. Placed, as she ever has been, and even must be, in a sphere where she is in constant intercourse with the young and the budding mind, which depends on her for its bloom, its beauty, and its growth, she should have no bias but towards goodness, no engagements that interfere with her agreeable duties, no pursuits that widely distract her attention—no thoughts even, whose impulse is not from a pure heart. To me, it seems proper that she should possess a balance of knowledge, (if I may be allowed the expression) or an equal acquaintance with all useful sciences and subjects, without aiming at high eminence in any particular one. Her general duties are the same in every station, or condition in life. Her sex is not like ours, obliged to sever into different professions or pursuits, and consequently, there is no necessity that she should excel in any one science more than another.

While much attention should be given to the education of the intellects of females, the most careful attention should be bestowed on their moral cultivation; for it is woman who is to give the tone of sentiment to future generations. On her, depends in a great degree, the welfare, and the happiness of the world, in coming ages. Let her mind, therefore, be trained in such a manner, as will best develop her good, her agreeable, and her useful qualities. Educate her not to aspire for those things which cannot heighten her usefulness, as well as her enjoyment, and be careful that you suppress not the moral, to educate the intellectual, faculties. I repeat, if the world is even to be reformed; and its moral condition improved; if the tempest of human passion is ever to be calmed; if the tumult of ambitions and worldly strife, is ever to be stilled, it must, and it will be effected by the influence of woman. The power to accomplish great beneficial changes rests in her hands, and if she do not exercise it, she will fail in discharging an important duty, and it will be, because she deviates from the path of nature, forsakes the correct road, leading to useful eminence, and to eminent usefulness, to wander amidst mazy windings, and intricate bye-paths, where, although, she may find much to amuse, and to excite and gratify curiosity, she will meet with nothing sufficient to compensate for the pure delights which she foregoes, by bartering her Eden innocence to taste of the fruit of the tree of worldly knowledge. MISCELLANY.

INSTANCE OF LONG ABSTINENCE.

A Young man of studious and melancholy turn of mind, troubled with some symptoms of indigestion and internal complaints, and aided, perhaps by the strength of imagination, and by some mistaken notions about religion, resolved to cure himself by abstinence. He withdrew himself suddenly from his business and friends, took lodgings in an obscure street, and resolved to abstain from all solid food, and only to moisten his mouth from time to time with water, slightly flavoured with the juice of oranges. After three days abstinence, till the craving for food subsided, and he pursued his studies without further inconvenience. He used no exercise, slept but little, and spent the greater part of the night in reading. The quantity of water used each day was from half a pint to a pint, and the juice of two oranges, to flavour the water, served him a week.

He persisted in his regimen for sixty days, without variation. During the last ten days of it, his strength failed rapidly; and finding himself unable to rise from his bed, he began to be alarmed. He had hitherto flattered himself that his support was preternatural, and indulged his imagination with the prospect of some great event, which he expected would follow this remarkable abstinence. But his delusion vanished, and he gradually found himself wasting, and sinking to the grave.

About this time, his friends found out his retreat, and prevailed upon him to admit the visit of a respectable clergyman, who convinced him of the fallacy of his visionary ideas; and succeeded, finally in obtaining his consent to any plan that might be conducive to his recovery. Dr Willan, a respectable physician was then called in for advice, and visited him on the 23d of March 1786 and on the sixty-first day of his fast. The doctor found him reduced to the last stage of existence, and he states, "that his whole appearance suggested the idea of a skeleton, prepared for drying the muscles upon it in their natural situation. His eyes were not deficient in lustre; his voice was sound and clear, notwithstanding his general weakness, but attended with great imbecility of mind. He had undertaken in his retirement to copy the bible in short hand, which he showed the doctor; executed nearly as far as the second book of Kings; he had also made some improvements in short-hand writing. From the 23d to 28th of March, he was so much recovered, under a proper regimen, that he could easily walk across the room; but on the 29, he lost his recollection and ultimately died on the 9th of April, nature being quite exhausted.

Dr. Willan believes that this young man's case of fasting is longer than any recorded in the annals of physic; and that he could scarcely have supported himself through it, except from an enthusiastic turn of mind nearly bordering upon insanity, the effect of which, in fortifying the body against cold and hunger, is so well known.

Declivity of Rivers.—A very slight declivity suffices to give the running motion to water. Three inches per mile, in a smooth, straight channel, gives a velocity of about three miles an hour. The Ganges, which gathers the waters of the Himalaya Mountains, the loftiest in the world, is, at 1800 miles from its mouth, only 800 feet above the level of the sea—that is, about twice the height of St. Paul's Church in London (or the height of Arthur's Seat near Edinburgh), and to fall these 800 feet, in its long course, the water requires more than a month. The great river, Magdalena, in South America, running for 1000 miles, between two ridges of the Andes, falls only 500 feet in all that distance. Above the commencement of the thousand miles, it is seen descending in rapids and cataracts from the mountains. The gigantic Rio de la Plata has so gentle a descent to the ocean, that in Paraguay, 1500 miles from its mouth, large ships are seen, which have sailed against the current all the way by the force of the wind alone; that is to say, on the beautifully inclined plane of the stream, have been gradually lifted by the soft wind, and even against the current, to an elevation greater than that of our loftiest spires.—Arnott's Physics.

Among the Chinese novelties to be seen in the vicinity of Canton, but more especially about Wampoa, are the duckboats, used as residence for the owners and their families, as well as for their numerous feathered charge. The fledged bipeds inhabit the hold of the boat, and the human bipeds, or keepers, the upper accommodations of the vessel. These boats are most abundant about the rice-fields, near the river, soon after the harvest has been gathered in, as at that time the broad-billed animals glean the fields, and have a better prospect of a supply of food than at any other period. The owner of the boat moves it from place to place, according to the opportunities that may be offered to him of feeding his flock. On the arrival of the boat at the appointed spot, or one considered proper for feeding the quacking tribe, a signal of a whistle causes the flock to waddle in regular order from their domicile across the board placed for their accommodation, and then, rambling about, undergo the process of feeding. When it is considered by their keeper that they have gorged sufficiently, another signal is made for the return of the birds; immediately upon hearing it, they congregate and re-enter the boat. The first duck that enters is rewarded with some paddy, the last is whipped for being dilatory; so that it is ludicrous to see the last birds, (knowing by sad experience the fate that awaits them,) making efforts en masse to fly over the backs of the others, to escape the chastisement inflicted upon the ultimate duck.—Bennell's Wanderings.

WOLF-CATCHING IN NORWAY.

In Norway, and perhaps in some other northern countries, the following very simple contrivance is used for the capture of the wolf:—In a circle of about six or eight feet in diameter, stakes are driven so close to each other that a wolf cannot creep through, and which are high enough to prevent his leaping over them. In the midst of this circle a single stake is driven, to which a lamb or a young kid is bound. Around this circle a second is formed, of which the stakes are as close and as high as the inner one, and at a distance not greater than will permit of a wolf to pass conveniently, but not to allow of his turning round. In the outer circle a door is formed, which opens inward, and rests against the inner circle, but moves easily on its hinges, and fastens itself on shutting. Through this door the wolves enter, sometimes in such a number as to fill the enclosure. The first wolf now paces the circle in order to discover some opening through which he can get to the lamb. When he comes to the back of the door which is in his way, he pushes it with his muzzle, it closes and fastens, he passes by, and goes the round for the second time, without being able either to enter the inner circle, or retreat from the outer. At length he perceives that he is a prisoner, and his howling announces to those who have constructed the trap that he is taken who immediately come and dispatch him. It is said that this sort of trap is also used for foxes, and even occasionally for mice.

Progress and effects of Education.—The general desire for education, and the general diffusion of it is working, and partly has worked, a great change in the habits of the mass of the people. And though it has been our lot to witness some of the inconveniences necessarily arising from a transition state, where gross ignorance has been superseded by a somewhat too rapid communication of instruction, dazzling the mind, perhaps, rather than enlightening it, yet every day removes something of this evil. Presumption and self-sufficiency are sobered down by the acquirement of useful knowledge, and men's minds become less arrogant in proportion as they become better informed. There cannot be a doubt, therefore, but that any evils which may have arisen from opening the flood-gates of education, if I may so say, will quickly flow away, and that a clear and copious stream will succeed, fertilising the heretofore barren intellect with its wholesome and perennial waters.—Bishop of Litchfield.

Spanish Incongruities.—Late in the evening we entered Ovar, a long, straggling town, in which I naturally concluded that some house of accommodation must exist; but literally there was none. The Peninsula generally, although it may be said more of Spain than Portugal, abounds in these strange inconsistencies. I once stopped at a venta, in Andalusia, which not only possessed the necessities, but many of the comforts of life; meat and fowls, with tea, coffee, and chocolate, formed a sumptuous bill of fare for a Spanish country inn; forks abounded, but when I called for a knife, I was told that no such implement was kept in the house, on a principle of self-preservation. The reason given was eminently Spanish; but, in fact, the road was chiefly frequented by smugglers, who live well, but always carry their own knives, and this was the real cause of the deficiency. The same curious contradictions are occasionally found in the higher ranks. I remember sleeping at the house of a decayed noble, who received me with the utmost hospitality. My sleeping apartment was, however, destitute of the most common conveniences of life; my bed had no curtains, there was not a looking-glass, there was not a chair in the room. Such being the case, I was surprised and somewhat amused on seeing a menial, attired in a faded livery of green and gold, enter my apartment with much state, bearing a basin of massive silver, which he was himself compelled to hold, because there was no table on which he could place that ponderous relic of the departed splendor of the house.—Portugal and Lisbon.

A Marriage Certificate.—An Irish soldier once waited upon his commanding officer, with what he termed a very serious complaint. "Another man," he said, "upbraided him that he was not married to his own wife, whom he accused of being no better than she should be, and called her many names besides, which he would be ashamed to mention to his honor."—"Well, my good fellow," answered the officer, "have you any proof that you are legally married?" "Your honor, I have the best proof in the world." Here the soldier took off his hat, and exhibited a cut skull, saying, "Does your honor think I'd be after taking the same abuse from any body but a wife?"

At one of our fashionable watering places, recently happened a self-important foreigner, who, upon hearing the dinner bell rung at half-past three o'clock, exclaimed, "is it possible you dine at this early hour in this country? Why, I have not been used to dining till seven or eight o'clock in London."

"Our second table folks dine very late here also," was the reply of a Yankee present.

A runaway match came off at Washington city on Saturday last. The parties were from Alexandria—the bride a young lady of fifteen, the groom not out of his teens—each attended by a particular friend. The knot was tied by one of the resident clergymen, and the party sailed forth with a smile of satisfaction beaming on each countenance, and to cool their perturbed spirits, they took a stroll towards the Capitol. They sauntered along mute, with untold a piness and were about entering the capitol gate, when the bride's papa and her brother, who were laying in ambush, seized the lady and her attendant, and carried them to a carriage. The groom attempted a rescue, but he was knocked down, and his bride was spirited away before he recovered from the shock. She and her fair companion were conducted in the safe keeping of father and brother, to Alexandria.

The Death of Col. Pluck.—Colonel Pluck, died suddenly, yesterday morning, at the Blockley Hospital of disease of the heart. An hour before his death, he was walking about as usual, and had given one of the resident physicians the politest of his bows. A few years ago, the name of Colonel Pluck was in the mouths of the militia system bating people from "Maine to Georgia"—his name became as familiar as a household word, but when the Colonel became an inmate of the Alms House, his name died suddenly away, and now alas for military glory, he has died as suddenly himself.—Phil. Herald.

A happy Cure.—Lord Dormer and Mr. Edward Monckton, both stuttered dreadfully. Once, upon the occasion of their meeting in London, Mr. Monckton, seeing Lord Dormer making a vain attempt to give utterance to his words, said to him. "My dear lo—or—hird, wh—y do—n't you go to the man that cu—cur—cured me."

'Hallo, friend, are you asleep?' 'Why what do you want?' 'I want to borrow five dollars.' 'Yes, I'm fast asleep.'

AMERICAN MASONIC REGISTER.

ALBANY, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 28, 1839.

LITERARY.

The Poets of America Illustrated—For sale by W. C. Little.—In our last, we gave this very desirable volume, a passing notice. Since, we have given it a more attentive perusal, and consider, as we then said, that it deservedly ranks among our country's literature, the "gem of gems." However, we should have been glad to have seen it arranged with an eye to the progress among us of poesy, from its earliest dawn to its present meridian height. Then should we have seen, as truly has been the case, spirit stirring verse grow in majesty and beauty, with the strength and refinement of a nation. Though in our early history attempts at poetry were not numerous, and but seldom by professors, yet much was the produce of rare brilliancy and power. Barlow's "Columbiad," Byron declared the only epic produced in his time. We doubt very much whether "Liberty's Tree," by Robert Treat Payne, has, as a lyric, many superiors. We could instance volumes of fine verse, that stamp their authors with the enviable name of poet, which this volume has passed without notice. The preserving of such, it seems to us, should be the first object in compiling such a work. They would afford a great novelty to many, and could not but be interesting to all. No collection of American poetry can be complete without them: And however much Mr. Keese, the editor of this magnificent collection, may differ with us—and that he will, his miscellaneous arrangement of it declares—still, we shall contend that whenever a volume can be dignified with a national title, as American Poets Illustrated. Such volume, must contain within itself that portion of its country's history to which it professedly belongs.

The "Books of Gems," by S. C. Hall, as we think, were compiled after the only plan that can endure. In them, besides having the poets in the order in which they come as to time, we have a pertinent biographical sketch of each. Nothing is more requisite to the proper appreciating, particularly of fugitive poetry, which much of the best of ours is, than a hearsay acquaintance with the poet. He is continually giving us transcripts of his own peculiar views and feelings. Before we can allow the spirit in which he writes to be natural, it becomes necessary for us to be familiar with the circumstances under which he labored. The writings of Byron, Burns, Shelly, Halleck, Bloomfield, and almost all the genuine Poets, partake in a large degree of the things and times in which they were produced. Burns is a shining instance of what we assert. Throughout his works, his habits and mode of life are uppermost. Without a knowledge of the accessory circumstances, the stanzas to "Highland Mary," are certainly beautiful; but how much more beautiful they become, when we recognise the relationship Burns himself holds to the song which he writes.—How soon the before simply fine pathos, deepens into sorrow; and how, from admiration of the author's imaginary verses, we turn to sympathize with his real grief.

Notwithstanding we are so much at fault as to consider the plan of this work incomplete, we concur to the fullest extent, with the editor as to its destination. He commends it to the library and boudoir. He trusts, that the bright glance of the beautiful and accomplished, will always rest upon its pages with pleasure, and that even the sobriety of scholarship, and the sternness of criticism, will sometimes kindle into the enthusiasm of praise. There has been but few volumes published of which an American reader may be more justly proud. It contains not a thought but is ennobling, and not a line but is vivid with genius. What thinks the reader of the following, from the "Last Leaf," by Holmes?

"But now he walks the streets,
And looks at all meets
So solorn;
And he shakes his feeble head
That seems as if he said
'They are gone.'

"The mossy marbles rest
On the lips he has pressed
In their bloom,
And the names he loved to hear
Have been covered for many a year
On the tomb!"

Again, from the birth of a Poet, by Neale?

From a lone woody place,
There looked out a face,
With large blue eyes
Like the wet warm skies
Brim full of water and light
A profusion of hair
Flashing out in the air
And a forehead alarmingly bright."

For a moment or two he stood
On the shore of the mighty wood;
Then ventured out
With a bounding step and joyful shout,
The brave sky bending o'er him!
The broad sea all before him!

How the annexed stanzas, from the "American Forest Spring," by Street, "makes the blood start with a fresher glow."

"Hark, that sweet carol! with delight
We leave the stifling room;
The little blue-bird greets our sight
Spring, glorious spring, has come!
The south-wind's balm is in the air,
The melting snow wreaths every where
Are leaping off in showers
And nature, in her brightening looks,
Tells that the flowers, and leaves, and brooks,
And birds, will soon be ours."

Providing we should continue quoting from this volume until we were satisfied, its entire contents would be spread upon our pages. Our space will not permit us to select more than the following truly sublime conclusion to "Thumatopsis." Had Bryant but written that poem alone, it would have established his fame.

"So live, that, when the summon comes to join
The innumerable caravan, that moves
To that mysterious realm, where each shall take
His chamber in the silent halls of death,
Thou go not, like the quarry-slave at night,
Scourged to his dungeon; but sustained and soothed
By an unfaltering trust, approach thy grave,
Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch
About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams."

As to the pictorial part of this volume, we are not particularly smitten—as like all sketches, when continued to any extent, always weary the beholder. They are but seldom little more than "the flickering of a vain conceit"—lack that substantial quality of light, shadow and firm drawing, which study and time only can give. Besides, it seems the artist has not had at all times a proper conception of his author's meaning. Who that ever read "Culprit Fay," has supposed its fairy hero six feet high? According to our artist, having been goaded by water spirits, he has stretched himself upon the shore; & from his fearful dimensions we should much sooner suppose him to be Joe Smith, the Mormon Angel, than the tiny sprite we had so often imagined. Many of the ornamental designs, are evident copies and imitations from Raphael's illustration of the Vatican. Likewise, we should think our artist had, and be it said to his credit, a strong penchant for domestic matters. Without being over prudish, the editor of this volume might have dispensed with a few of the babes and nurses sprinkled so liberally throughout it. There are, however, other graceful delineations which evince a lively fancy. Among which we might mention the "Zephyr Spirit," and the poet lounging by the side of "Green River."

Theodore S. Fay, so well known of former years as the author of many admirable papers, entitled "The Little Genius," is about sending a new novel "upon the waters." From the success of his last, and first, Norman Leslie, we anticipate for this an extensive sale.—That it will be well gotten up as far as typography is concerned, the public need no other assurance, than that it is in charge of the enterprising publishers, Harper & Brothers.

Guide to the Economy in Fuel.—This is a neatly prepared chart, estimating the comparative value of woods and coals. Its price is so reasonable, one shilling, that no real economist ought to be without it.—We are sure it must pave the way to the saving of many and odd penny, if not shilling.

To Correspondents.—"The last of his tribe, by Isabel, is filed for an insertion in our next; mean time we should be glad to hear from her again."

The prose tale "Styly Twitter," which the author assures us in a fact, shall appear at an early date. We hope it contains no personal allusions.

The rhythm of "Lines addressed to a sister" is so imperfect, that we are compelled something against our will, to decline publishing them. Why will writers pay so little deference to rhetoric?

The Past, Present and the Future, a prose composition which, by-the-way, we think well of, would use more space than we could allot to it in a single number, and is also of a character that would not appear well published in parts. The manuscript is at the author's disposal.

Substantial Emigrants.—A western paper states, that about 100 families of Germans and Norwegians, arrived at Milwaukee, a short time since, seeking farms and occupation. Many of the families have large sums of money. Some of them as high as $20,000. These are the right kind of people for the far west.

If the Secretaries of the different Lodges of I. O. F. will furnish a list of their recent elections, and other proceedings, we shall be happy to publish them.

INTELLIGENCE.

Destruction of the National Theatre, the French Protestant Church, the Dutch Reformed Church, and Zion's African Episcopal Church.—New York.

On Tuesday afternoon about half past four o'clock, the National Theatre, situated on the corner of Church and Leonard sts. was discovered that what is termed the gas room was on fire, and in a few minutes the whole of that large edifice was enveloped in flames. So rapid was the conflagration that very little, if any of the costly scenery, wardrobe, furniture, indeed any thing of value, could be saved.

The loss of property, exclusive of the burning, must have been very great, in the destruction of scenery furniture of the private boxes, green-room, dressing rooms, saloons &c, music, and wardrobes of the performers as well as that belonging to the manager.

The National Theatre was built by subscription some six or seven years ago, for the Italian opera, at a cost of $110,000, not including the ground, for which $65,000 was paid.

About two hundred and ten persons mechanics, laborers, supernumeraries, &c, about the theatre, have with their families, been entirely thrown out of employ, and several hundred others, more or less dependent on the establishment, will suffer by its destruction.

Fatal Sport.—Several young men went racoon hunting, near Batavia, while attempting to cut down a tree where the animal was secreted, were crushed by the fall of the trunk and two of them killed.

On Sunday last a schooner was capsized near Oswego, the captain, Carlisle, and all hands lost.

A lady advertises for sale in a Southern paper, one baboon, three tabby cats, and a parrot. She states that being married she has no further use for them.

A friend in Norfolk writes us under date of September 11, as follows: "A very melancholy accident occurred here yesterday afternoon. The wife of Mr. Benjamin Hart, went out in company with several others to pick black-berries, when a tree blew down, which in falling struck Mrs. H. on the head and fractured her skull so badly that she survived only three hours. She was brought home a corpse. Her husband is absent at the West.—St. Law. Rep.

Sad Accident.—A little girl, nine years of age, was run over by a butcher's cart in Laight street, by St. John's lane, yesterday noon; and her thigh broken and one of her little fingers cut clean off. She is the daughter of Mr. Card, living near by the accident in Hudson street, and was taken home to her parents.—N. Y. Dispatch.

Sickness at the South. Extract from a letter dated Augusta, Sept. 18.—The fever has continued to rage with unabated violence, carrying off about seven per day, out of a scattered population of about 500; and at this time some of our most valuable citizens are on the verge of eternity—perhaps to-night will tell the sad tale that one or more of our very eminent medical men have paid the last debt of nature. The suffering continues to be immense. Every day seems to add to the gloom, for not a day passes without some falling victims to the plague, whose valuable lives are dear to their friends and to the city.—The disease seems now to be raging with perhaps more malignity than at a former period. As for—business, you seldom hear it spoken of: sickness and death is all. "What deaths," and "what new cases!" Since the report of the board of health to-day we lost one of our most valuable citizens, William Rankin, Esq. one of our aldermen, who was devoted to the city and to the suffering poor—we have no longer his services.—What will be the end of this scourge that has visited our city remains to be seen; it has so far proved an awful visitation.

Shocking Occurrence.—The Charlottesville, Va. Advocate states that, while Jesse Garth and his lady, of that neighborhood, were looking at their cattle on Friday evening of last week, his Durham cow, which had a young calf by her side, made a furious attack upon Mrs. Garth, knocked her down, and gored and trampled her in such a shocking manner that her life was despaired of. Mr. G. who ran to the relief of his wife, was also knocked down, and sustained considerable injury. This cow had been procured from Connecticut at great expence, and was a particular favorite with Mr. and Mrs. G., and before this occurrence was tractable and well disposed animal. Mrs. G. wore a red bonnet on that occasion, which is the only cause that we have heard assigned for the attack on her.

The French Protestant Church—its Destruction.—This beautiful temple to the living God was one of the most chaste and classical buildings in the city, and the only one in which the Word of Life was dispensed in the French language. Its history is peculiarly interesting to the living, as the church has been matter of consolation to the dead. It might with propriety be called the Huguenot Church—for it was this band of the Cross who erected and endowed it. Many of the early worshippers are yet living, and among them we recollect the venerable John Pintard. On the revocation of the famous Edict of Nantz, (an Edict whose protection the Huguenots had enjoyed from the year 1576 to 1685,) by the wickedness of Louis the XIV., more than half a million of this suffering and pious people fled from their native France, to find a home and an asylum in distant countries, where they could worship God after the dictates of their own consciences and enjoy that peace and quiet which their mother country so cruelly refused. Many of them found an asylum in the New World, and settled in this city, New Rochelle, and in Ulster county. Soon after their arrival, viz: 1704, they built the ancient appearing church, which stood more than a century on Pine street, on the side on which now stands the Custom House. In 1814 this church was repaired, but not materially altered; its exterior form was nearly the same, there it stood, surrounded with its neat and silent burying ground, until 1832. It is a singular fact, that for many years the pious settlers at New Rochelle, having no place of worship, came on foot twenty miles to this church to worship, and returned on foot the same night. In 1832 the spirit of improvement had become so great, that the church and grounds were bought by speculators. The church was pulled down, and the dead were carefully removed. The church was then built at, and the congregation removed to, the corner of Franklin and Church sts. and was the beautiful building that is now in ruins. The congregation, having the means, will no doubt speedily rebuild it.

The number of pastors have been few indeed Mr. Rou was the first called; Mr. Moulinais followed: Mr. Verren, we believe, is his successor.—New York Express.

MARRIED.

On Monday morning, by the Rev. Mr. Leonard, Mr. Peter Leddy, to Miss E. Giffen, daughter of Mr. Wm. Giffen, all of this city.

On Wednesday afternoon, 25th inst. by the Rev. J. L. Hodge, Mr. Martin Blunt, of Pittsfield, Mass., to Miss Caroline. Cuyler, of this city.

At Troy, Charles Bellows, of Pittsfield, to Sarah E. Erkenbrach. Also, Gideon Safford, of Argyle, to Isabella Mathews. Also, James E. Hurd, to Angeline Rector. Also, James L. Bliss, of Mobile, to Lydia M. Brintnall. Also, Amos K. Hadley, to Eliza M. Hart. Also, Ami Brewster, to Louisa C. Davis. Also, Ariel Wager, to Harriet A. Ballou.

On Sunday evening, by the Rev. D. F. Page, Mr. James Patrick, to Miss Mary Ivery, all of this city.

On Wednesday evening, by the Rev. D. F. Page, Mr. Hamilton Trainor, of this city, to Miss Hester Neely, of New York.

On the 14th inst. by the Rev. Mr. Leonard, Mr. A. M. Purdy, to Miss E. C. Higham, all of this city.

At Vernon, on the 25th inst. by the Rev. H. P. Bogue Charles Kilbourn, Esqr. to Miss M. S. Sayles.

DIED.

At Washington, on the 18th inst. Mr. Mathew M. Cole, aged 39 years.

[Mr. Cole was a printer by profession, and for many years a resident of this city. Previous to his removal to Washington, where for the last 12 years he has been one of the head clerks in the Land Office, he was for several years connected with the public press at Sacket's Harbor, Hudson, and in this city. A close and unbroken intimacy, from early youth up, made us acquainted with his worth and talents; and we can with heartfelt affection blend our sympathies and tears with those of his bereaved connexions, in the loss which they and a large circle of friends, have sustained in this afflicting dispensation.—Editor.]

At Stillwater, Saratoga co., on the 22d inst. Miss M. J. Livingston, sister of the late Col. James Livingston, in the 80th year of her age.

At Mobile; on the 5th inst. Dr. Savillion Belknap, formerly of Cothen, Orange co.

At Goshen, Mrs. Abigail, wife of David Belknap.

In New York, on the 22d inst, J. Van Valkenberg, aged 29 years, formerly of this city.

In the village of Esperance, Schoharie co. Mrs. Hannah Pegg, wife of the Rev. John Pegg.

At Troy, Joseph Halsted, 62. At Petersburg, Jane, wife of Joshua A. Lewis, of Washington county. At Mobile, Job H. Greenman, 39.

THE BOY OF SHUNEM.

II. KINGS—CHAP. IV.

On Tablor's forehead, rising from the plain
To catch the breezes of the western main,
Where Kishon's waters start upon their race,
With their cool flood to lave old Carmels base;
From the proud apex of that lofty cone
Which stands a mountain, severed and alone,
Might Shunen's towers be seen, when Israel's glory shone.

With weary steps and fainting heart there trod
Through Shunems streets, a holy man of God;
His vesture coarse, a leathern girdle bound,
Nor notice sought, nor resting place he found,
'Till woman's eye his needy state espies,
And woman's care his every want supplies:
Then grateful tears bedewd the faithful Prophet's eyes.

Of when he passed the Rule's board was spread,
And there his weary frame obtained a bed;
With pious care a room for him they made,
And "make you here a home" the couple said;
The Prophet answered. "Hence full many a mile
"My God commands. My home is in His smile.
"What token shall I give to cheer your hearts the while.

"From love to God you helped me in in my need,
"Think ye that God will not such succor heed,
"What honors from the crown would ye possess?"
"Nay, courts, than this our home," would please usless,
The woman answered, rich in wisdom grown,
"We need no more, we live among our own;
"But though contended here, we still are here alone."

Shunem rejoiced; for to the favored one
Of all her Rulers, now was born a son.
Though peaceful still and happy was their home,
Joy! a new joy with this new gift has come.
An infant prattles, and a father hears,
A mother sheds a mother's grateful tears,
New cares attend the pair, with novel hopes and fears.

But who can say that earth has seen that good
Which man might not make evil, if he would.
E'en so the blessing granted to this pair,
Becomes at once their trouble and their snare.
Pleased with their boy, they would almost forget
That God who gave him, claims their love as yet,
And He in mercy then, their stray affections met.

When to his father's field the boy had sped,
The Sun with fatal powers salutes his head;
Now borne, his fair locks lifted by the breeze,
He's placed (fit couch) upon his mother's knees.
How anxious and how kind the mother's care!
How eloquent in grief the mothers prayer!
'Tis noon. His hand is cold! A childless mother's there.

How oft O woman! has the poet sought
To show the Love with which thy heart is fraught.
Be ours to view the source from whence it springs,
Thy Faith, the holy faith that trusts all things.
Though bending to each breath of sympathy,
In time of need a more than hero she,
While faith supports her bark on life's tempestuous sea.

To Carmel's mount with dangerous speed she rides,
And Carmels seer scarce for her coming bides;
Anticipating now her tale of woe,
With hasty step he bids Gehazi go
To lay his staff upon the stiffened clay:
Gehazi goes, revolving in the way
The marvellous command he hastens to obey.

The mother knows too well the errand vain,
And now her anguished spirit pleads again,
Until the seer the weary way has sped
And kneels in prayer beside the infant's bed.
For stricken hearts the prophet intercedes
And for the child of prayer and promise pleads,
A condescending God the prayer and promise heeds.

Mother in Israel, is it well with thine?
To wisdom's ways wouldst thou their feet incline?
Then pray in faith, nor doubt nor dare to fear,
Thy Intercessor's stronger than the seer,
Now let the sequel of the tale revive
Your drooping powers more earnestly to strive.
Shunem is glad. The boy was dead, and is alive.

LINES

ON THE DEATH OF AUGUSTUS C—.

Thus all the brightest flowers close,—
Our fairest hopes are first to die—
The bliss that once serenely rose,
Hath sunk beneath the mourner's sigh!

Though his fair brow I never saw,
Yet his young fame had won mine ear;
And that which once a smile could draw,
Now claims the homage of a tear.

For Genius 'round the fragile stem
Had fondly ope'd each budding sense,
And beamed from youth's own diadem
The rays of man's intelligence.

But death, whose envy knows no love,
But marked the bloom and laid it low;
And mem'ry weeps the earth above
Where one so bright must sleep below.

Yet why grieve o'er the silent sleep
That hides him from this world of ill,
Or wish he'd won fame's dizzy steep
That ne'er requites the human will?

Ah—mourn him as a pleasant eve,
That changed, too soon, 'o darksome night,
And with the kindling rapture weave
His smile of love and eye of light!

SONG—

A VINDICATION—BY T. H. CUSHMAN ESQR.

Oh, say not we soon can forget
The hearts that were fondly our own—
Oh, say not the tear of regret,
Is woman's, dear woman's, alone!
We part with a smile in our eyes,
Our farewells may lightly be sighed;
Yet dreary the earth and the skies,
When forms and not feelings divide.

We look then on days that are past,
As spectres deceiving our gaze;
We feel like a mariner cast
Where echo in mockery plays.
Oh, yes! man while stemming the storm,
Though seeming forgetful of love,
Still worships the heart and the form,
That came to his breast like a dove.
Albany, 1838.

WHAT I HATE.

I hate the toothach, when with maddening jumps,
Like torrent wild it raves among the stumps;
I hate the whole dire cotolouge of aches,
Distempers, fevers hot, and ague shakes.

I hate the mad dogs, snakes, dandies, fleas, and bugs,
Tea parties, wild cats, toads, and whiskey jugs,
Hard times, bad roads, spoiled fish, and broken banks,
Stale news, cold soup, light purse, and lawyers thanks.

I hate long stories, and short ears of corn,
A costly farm-house and a shabby barn.
More curs than pigs, no books, but many guns,
Sore toes, tight shoes, old debts and paper duns.

I hate tight lacing, and loose conversation,
Abundant gab and little information,
The food that sings in bed and snores in meeting,
Who laughs while talking and talks much while eating.

I hate the sot, who grappled to my cost,
Sens forth the nasty vapours of his throat,
It senseless jargon, fording me to smell
His stench emitting reservoir of swill.

THE FAULTS OF A MAN, BY A LADY.

A thousand faults in man we find—
Merit in him we seldom meet;
Man's inconstant and unkind;
Man is false and indiscreet;
Man is capricious, jealous, free,
Vain, insincere, and trifling, too;
Yet still the women all agree,
For want of better—he must do!

MASONIC.

THE BEAUTIES OF MASONRY.

To the mind that delights in viewing the records of the past, Freemasonry presents an object that cannot fail to interest and please. The very obscurity which surrounds its origin, only tends to increase the deep interest it is calculated to excite.

Opinions have been various in relation to its origin. Some have supposed that it was instituted during the Crusades, and was designed as a milder and more peaceful form of chivalry, "smoothing the wrinkled front of war," and binding together as brothers, foes, of country and religion diverse. Others have placed its origin farther back—and others, still with feelings dark as Mahomed's angel of death, have denounced it as an anti-social conspiracy, dangerous to government, morals and religion; instituted to harbor in its secret chambers, the foe to both State and Church.

That Masonry has existed from remote antiquity, there can be no doubt. Yet we do not think that it can, in its speculative character, be traced farther back than the building of the Temple. Long previous to that time, it is stated there were Lodges in Egypt, in which the exact sciences were taught, and the secrets of architecture preserved. Numbers of the workmen, members of these Lodges, were doubtless employed by King Solomon, who seizing every occasion to magnify the God of Israel, and diffuse his name abroad, gave to the degrees then existing their speculative form, reserving a still higher honor for those who should prove worthy of its reception, on the completion and dedication of the house. In this, however, he was in some degree disappointed, but the sequel shows that an honor of this sort was conferred; and notwithstanding it is probable that the traditions of that degree have been in some measure vitiated by interpolations, it yet stands as convincing proof of its origin at the period referred to. I am induced to form these opinions from the character and design of the two first degrees, and the data furnished by the third; every Master Mason will understand.

A writer of considerable research, in "A History of Freemasonry," compiled for the "Amaranth and Masonic Garland," traces the Order from the earliest ages of antiquity, through the Elusian and Dionysian mysteries, to the building of the Temple, and from thence thro' the Essenes and Kadeans, to the fraternity of builders during the middle ages, and until the establishment of the Grand Lodge of York, England. The reasoning of this writer is strong, especially in relation to the identity of the Essenes and Masonry. We are disposed to think that this history is calculated to throw great light on the origin and progress of the Institution. Of one thing, however, we are certain, that Masonry is not of modern origin; but that it has existed from a period very remote; and from its very character, that of secrecy, and being confined to a favored few, it is difficult to follow its history.

But little more than a century has passed away since this germ of benevolence and good feeling was wafted over the blue waters of the Atlantic, and found a genial soil in this western world. The first Grand Lodge was established in Boston in 1733. In 1734, this body granted a charter for a Lodge in Philadelphia, appointing Benjamin Franklin, Master. In 1772, by virtue of a warrant from the Earl of Dumfries, Joseph Warren was appointed Grand Master of Masons in America. Different Lodges at this period existed in several of the colonies, but the revolutionary struggle intervening, interrupted the intercourse between the brethren, and in some degree retarded the advance of the Order. It was not until the balmy breath of peace brove back the "red clouds of war," and spanned the dark and stormy heavens with the bow of friendship, the "sign and token" of reconciliation, that any extensive efforts were made to permanency to the operations of the Craft. The Grand Lodge of Massachusetts was the first to move in the grand design. In obedience to that fundamental principle of the craft which requires obedience to the constitutional authority of the country in which they reside, it assumed elective authority, and appointed Grand Officers. This example was followed in other parts of the Union. At present, independent Grand Lodges exist in every State.

In reviewing the history of our Institution we shall find in our father-land, and in our own country, few of their distinguished sons in the cabinet, the field, or the higher walks of literature and science, who have not laid their offering on the Masonic altar, and pledged their names in defence of its purity and innocency. And at the present day, no association of men bears upon its roll of members, so many distinguished names. Yet with all these external evidences of its character no institution has been so foully assailed.

We are convinced that in many instances the true line of the Institution has been lost sight of, and too much importance attached to ceremonials; the result has been, and ever will be, when this is the case, that what was valuable when united, becomes senseless when disjointed. Do not understand us as lightly esteeming our expressive ceremonies. I would not suffer the sacrilegious hand of modern innovation to touch one solitary act in performing them. We regard them as relics of antiquity, the error of disjointing them from their moral is what we censure. Think you that the skeptic's laugh at the simple ceremonials of Christianity would be empty and unmeaning mirth, if they were separated from the great events they are designed to teach? So with our own; and the man who rejects the weighty, because he cannot appreciate the lighter matters of the Order, gives but poor evidence of the soundness of his head, or goodness of his heart.

There is no lesson taught in the rituals of Masonry, that is calculated to make men worse than it finds them. There is no precept there which does not breathe the purest morality—that is not sanctioned by the Word of God, and the approval of good men. Believe us, my brethren, when we say, that a man's entering a Lodge no more makes him a Mason, than entering a Church makes one a Christian; for unless his heart be prepared by holy desires, and virtuous affections, the lessons of purity we teach will be to him as "the sounding brass and the tinkling cymbal."

Masonry may be regarded as a science of moral virtues, teaching by tools and implements of architecture, wise and salutary truths and duties. Through all the degrees of the Order, this important point is steadily kept in view, that as Masons we are bound by paramount obligations to society, and as component parts in the social compact, are pledged to the support of the laws by which its government is directed. No act which would in any degree disturb the perfection of the civil or moral code, can find one approving smile from the genius of Masonry. Arnold, in his "Dutch Dictionary," has beautifully remarked, "Freemasonry is a moral order instituted by virtuous men, with the praise-worthy design of recalling to our remembrance the most sublime truths, in the midst of the most innocent and social pleasures, founded on liberality, brotherly love and charity. However much, therefore, Masons may disregard the solemn engagements they entered into, the principles of the Institution can never be charged with having corrupted their minds, or alienated their affections from the holy cause of virtue. Will the young Craftsman follow me in a very brief survey of the important lessons taught in the several degrees through which he has passed, in the pursuit of that knowledge taught by speculative Masonry.

The first lesson, secrecy, is one of vast importance. No negative virtue was more highly prized amongst the ancients, and none in its practice confers more extensive benefits on human society. It establishes private friendships, preserves peace in communities, and throws a holy charm around the domestic relation, which shelters it from the rude gaze of the prying eye. It produces a oneness of thought, feeling and affection, and assures us that we are safe in opening the inmost recesses of the soul, to the gaze of the being who keeps a silent tongue. Let the man who doubts the importance of this virtue, ask himself the question, if every thought uttered, or act committed, were held up to the public gaze, what would be the result? Would not friendly communion be at an end, and the sure ground of confidence be destroyed? That this virtue may not be abused, the mind is led in a most solemn manner to a recollection of its entire dependence upon Almighty God, and the necessity of unshaken faith in Him. I confess my brethren, I have never pronounced this important duty, together with its striking exhortation to confidence, that my mind has not been impressed with a sense of the glory and grandeur of Deity, and I have always thought that the candidate realizes, at least for the time being, the same emotions. The various symbols of light, and the holy Bible as the rule and guide of faith and practice, so opportunely presented, and so strongly recommended to your attention, together with the emblem of divided time, by attention to which you are enabled usefully to fill up your days, are not to be regarded as unnecessary appendages and useless instructions. There is no duty thus taught to be neglected. As Masons, your faith is pledged to the performance of the whole, as the emblem of innocence and badge of purity, which it is presented with the instructions alluded to, indicates; for it is by constant and unflinching attention thereto, that you will be enabled to prepare yourselves as living stones for that Temple not made with hands, ETERNAL IN THE HEAVENS.

The important relation you now sustain, brings fully to view the observance of strict temperance in the government of the appetite and passions; prudence in the regulation of all the desires and actions; fortitude to bear the ills of a wicked and perplexing world, and justice, strict, impartial justice to God, yourselves, and your fellow-men. But shall we proceed farther, and view the beauties of the Order as we progress step by step, towards the holiest place! Behold how the delightful riches of science present themselves to our view! Centuries gone by reveal their treasures, preserved in archives that "inundation and conflagration assail in vain."—Again is the solemn obligation to reverence and adore the glorious Creator and keep holy his Sabbaths, solemnly presented.

• And let "that hieroglyphic bright,
Which none but Craftsmen ever knew," deeply, my brethren, impress its sublime interpretation upon your hearts, for then, and then only, will you be prepared to enter the sad and silent chamber of mourning, to sympathize with the friends of departed merit, and to enjoy the triumph that breaks the moody silence of the tomb, and hails the sunlight form of immortality, as casting aside the gloomy drapery of the dead, and rising from the rubbish of the grave, it wings its glorious way to the feet of the Eternal, and amid the songs of adoring angels, and redeemed men, proclaims that through the merits of Judah's Conquering Lion, our bodies shall arise, and become as incorruptible as our souls! Hail glorious truth! transporting thought! that while

"An angel's arm can't snatch us from the grave, Legions of angels can't confine us there."

As you progress beyond this interesting scene, new and increasing lights burst upon the mind, elucidating and confirming what precedes; until having passed the Overseer's square, and aided in the recovery and preservation of those valuable treasures that stamp with importance the history of the ancient Craft, you gain, by purity of heart and rectitude of conduct, the inseparable companions of truth, admission into the earthly sanctuary, faint emblem of that holy place on high, where our great High Priest has gone, by the sprinkling of his own blood, and to which we hope to gain admission by the signal of eternal truth.

If you have proceeded thus far, without having your moral feelings purified, your thoughts elevated and refined, I pray you review your past life, in order to its amendment, for be you well assured, you have not deserved the honors conferred upon you by misplaced Masonic confidence.

To render to the Deity "that rational homage which becomes the creature to his Creator"—to revere his Sabbaths, and receive his Word as the rule of faith and practice, is so obvious a duty, that its neglect is a strong evidence of a want of moral soundness, and correct notions of propriety; and especially so when Masons are the delinquents.

MISCELLANY.

A SKETCH FROM LIFE.

An old fellow, whose name we veil under that of Hunka, died in the adjacent town of Charlestown last week, who would have been a capital subject for Dickens, and might have sat to Scott for his inimitable character of Trapbois, in the Fortunes of Nigel. He was a miserly, close-fisted old hunka, a real skinflint, who, it was supposed by his neighbors had scraped together, as such characters will, in one way and another, a considerable amount of money. This was not known however. Some said that he had money concealed in the earth—others judged from the slovenly manner in which he lived and dressed, that he had nothing but the few acres which he cultivated. He lived like the poorest, shutting his door upon every intruder—till at last death knocked and he was obliged to open. During his sickness he was wont to send daily for a small purse of silver and gold, hid in the wall of his cellar, which he would count over with that feeling of painful delight which inhabits the bosom of the true miser alone. Disease, however, wore down his frame rapidly, and at last he was unequal to the task of going through his daily custom of counting pieces, in his purse, and could only, as they were displayed before him, pat them softly with his hands, as a lady pats her favorite dog on the back.

One day during the last stages of the disease, he sent for a neighbor, and expressed a wish to impart a secret to him. "Go down cellar (said he) and in the further corner you will find a tub. Raise it, and you will see a shingle, beneath which is a box." The individual followed the directions, and found a box of specie.—"Now go to another corner"—said the miser describing the place. Another box was found embedded in the earth. A day or two after when he found he must soon leave all his earthly treasures, he desired to be raised up in his bed. His request was granted, when he immediately reached out his skinny hand beneath his pillow, and lo! another box was found cunningly concealed, containing about five hundred dollars in French gold pieces, which it is understood he took from one of the banks about the time of the suspension of specie payments.

All these buried treasures were given in the keeping of his neighbor for the benefit of others. He said there was one other box, but that he didn't like to tell where it was, as he might want it himself. He, however, consented to write the place of interment on a piece of paper, so that the secret might not perish with him. He died soon after, and his hidden treasures—no inconsiderable sum—were counted over at the close of the funeral ceremonies.

Thus died, at an advanced age, one whose only aspiration, through a long life, seems to have been the hoarding of specie and burying it, where it could be of no earthly benefit to any one—a perfect miser—a lover of money, not for the blessings which it might diffuse around him, but for its own sake—not for the name of possessing it—for he feigned and was thought to be poor—but because the mere habit of acquisition had become a passion, and the bare consciousness of possession was a pleasure—a phantom of delight, which he could hug with rapture to his bosom. Well will it be for such if they have laid up treasures in Heaven as well as on earth. But we will not sermonize—the lesson conveyed by the sketch is left with the reader—Claremont N. H. Eagle.

HOW TO MAKE A QUARTERN LOAF OUT OF A DEAL BOARD.

To make wood-flour in perfection, according to Professor Autenrieth, the wood, after being thoroughly stripped of its bark, is to be sawed transversely into disks, of about an inch in diameter. The saw-dust is to be preserved, and the disks are to be beaten to fibres, in a pounding-mill. The fibres and saw-dust, mixed together, are next to be deprived of every thing harsh and bitter which is soluble in water, by boiling them where fuel is abundant, or by subjecting them for a longer time to the action of cold water, which is easily done by enclosing them in a sling sack, which they only fill, and beating the sack with a stick, or treading it with the feet in a rivulet. The whole is then to be completely dried, either in the sun, or by fire, and repeatedly ground in a flour mill. The ground wood is next baked into small flat cakes, with water, rendered slightly mucilaginous by the addition of some decoction of linseed mallow stalks and leaves, lime-tree bark, or any other such substance. Professor Autenrieth prefers marsh-mallow roots, of which one ounce renders eighteen quarts of water sufficiently mucilaginous, and these serve to form four pounds and a half wood-flour into cakes. These cakes are baked until they are brown on the surface. After this, they are broken to pieces, and again ground, until the flour pass through a fine bolting cloth; and upon the fineness of the flour does its fitness to make bread depend. The flour of a hard wood, such as beech, requires the process of baking and grinding to be repeated. Wood-flour does not ferment so readily as wheaten-flour; but the Professor found fifteen pounds of birch-wood flour, with three pounds of sour wheat-leaven, and two pounds of wheat-flour, mixed up with eight measures of new milk, yielded thirty-six pounds of very good bread. The learned Professor tried the nutritious properties of wood-flour, in the first instance, upon a young dog; afterwards he fed two pigs upon it; and then, taking courage from the success of the experiment, he attacked it himself. His family party, he says, ate it in the form of gruel or soup, dumplings and pancakes, all made with as little of any other ingredient as possible; and found them palatable, and quite wholesome. Are we, then, instead of looking upon a human being stretched upon a bare plank, as he picture of extreme want and wretchedness, to regard him as reposing in the lap of abundance, and consider henceforth, the common phrase, "bed and board," as compounded of synonymous terms.—Quarterly Review.

Coffee in the Desert.—It is astonishing what effects the smallest portion of the strong coffee made by the Arabs has; no greater stimulus is required in the longest and most arduous journeys. It is universal throughout the East, but more used by the Arabs of the desert than by any other class; they will often go without food for twenty-four hours if they can but have recourse to the little dram of coffee, which, from the small compass in which they carry the apparatus, and the readiness with which it is made, they can always command. I can vouch for both its strengthening and exhilarating effect; it answers these purposes better than I can conceive it possible a dram of spirits could do to those who indulge in it.—Major Skinner's Adventures in the East which is greatly neglected or wholly overlooked, is the art of reading aloud. It is a most healthy employment when used discreetly, since exercise is as advantageous to the lungs as to all other parts of the human frame. The ability to read aloud agreeably is also a truly domestic acquirement; it will be another link in the chain which binds men to their hearths; it will amuse the young, cheer the old, and instruct the ignorant.—Journal of Education.

READING ALOUD.—One of the accomplishments which we wish to see cultivated among females, and

THE WATER OF THE NILE.

The water of Egypt, (says the Abbe Mascrier,) is so delicious, that one would not wish the heat should be less, nor to be delivered from the sensation of thirst. The Turks find it so exquisitely charming that they excite themselves to drink of it by eating salt. It is a common saying among them, that if Mohammed had drunk of it, he would have begged God not to have died, that he might always have done it. When the Egyptians undertake the pilgrimage to Mecca, or go out of their country on any other account, they speak of nothing but the pleasure they shall find at their return, in drinking the Nile water. There is nothing to be compared to this satisfaction; it surpasses in their esteem that of seeing their relations again, and their families. All those who have tasted this water, allow that they never met with the like in any other place. When a person drinks of it for the first time, it seems difficult to believe that it is not water prepared by art. It has something in it so inexpressibly agreeable and pleasing to the taste, that it deserves that rank among waters that Champagne has among wines. But its most valuable quality is that it is exceedingly salutary. It never incommodes, let it be drunk in what quantity it may; this is so true that it is no uncommon thing to see some persons drink three buckets of it in a day, without inconvenience!

It is right to observe that the water of the Nile is that which is alone intended in these high encomiums. Well water in Egypt is detestable and unwholesome. Fountains are so rare that they are a kind of prodigy in that country. Rain-water it would be vain to attempt preserving, as scarcely any falls in Egypt.

How peculiarly forcible and expressive are the words of Moses to Pharaoh. "The Egyptians shall loathe to drink of the water of the river." That water in which they so much delighted,—that which they preferred to all other water in the world, and to which they had been so long accustomed, should become so hateful, that they would turn away from it in disdain, and instead of it drink well water, which, in their country, is, of all other kinds of water, the most detestable!—Harmer's Observations.

A PERSIAN DOCTOR AND THE ELECTRIC MACHINE.

At Isfahan all were delighted with the electric machine, except one renowned old doctor and lecturer of the college, who, envious of the popularity gained by this display of superior science, contended publicly, that the effects produced were moral, not physical,—that the mummery we practised, and the state of nervous agitation we excited, which produced an ideal shock; but he expressed his conviction, that a man of true firmness of mind would stand unmoved by all we could produce out of our glass bottle, as he scoffingly termed our machine. He was invited to the experiment and declared his readiness to attend the next visit the Begler-Beg paid the Elchee.

The day appointed soon arrived. The Begler-Beg came with a numerous retinue, and, amongst others, the doctor, whom we used to call "Red Stockings," from his usually wearing scarlet hose! He was we found, notwithstanding his learning and reputed science, often made an object of mirth in the circles of the great and wealthy at Isfahan, from the pertinacity with which he maintained his dogmas.

The philosopher, notwithstanding various warnings, came boldly up, took hold of the chain with both hands, planted his feet firmly, shut his teeth, and evidently called forth all his resolution to resist the shock. It was given, and poor Red Stockings dropt on the floor as if he had been shot. There was a momentary alarm; but on his almost instant recovery, and the Elchee explaining that the effect had been increased by the determination to resist it, all gave way to one burst of laughter. The good natured philosopher took no offence. He muttered something about the re-action of the feelings after being overstrained, but admitted there was more in the glass bottle than he had anticipated.—Sketches of Persia.

MUNGO PARK IN THE DESERT.

I was obliged to sit all day without victuals, in the shade of a tree; and the night threatened to be very uncomfortable; for the wind rose, and there was great appearance of a heavy rain, and the wild beasts are so very numerous in the neighbourhood, that I should have been under the necessity of climbing up the tree, and resting amongst the branches. About sunset however, as I was preparing to pass the night in this manner, and had turned my horse loose, that he might graze at liberty a woman, returning from the labours of the field, stopped to observe me, and perceiving that I was weary and dejected inquired into my situation, which I briefly explained to her; whereupon, with looks of great compassion, she took up my saddle and bridle, and told me to follow her. Having conducted me into her hut, she lighted up a lamp, spread a mat on the floor, and told me I might remain there for the night. Finding that I was hungry, she said she would procure me something to eat. She accordingly went out, and returned in a short time with a very fine fish; which, having caused to be half-broiled upon some embers, she gave me for supper. The rites of hospitality being thus performed towards a stranger in distress, my worthy benefactress, pointing to the mat, and telling me I might sleep there without apprehension, called to the female part of her family, who had stood gazing on me all the while in fixed astonishment, to resume their task of spinning cotton, in which they continued to employ themselves great part of the night. They lightened their labours by songs, one of which was composed extempore, for I was myself the same subject of it. It was sung by one of the young women, the rest joining in a sort of chorus. The air was sweet and plaintive, and the words literally translated were these: "The winds roared and the rains fell. The poor white man, faint and weary, came and sat under our tree. He has no mother to bring him milk; no wife to grind his corn. Chorus, Let us pity the white man, no mother has he, &c." Trifling as this recital may appear to the reader, to a person in my situation the circumstance was affecting in the highest degree. I was oppressed by such unexpected kindness: and sleep fled from my eyes. In the morning, I presented my compassionate landlady with two of the four brass buttons which remained on my waistcoat: the only recompense I could make her.—Travels in Africa

Illustration of the Solar system—If we suppose the earth to be represented by a globe a foot in diameter, the distance of the sun from the earth will be about two miles; the diameter of the sun, on the same supposition, will be something above one hundred feet, and consequently his bulk as might be made up of two hemispheres, each about the size of the dome of St. Paul's. The moon will be thirty feet from us, and her diameter three inches, about that of a cricket-ball. Thus the sun would much more than occupy all the space within the moon's orbit. On the same scale, Jupiter would be above ten miles from the sun, and Uranus forty. We see then how thinly scattered through space are the heavenly bodies. The fixed stars would be at an unknown distance; but, probably, if all distances were thus diminished, no star would be nearer to such a one-foot earth than the moon now is to us. On such a terrestrial globe the highest mountains would be about 1-8th of an inch high, and consequently just distinguishable. We may imagine, therefore, how imperceptible would be the largest animals. The whole organised covering of such a globe would be quite undiscoverable by the eye, except perhaps by colour, like the bloom on a plum. In order to restore this earth and its inhabitants to their true dimensions, we must magnify them forty millions of times; and to preserve the proportions we must increase equally the distances of the sun and of the stars from us. They seem thus to pass off into infinity; yet each of them thus removed has its system of mechanical and perhaps of organic processes going on upon its surface. But the arrangements of organic life which we can see with the naked eye are few compared with those the microscope detects. We know that we may magnify objects thousands of times, and and still discover fresh complexities of structure: if we suppose, therefore, that we increase every particle of matter in our universe in such a proportion, in length, breadth, and thickness, we may conceive that we tend thus to bring before our apprehension a true estimate of the quantity of organised adaptations which are ready to testify the extent of the Creator's power.—Whewell's Treatise.

ARTISANS IN PERSIA.

The king is considered to have a general right to the labour of artisans: but he does not commonly exercise that right, receiving instead a certain tax, the amount of which varies according to the man's income. But if a man gets a reputation for any particular excellence or skill in any trade, the king, or the governor of the province where he is, sends for him and makes him work for the monarch, and for the courtiers and great men, and he may think himself well off if he can get them to pay him even such miserable wages as may enable him just to keep himself from starving. This makes every man anxious to avoid the reputation of being an expert workman, or of having made improvements in his arts. Mr. Fraser, in his "Narrative of a Journey into Khorassan," mentions a man who made some improvements in pottery, so far as to manufacture a sort of porcelain, resembling tolerable china ware. His fame quickly spread, and soon reached the court. When the king heard of it, he sent an order for the man to repair immediately to the capital and make china for the Shah. The poor fellow, who knew the consequences, was terribly frightened at this order. He went, however, but not to make china. He scraped together all the money he could, and sold every thing he had to raise a bribe for the prime minister, whom he entreated to tell the king that he was not the man who made the china; that the real potter had run away, nobody knew where, and that he himself had been put under restraint by mistake, and prayed to be released. The prime minister put the money in his pocket, and told the story to the king, who sent a release to the poor man, who joyfully returned home vowing that he would never more make a bit of china, or attempt any kind of improvement as long as he lived. You see how this must tend to keep down the minds of the people, and prevent every kind of improvement.—Travels in Persia.

SAGACITY OF THE GREAT NORTHERN BEARS.

On one occasion, a bear was seen to swim cautiously to a large rough piece of ice, on which two female walrus were lying asleep with their cubs. The wily animal crept up some hammocks behind the party, and with his fore-feet loosened a large block of ice: this, with the help of his nose and paws, he rolled and carried until immediately over the head of the sleepers, when he let it fall on one of the old animals, which was instantly killed. The other walrus with its cubs rolled into the water: but the younger one of the stricken female remained by its dam: on this helpless creature the bear now leaped down, and thus completed the destruction of two animals which it would not have ventured to attack openly. The stratagems practised in taking the large seal are not much less to be admired. These creatures are remarkably timid, and for that reason always lie to bask or sleep on the very edge of the pieces of floating ice, so that on the slightest alarm they can by one roll tumble themselves into their favourite element. They are extremely restless, constantly moving their head from side to side, and sleeping very short naps. As with all wild creatures, they turn their attention to the direction of the wind, as if expecting danger from that quarter. The bear, on seeing his intended prey, gets quietly in the water, and swims until he is leeward of him, from whence, by frequent short dives, he silently makes his approaches, and so arranges his distance, that at the last dive he comes up to the spot where the seal is lying. If the poor animal attempts to escape by rolling into the water, he falls into the bears clutches; if, on the contrary, he lies still, his destroyer makes a powerful spring, kills him on the ice, and devours him at leisure.—Kings Narrative.

THE SHORTEST WAY TO MURDER CHARACTER.

"Profess great friendship for the man, tell how much you love him; proclaim how many excellent traits he possesses; and then with a very sanctified look, and most impressive sigh, express your fear, yes, your FEAR, that all is not as it should be! Whisper suspicion, and let conjecture with giant strength work out the ruin!" He who understands human nature in its deeper workings of damnable cruelty, and selfish artifice, says a certain shrewd writer, will mark the man who stabs another under the cloak of pretended affection. The pretence has a lie, adds he, on the face of it. True affection would never, whisper a suspicion, save to the concerned." "Never trust that man who comes to you whining over his regard for another, while his tongue is a drawn sword to wound and kill; meet him promptly with a charge of his hypocrisy, and he will shrink with meanness before you."

The Company of Books.—It is chiefly through books that we enjoy intercourse with superior minds; and these invaluable means of communication are in the reach of all. In the best books great men talk to us, give us their most precious thoughts, and pour their souls into ours. God be thanked for books! They are the voices of the distant and the dead, and make us heirs of the spiritual life of past ages. Books are the true levellers. They give to all who will faithfully use them the society, the spiritual presence of the best and greatest of our race. No matter how poor I am; no matter though the prosperous of my own time will not enter and take up their abode under my roof—if Milton will cross my threshold to sing to me of Paradise; and Shakspeare to open to me the worlds of imagination and the workings of the human heart; and Franklin to enrich me with his practical wisdom—I shall not pine for want of intellectual companionship, and I may become a cultivated man though excluded from what is called the best society in the place where I live. Nothing can supply the place of books. They are cheering or soothing companions in solitude, illness, affliction. Let every man, if possible, gather some good books under his roof.—Canning.

The Devil to Pay.—This phrase, doubtless, originated in a printing-office, on some Saturday night's settlement of weekly wages. "John," says the publisher to the book-keeper, "how stands the cash account?" "Small balance on hand, sir," "Let's see," rejoined the publisher, "how far will that go towards satisfying the hands?" John begins to figure arithmetically; so much due to Potkins, so much to Typus, so much to Grubbe, and so on, through a dozen dittos. The publisher stands aghast. "Here is not money enough by a jugful." "No, sir; and, besides, there is the devil to pay."

WEST POINT, (Ga.) Sept. 18.

Melancholy Occurrence.—An occurrence, which resulted in the death of four men, citizens of the adjoining county of Chambers, in the state of Alabama, was detailed to us yesterday; and from the respectability of the source we have no doubt of its truth. We have not been able to obtain the names of the sufferers.

It appears that a well, in the neighborhood of Standing Rock, in the county above mentioned, having failed in yielding its usual supply of water, the owner determined to have it cleaned out. A person was let down by the well bucket and rope, but showed no signs of action when at the bottom—he was called to, but did not answer. A second proposed to go down and ascertain what was the matter, and he also, as soon as he arrived at the bottom, became supine and silent. A third proposed to go down, with the understanding that he was to be drawn up as soon as he called out, the persons present then suspecting for the first time that there was some mephitic gas at the bottom of the well. He went down, but it was only to join his unfortunate companions. When he got nearly to the foot of the well, he called to be drawn up; but when about half way up, he fell from the bucket! A fourth then proposed that he should be lashed fast, and he would descend with the understanding also that he should be hauled up as soon as he called out. He had descended but little more than half way when he gave the word; they drew him up quickly, but had barely time to unlash him before life was extinct. The other three were then taken out of the well with grapples, but none of them showed the least signs of life—the vital spark was forever extinguished! This melancholy catastrophe happened on Thursday, and the bodies of the unfortunate sufferers were all consigned to the grave on Friday last.

Thus have four human lives been destroyed and their spirits hastened to eternity, for the want of a small share of caution. A well should never be descended, when there is the least haze or appearance of vapor within it, without first trying it by introducing therein a lighted candle or torch: if the light will continue to burn there is no danger, but if it is extinguished in its descent, or as soon as it arrives at the bottom the utmost caution should be observed in descending.

Shocking.—A child in Juniata county, Pa. left alone in the kitchen, reached to get a knife from the knife case, and falling plunged it up to the hilt through the temple into the brain.

POPULAR TALES.

THE ABENCERRAGE.—A SPANISH TALE.

On the summit of a craggy hill, a spur of the mountains of Ronda, stands the castle of Allora, now a mere ruin, infested by bats and owlets, but in old times one of the strong border holds of the Christians, to keep watch upon the frontiers of the warlike kingdom of Granada, and to hold the Moors in check. It was a post always confided to some well-tried commander; and, at the time of which we treat, was held by Rodrigo de Narvaez, a veteran famed both among Moors and Christians, not only for his hardy feats of arms, but also for that magnanimous courtesy which should ever be entwined with the sterner virtues of the soldier.

The castle of Allora was a mere part of his command; he was Alcayde, or military governor of Antiquera, but he passed most of his time at this frontier post, because its situation on the borders gave more frequent opportunity for those adventurous exploits which were the delight of the Spanish chivalry. His garrison consisted of fifty chosen cavaliers, all well mounted and well appointed; with these he kept vigilant watch upon the Moslems, patrolling the roads, and paths, and defiles of the mountains, so that nothing could escape his eye; and now and then signaling by some dashing foray into the very Vega of Granada.

On a fair and beautiful night in summer, when the freshness of the evening breeze had tempered the heat of day, the worthy Alcayde sallied forth, with nine of his cavaliers, to patrol the neighborhood, and seek adventures. They rode quietly and cautiously, lest they should be overheard by Moorish scout or traveler; and kept along ravines and hollow ways, lest they should be betrayed by the glittering of the full moon upon their armour. Coming to where the road divided, the Alcayde directed five of his cavaliers to take one of the branches, while he, with the remaining four, would take the other. Should either party be in danger, the blast of a horn was to be the signal to bring their comrades to their aid.

The party of five had not proceeded far, when, in passing through a defile overhung with trees, they heard the voice of a man singing. They immediately concealed themselves in a grove on the brow of a declivity, up which the stranger would have to ascend. The moonlight, which left the grove in deep shadow, lit up the whole person of the wayfarer as he advanced, and enabled them to distinguish his dress and appearance with perfect accuracy. He was a Moorish cavalier; and his poble demeanour, graceful carriage, and splendid attire, showed him to be of lofty rank. He was superbly mounted on a dapple-grey steed, of powerful frame and generous spirit, and magnificently caparisoned. His dress was a marlota, or tunic, and an albornoz of crimson damask fringed with gold. His Tunisian turban, of many folds, was of silk and cotton striped, and bordered with golden fringe. At his girdle hung a scimitar of Damascus steel, with loops and tassels of silk and gold. On his left arm he bore an ample target, and his right hand grasped a long double-pointed lance. Thus equipped, he sat negligently on his steed, as one who dreamed of no danger, gazing on the moon, and singing, with sweet and manly voice, a Moorish love-ditty.

Just opposite the place where the Spanish cavaliers were concealed, was a small fountain in the rock, beside the road, to which the horse turned to drink; the rider threw the reins on his neck, and continued his song.

The Spanish cavaliers conferred together; they were all so pleased with the gallant and gentle appearance of the Moor that they resolved not to harm, but to capture him, which, in his negligent mood, promised to be an easy task; rushing, therefore, from their concealment, they thought to surround and seize him. Never were men more mistaken. To gather up his reins, wheel round his steed; brace his buckler, and couch his lance, was the work of an instant; and there he sat, fixed like a castle in his saddle, beside the fountain.

The Christian cavaliers checked their steeds, and reconnoitred him warily, loath to come to an encounter which must end in his destruction.

The Moor now held a parley: "If you be true knights," said he, "and seek for honorable fame, come on singly, and I am ready to meet each succession; but if you be mere lurkers of the road, intent on spoil, come all at once, and do your worst!"

The cavaliers communed for a moment apart, when one, advancing singly, exclaimed: "Although no law of chivalry obliges us to risk the loss of a prize when clearly in our power, yet we willingly grant, as a courtesy, what we might refuse as a right. Valiant Moor! defend thyself!"

So saying, he wheeled, took proper distance, couched his lance, and putting spurs to his horse, made at the stranger. The latter met him in mid career, transpierced him with his lance, and threw him headlong from his saddle. A second and a third succeeded, but were unhorsed with equal facility, and thrown to the earth, severely wounded. The remaining two, seeing their comrades thus roughly treated, forgot all compact of courtesy, and charged both at once upon the Moor. He parried the thrust of one, but was wounded by the other in the thigh, and, in the shock and confusion, dropped his lance. Thus disarmed, and closely pressed, he pretended to fly, and was hotly pursued. Having drawn the two cavaliers some distance from the spot, he suddenly wheeled short about, with one of those dexterous movements for which the Moorish horsemen were renowned; passed swiftly between them, swung himself down from his saddle, so as to catch up his lance; then, lightly replacing himself, turned to renew the combat.

Seeing him thus fresh for the encounter, as if just issued from his tent, one of the cavaliers put his lips to his horn, and blew a blast that soon brought the Alcayde and his four companions to the spot.

The valiant Narvaez, seeing three of his cavaliers extended on the earth, and two others hotly engaged with the Moor, was struck with admiration, and coveted the contest with so accomplished a warrior. Interfering in the fight, he called upon his followers to desist, and, addressing the Moor with courteous words, invited him to a more equal combat. The latter readily accepted the challenge. For some time their contest was fierce and doubtful, and the Alcayde had need of all his skill and strength to ward off the blows of his antagonist. The Moor, however, was exhausted by previous fighting, and by loss of blood. He no longer sat his horse firmly, nor managed him with his wonted skill. Collecting all his strength for a last assault, he rose in his stirrups, and made a violent thrust with his lance; the Alcayde received it upon his shield, and at the same time wounded the Moor in the right arm; then, closing in the shock, he grasped him in his arms, dragged him from his saddle, and fell with him to the earth; when, putting his knee upon his breast, and his dagger to his throat, "Cavalier!" exclaimed he, "render my prisoner, for thy life is in my hands!"

"Kill me rather," replied the Moor, "for death would be less grievous than loss of liberty."

The Alcayde, however, with the clemency of the truly brave, assisted the Moor to rise, ministered to his wounds with his own hands, and had him conveyed with great care to the Castle of Allora. His wounds were slight, and in a few days were nearly cured; but the deepest wound had been inflicted on his spirit. He was constantly buried in a profound melancholy.

The Alcayde, who had conceived a great regard for him, treated him more as a friend than a captive, and tried in every way to cheer him, but in vain; he was always sad and moody, and when on the battlements, of the castle, would keep his eyes turned to the south with a fixed and wistful gaze.

"How is this?" exclaimed the Alcayde, reproachfully, "that you, who were so hardy and fearless in the field, should lose all spirit in prison? If any secret grief preys on your heart, confide it to me as to a friend and I promise you, on the faith of a cavalier, that you shall have no cause to repent the disclosure."

The Moorish knight kissed the hand of the Alcayde. "Noble cavalier," said he, "that I am cast down in spirit is not from my wounds, which are slight; nor from my captivity, for your kindness has robbed it of all gloom; nor from my defeat, for to be conquered by so accomplished and renowned a cavalier is no disgrace. But, to explain to you the cause of my grief, it is necessary to give you some particulars of my story; and this I am moved to do by the great sympathy you have manifested toward me, and the magnanimity that shines through all your actions."

"Know, then, that my name is Abandarez, and that I am of the noble but unfortunate line of the Abencerrages of Granada. You have doubtless heard of the destruction that fell upon our race. Charged with treasonable designs, of which they were entirely innocent, many of them were beheaded, the rest banished, so that not an Abencerrage was permitted to remain in Granada, excepting my father and my uncle, whose innocence was proved, even to the satisfaction of their persecutors. It was decreed, however, that, should they have children, the sons should be educated at a distance from Granada, and the daughters should be married out of the kingdom.

"Conformably to this decree, I was sent, while yet an infant, to be reared in the fortress of Cartama, the worthy Alcayde of which was an ancient friend of my father. He had no children, and received me into his family as his own child, treating me with the kindness and affection of a father, and I grew up in the belief that he really was such. A few years afterwards his wife gave birth to a daughter; but his tenderness towards me continued undiminished. I thus grew up with Xarisa, for so the infant daughter of the Alcayde was called, as her own brother, and thought the growing passion which I felt for her was mere fraternal affection. I beheld her charms unfolding, as it were, leaf by leaf, like the morning rose, each moment disclosing fresh beauty and sweetness.

"At this period I overheard a conversation between the Alcayde and his confidential domestic, and found myself to be the subject. 'It is time,' said he, to apprise him of his parentage, that he may adopt a career in life. I have deferred the communication as long as possible, through reluctance to inform him that he is of a proscribed and an unlucky race.

This intelligence would have overwhelmed me at an earlier period; but the intimation that Xarisa was not my sister operated like magic, and in an instant transformed my brotherly affection into ardent love.

"I sought Xarisa, to impart to her the secret I had learned. I found her in the garden, in a bower of jessamines, arranging her beautiful hair by the mirror of a crystal fountain. The radiance of her beauty dazzled me. I ran to her with open arms, and she received me with a sister's embraces. When we had seated ourselves beside the fountain, she began to upbraid me for leaving her so long alone.

"In reply, I informed her of the conversation I had overheard. The recital shocked and distressed her.—'Alas!' cried she, 'then is our happiness at an end.

'How!' exclaimed I, 'wilt thou cease to love me, because I am not thy brother?'

'Not so,' replied she; 'but do you not know that when it is once known we are not brother and sister, we can no longer be permitted to be thus always together?'

"In fact, from that moment our intercourse took a new character. We met often at the fountain among the jessamines; but Xarisa no longer advanced with open arms to meet me. She became reserved and silent, and would blush and cast down her eyes, when I seated myself beside her. My heart became a prey to the thousand doubts and fears that ever attend upon true love. I was restless and uneasy, and looked back with regret to the unreserved intercourse that had existed between us, when we supposed ourselves brother and sister; yet I would not have had the relationship true for the world.

"While matters were in this state between us, an order came from the king of Granada for the Alcayde to take command of the fortress of Coyn, which lies directly on the Christian frontier. He prepared to remove with all his family, but signified that I should remain at Cartama. I exclaimed against the separation, and declared that I could not be parted from Xarisa. 'That is the very cause,' said he, 'why I leave thee behind. It is time, Abandarez, that thou shouldst know the secret of thy birth, that thou art no son of mine, neither is Xarisa thy sister.' 'I know it all,' exclaimed I, 'and I love her with tenfold the affection of a brother. You have brought us up together; you have made us necessary to each other's happiness; our hearts have entwined themselves with our growth; do not now tear them asunder. Fill up the measure of your kindness; be indeed a father to me, by giving me Xarisa for my wife.'

"The brow of the Alcayde darkened as I spoke.—'Have I then been deceived?' said he. 'Have those nurtured in my very bosom, been conspiring against me? Is this your return for my paternal tenderness?—to beguile the affections of my child, and teach her to deceive her father? It was cause enough to refuse thee the hand of my daughter that thou wert of a proscribed race, who can never approach the walls of Granada. This, however, I might have passed over; but never will I give my daughter to a man who has endeavored to win her from me by deception."

"All my attempts to vindicate myself and Xarisa were unavailing. I retired in anguish from his presence, and, seeking Xarisa, told her of this blow, which was worse than death to me. 'Xarisa,' said I, 'we part for ever! I shall never see thee more! Thy father will guard thee rigidly. Thy beauty and his wealth will soon attract some happier rival, and I shall be forgotten!'"

"Xarisa reproached me with my want of faith, and promised me eternal constancy. I still doubted and desponded, until, moved by my anguish and despair, she agreed to a secret union. Our espousals made, we parted, with a promise on her part to send me word from Coyn, should her father absent himself from the fortress. The very day after our secret nuptials, I beheld the whole train of the Alcayde depart from Cartamat nor would he admit me to his presence, or permit me to bid farewell to Xarisa. I remained at Cartama, somewhat pacified in spirit by this secret bond of union; but everything around me fed my passion, and reminded me of Xarisa. I saw the windows at which I had so often beheld her. I wandered through the apartment she had inhabited, the chamber in which she had slept. I visited the bower of jessamines, and lingered beside the fountain in which she had delighted. Every thing recalled her to my imagination, and filled my heart with tender melancholy."

"At length a confidential servant brought me word that her father was to depart that day for Granada on a short absence, inviting me to hasten to Coyn, describing a secret portal at which I should apply, and the signal by which I would obtain admittance."

"If ever you have loved, most valiant Alcayde, you may judge of the transport of my bosom. That very night I arrayed myself in my most gallant attire, to pay due honor to my bride, and arming myself against any casual attack, issued forth privately from Cartama. You know the rest, and by what sad fortune of war I found myself, instead of a happy bridegroom in the nuptial bower of Coyn, vanquished, wounded, and a prisoner within the walls of Allora. The term of absence of the father of Xarisa is nearly expired. Within three days he will return to Coyn, and our meeting will no longer be possible. Judge then whether I grieve without cause, and whether I may not well be excused for showing impatience under confinement."

Don Rodrigo de Narvaez was greatly moved by this recital; for, though more used to rugged war than scenes of amorous softness, he was of a kind and generous nature.

"Abendaraez," said he, "I did not seek thy confidence to gratify an idle curiosity. It grieves me much that the good fortune which delivered thee into my hands should have marred so fair an enterprise. Give me thy faith as a true knight to return prisoner to my castle within three days, and I will grant thee permission to accomplish thy nuptials."

The Abencerrage would have thrown himself at his feet to pour out protestations of eternal gratitude, but the Alcayde prevented him. Calling in his cavaliers, he took the Abencerrage by the right hand in their presence, exclaiming solemnly, "You promise on the faith of a cavalier, to return to my castle of Allora within three days, and render yourself my prisoner?"—And the Abencerrage said, "I promise."

Then said the Alcayde, "Go! and may good fortune attend you! If you require any safeguard, I and my cavaliers are ready to be your companions."

The Abencerrage kissed the hand of the Alcayde in grateful acknowledgment. "Give me," said he, "my own armour and my steel, and I require no guard.—It is not likely that I shall again meet with so valorous a foe."

The shades of night had fallen when the tramp of the dapple grey steed resounded over the draw-bridge, and immediately afterwards the light clatter of hoofs along the road bespoke the fleetness with which the youthful lover hastened to his bride. It was deep night when the Moor arrived at the castle of Coyn. He silently and cautiously walked his panting steed under its dark walls, and, having nearly passed round them, came to the portal denoted by Xarisa. He paused and looked round to see that he was not observed, and then knocked three times with the butt of his lance. In a little while the portal was timidly enclosed by the duenna of Xarisa. "Alas! senor" said she, "what has detained you thus long? Every night have I watched for you, and my lady is sick at heart with doubt and anxiety."

The Abencerrage hung his lance, and shield, and scimitar against the wall, and then followed the duenna with silent steps up a winding staircase to the apartment of Xarisa. Vain would be the attempt to describe the raptures of that meeting. Time flew too swiftly, and the Abencerrage had nearly forgotten until too late his promise to return a prisoner to the Alcayde of Allora. The recollection of it came to him with a pang, and suddenly awoke him from his dream of bliss. Xarisa saw his altered looks, and heard with alarm his stifled sighs; but her countenance brightened when she heard the cause. "Let not thy spirit be cast down," said she, throwing her white arms around him. "I have the keys of my father's treasures; send ransom more than enough to satisfy the Christian, and remain with me."

"No," said Abendaraez, "I have given my word to return in person, and, like a true knight, must fulfil my promise. After that fortune must do with me as it pleases."

Then, said Xarisa, I will accompany thee. Never shall you return a prisoner, and I remain at liberty."

The Abencerrage was transported with joy at this new proof of devotion in his beautiful bride. Xarisa mounted behind the Moor on his powerful steed; they left the castle walls before day-break, nor did they pause until they arrived at the gate of the castle of Allora, which was flung wide to receive them.

Alighting in the court, the Abencerrage supported the steps of his trembling bride, who remained closely veiled, into the presence of Rodrigo de Narvaez. "Behold, the valiant Alcayde," said he, "the way in which an Abencerrage keeps his word. I promised to return to thee a prisoner, but I deliver two captives into your power. Behold Xarisa, and judge whether I grieved without reason over the loss of such a treasure. Receive us as your own, for I confide my life and her honor to your hands."

The Alcayde was lost in admiration of the beauty of the lady, and the noble spirit of the Moor. "I know not," said he, "which of you surpasses the other; but I know that my castle is graced and honored by your presence. Enter into it, and consider it your own while you deign to reside with me."

For several days the lovers remained at Allora, happy in each other's love, and in the friendship of the brave Alcayde. The latter wrote a letter full of courtesy to the Moorish king of Granada, relating the whole event, extolling the valour and good faith of the Abencerrage, and craving for him the royal countenance.

The King was moved by the story, and was pleased with an opportunity of showing attention to the wishes of a gallant and chivalrous enemy; for though he had often suffered from the prowess of Don Rodrigo de Narvaez, he admired the heroic character he had gained throughout the land. Calling the Alcayde of Coyn into his presence; he gave him the letter to read. The Alcayde turned pale, and trembled with rage on the perusal. "Restrain thine anger," said the king; "there is nothing that the Alcayde Allora could ask that I would not grant, if in my power. Go thou to Allora; pardon thy children; take them to thy home. I receive this Abencerrage into my favor, and it will be my delight to heap benefits upon you all."

The kindling ire of the Alcayde was suddenly appeased. He hastened to Allora, and folded his children to his bosom, who would have fallen at his feet. The gallant Rodrigo de Narvaez gave liberty to his prisoner without ransom, demanding merely a promise of his friendship. He accompanied the youthful couple and their father to Coyn, where their nuptials were celebrated with great rejoicings. When the festivities were over, Don Rodrigo de Narvaez returned to his fortress of Allora.

"After his departure, the Alcayde of Coyn addressed his children; 'To your hands,' said he, 'I confide the disposition of my wealth. One of the first things I charge you is not to forget the ransom you owe to the Alcayde of Allora. His magnanimity you can never repay, but you can prevent it from wronging him of his just dues. Give him, moreover, your entire friendship; for he merits it fully, though of a different faith."

The Abencerrage thanked him for his generous proposition, which so truly accorded with his own wishes. He took a large sum of gold, and inclosed it in a rich coffer, and, on his own part, sent six beautiful horses, superbly caparisoned, with six shields and lances, mounted and embossed with gold. The beautiful Xarisa at the same time wrote a letter to the Alcayde, filled with expression of gratitude and friendship; and sent him a box of fragrant cypress wood, containing linen of the finest quality for his person. The valiant Alcayde disposed of the present in a characteristic manner. The horses and armour he shared among the cavaliers who had accompanied him on the night of the skirmish. The box of cypress wood and its contents he retained for the sake of the beautiful Xarisa, and sent her by the hands of the messenger the sum of gold paid as a ransom, entreating her to receive it as a wedding present. This courtesy and magnanimity raised the character of the Alcayde Rodrigo de Narvaez still higher in the estimation of the Moors, who extolled him as a perfect mirror of chivalric virtue; and from that time forward there was a continual exchange of good offices between them.

STAGE COSTUME.

During the first half of the eighteenth century, that is to say, from the first appearance of that regular suit of clothes worn by our great-grandfathers under the name of coat, waistcoat, and breeches, to the days of Garrick and Kemble, the custom continued of dressing even historical personages according to the fashion of the passing moment; and although, in point of fact, it was no more ridiculous to represent Hamlet in a full suit of black velvet of the cut of Queen Anne's time, than it was in the days of Charles to dress Falstaff in the habit of that reign, the stiff-skirted coat, the long wig, court sword, and cocked hat, have a more ludicrous effect on the modern spectator than the ancient cavalier costume of 1640. But the attempt that occasionally manifested itself to combine, in imitation of the French actors, the habits of widely different eras, produced a melange, the absurdity of which is in our present day absolutely convulsive! The celebrated Booth is said by his biographer to have paid particular attention to his dress; so much so, that when playing the Ghost in 'Hamlet,' he covered the soles of his shoes with felt, in order to prevent the sound of his footsteps being heard, and so increase the supernatural effect of his appearance. Yet who does not remember Pope's lines descriptive of his appearance in Cato? which character he originally represented on the production of the tragedy in 1612:—

"Booth enters; hark the universal peal!

But has he spoken—not a syllable.

What shook the stage and made the people stare?

Cato's long wig, flower'd gown, and lacher'd chair."

Imagine Cato now, appearing in a flower'd robe de chambre, and a finely-powdered full bottomed wig.—There would be a 'universal peal' indeed—of laughter; yet the fashion of wearing full-bottomed wigs with the Roman dress (or at least what was intended for such) and other heroic costumes, lasted till within the recollection of many now living. A valued friend of ours saw Howard play Tambrlain in a full-bottomed wig, as late as 1765. Aickin, he informs us, was the first who enacted that part without it; and, what was perhaps more ridiculous still, Garrick, who has been so bepraised for his reformation of stage costume, played King Lear in a habit intended to look ancient, while Reddish in Edgar, and Palmer in the Bastard, were in full-dress suits of their own day; and the Regan, Goneril, and Cordelia of the tragedy in hoops! Richard the Third, also, was played by Garrick in a fancy dress, which Hogarth has handed down to us; but Richmond, and the rest, wore the English uniforms, of the eighteenth century; and as to Macbeth, Garrick played it to the last in a court-suit of sky-blue and scarlet.

In Jeffrey's 'Collection of Dresses,' a work in two volumes quarto, published in 1757, the editor says in his preface, "As to the stage-dresses, it is only necessary to remark that they are at once elegant and characteristic; and amongst many other regulations of more importance, for which the public is obliged to the genius and judgment of the present manager of our principal theatre, (Mr. Garrick, who entered on the management of Drury Lane in 1747,) is that of the dresses, which are no longer the heterogeneous and absurd mixtures of foreign and ancient modes which formerly debased our tragedies, by representing a Roman general in a full-bottomed peruke, and the sovereign of an Eastern empire in trunk-hose." Now, to say nothing of the fact that the very absurdities specified were then, and continued to be for some years afterwards, in existence, let us look at the specimens he gives us of the elegant and characteristic costumes introduced by the genius and judgment of Garrick; Perdita, in 'The Winter's Tale,' in a long stomacher, and a hoop fastened with flowers; and Comus, in a stiff-skirted coat, over which is worn what he calls "a robe of pink satten, puffed with silver gauze, fastened over the shoulder with a black velvet sash, adorned with jewels. The jacket," as he calls the coat aforesaid, "is of white curtained satten. The collar is black velvet, set with jewels, and the boots are blue satten!"

A pamphlet, entitled 'The Dramatic Execution of Agie,' published on the production of Mr. Home's tragedy of that name in 1758, contains a severe attack on Garrick for "disguising himself (a Grecian chief) in the dress of a modern Venetian Gondolier;" and ridicules his having introduced "a popish procession made up of white friars, with some other moveables, like a bishop, des enfans de chœur, nuns, &c." into a play, the scene of which lies in ancient Sparta! So much for the judgment and taste of Garrick in dramatic costume.

Mr. John Kemble, the first real reformer of stage costume, was introduced to the London public in the character of Hamlet. But he then played the part, says his biographer, "in a modern court-dress of rich black velvet, with a star on the breast, the garter and pendent riband of an order, mourning sword and buckles, with deep ruffles; the hair in powder, which, in the scenes of feigned distraction flowed dishevelled in front and over the shoulder." His classical taste, however soon led him, as he increased in popularity and power, to do away with the most glaring absurdities; and on the opening of the new Theatre Royal Drury Lane, on the 21st of April, 1794, Macbeth was revived "with great magnificence of decoration, and with some novelties, both in the conduct and machinery of the fable."

The French Revolution, which occurred at this period, was also mainly productive of a revolution in dramatic costume on both sides of the channel. "The rage for liberty," says a modern writer, "introduced an admiration of the ancient republics; the ladies dressed their heads in imitation of antique busts, and endeavored to copy the light and scanty draperies of ancient statues; and while the ladies were thus attired à la Grecque, the gentlemen kept them in countenance by cropping their hair à la Romaine." The toga and the paludamentum found their way from the French stage to ours; and Julius Cæsar, Coriolanus, and Cato were represented with some regard to Roman habits and manners, although the authorities consulted by Mr. Kemble were those of the time of the Emperors, instead of the Republic. The English historical and romantic plays were also dressed with a least more consistency. Mr. Kemble invented a conventional costume, formed of the old English dresses of the reigns of Elizabeth, James the First, and the two Charles's; and although King John, Richard the Third, &c., were anything but correctly attired, their habits had an antique as well as picturesque appearance, and the whole dramatis personæ were similarly arrayed, instead of all illusion being destroyed by the introduction of modern uniforms or plain clothes.* The rage for melodrama and spectacle, which gradually obtained from this period, was productive at any rate of a still greater spirit of inquiry into ancient manners and habits. Printing offices and private portfolios were ransacked for the getting up of every new Easter piece; and the magic wand of a Farley transported us at his will into the regions of fairy land, or the baronial hall of the feudal ages. But alas! while the crusader donned his glittering hauberk of mail, to astonish the galleries on an Easter Monday, the bastard Falconbridge, and the barons of King John, were dressed all the year round in the robes and armour of at best the seventeenth century. On Mr. Kean's appearance, and consequent success, the most popular plays underwent considerable alterations and improvements in point of scenery and dresses at Drury Lane. Several gentlemen of acknowledged taste and information supplied the new Roscius with designs for his own wardrobe, and the proprietors of the theatre were not behindhand in their endeavors to assist the illusion of the scene. The stage-dress of Richard, which had been but little altered from the days of Garrick and Macklin, underwent various changes, particularly in the latter scenes; but his cloak still bore the star of the garter, as altered by Charles the First. The Trunks were of the time of James the First, and the plumed hat, in the throne scene, of the reign of Charles the Second. Shylock assumed a red hat, lined with black, on the dictum of Mr. Douce, the illustrator of Shakspeare, who quoted St. Didier's 'Histoire de Venise,' as his authority.—Othello's dress was wholly changed; but the correct costume was sacrificed to what the actor considered effect. The habits of King Lear and Richard the Second were certainly improved; and in a new but unsuccessful play, called 'Ina,' the Anglo-Saxon costume was fairly enough represented.

In 1823 Mr. Charles Kemble set about the reformation of the costume of Shakspeare's plays in good earnest. 'King John,' the 'First Part of Henry the Fourth,' 'As You Like It,' 'Othello,' 'Cymbeline,' and 'Julius Cæsar,' were successively, and, as the public generally acknowledged, successively revived. The actors, dreadfully alarmed in the outset lest they should be made to look ridiculous, were agreeably surprised by the impression produced upon the audience, and have now become as anxious to procure authorities to dress from, as they were previously annoyed at the idea of the innovation, and distrustful of the effect.

AMERICAN MASONIC REGISTER.

ALBANY, SATURDAY, OCTOBER, 5, 1839.

International Law of Copyright.—Nothing, it seems to us, can be more absurd than the continual cry made against American patronage of letters. It is a mistaken idea that we neglect our own authors. We venture to assert that, for its means, there is not a country on the globe which pays more deference, and actually more money, to the encouragement of native literature than ours. Congress could not take a more suicidal step to the interest of letters among us, than by giving to foreigners the full privilege of a copy-right law. Forsooth, who would be the gainers by such an advent? Those alone whose sentiments in many cases, are hostile to our institutions, and hold no stake in common with us. Who would be the losers? The American public alone. Increase the price of books, and reading will stop in proportion to that increase. The farmer, the mechanic, and all who depend for subsistence upon their labors, which make by far the largest portion of our country, will fall gradually back to feudal obscurity and ignorance. The only enlightened class will be the rich.

These views are not chimerical. Every citizen must be sensible that the vast amount of knowledge, so generally diffused, has arisen chiefly from an easy access to letters: and if we feel proud of our country in one point more than another, it is that its people are so enlightened that no circumstance can long repress their natural energy, and no tyrant enslave them. Whatever others may think, we can trace this unexampled state of things to the liberal circulation of knowledge only, that we, as a nation, have enjoyed.

The sickness at the south, is still doing its work without much abatement. The interments for Sept. 20, were 25 in New-Orleans, seventeen of which were cases of yellow fever. The sickness at Mobile continues with but little improvement. At the latter place the deaths have averaged one per cent every twenty-four hours on the present residents. A letter from Mobile says, that "temperance, abstinence, long residence in the climate and having heretofore had the fever seems to afford no security against this disease that strikes us unseen and is only known by the blow that is fatal.—It is more than forty years since I first saw black vomit, but never did I see such a destruction of human life as the present calamity causes. With a perfectly clear intellect, moist skin, good pulse, a slight convulsive effort of the stomach is felt; black streaks are seen in the mucus that is thrown up almost without exertion, and when that comes, twenty-four hours seals the fate of the victim."

The southern papers earnestly warn all who are unacclimated, to stay away until severe frost.

A shocking murder has recently been committed in Philadelphia, by a man of the name of Wood, on his daughter. Wood kept a confectionary establishment, and his daughter was in the habit of attending it. She being very handsome, had many admirers, from whom, a short time since, she married one. Upon communicating it to her father, he appeared incensed, and a day after, without any other provocation, shot her through the head with a pistol, in the presence of his family. No other motive can be assigned for this horrid act than that the father was likely to be deprived of the loss of his daughter's services, by her marriage.

The Medical College—We have received a communication on the subject of the controversy, now existing in relation to the faculty of this Institution. As we are in no present need of either Calomel or Lobelia, we shall not meddle with the matter. We look upon the Medical College as an ornament to the city, and we have only to regret in common with a thousand others, that any difficulties should arise, which would mar its usefulness. The communication of our correspondent shall be sent as he desires.

To Correspondents.—The Lines received through the post office, came too late for to-day, but shall have a place in our next.

What has become of the Masonic contributions, promised us by several of the brethren?

Flour is selling at Texas, from 60 to $75 a barrel.

INTELLIGENCE.

More troops killed by the Indians in Florida.—While a party of regulars were building a bridge over the Suwannee, they were fired on by the Seminoles in ambush and had 6 killed.

Diabolical Outrage.—On Wednesday night, Captain Goodman, living a mile east of the city, heard a noise in his yard, and sent out his hired man to ascertain the cause. On going to the hen roost, the man was attacked by two villains, one of whom gave him a blow with a club which broke his under jaw. The man thinks, however, that he succeeded in marking one of them on the head or shoulder with a pitchfork, which may lead to his detection. On entering the roost, it was found that about 70 weight of chickens had been killed, and tied together preparatory to a hasty removal.—Rochester Democrat.

Messrs. John G. Parker, Leonard Watson, Finlay Malcolm, Robert Walker, Paul Redford, Randal Wixon, James Brown, Ira Anderson, and William Alva, late state prisoners in England, from Canada, we learn from one of our exchanges, arrived at Rochester, on the 12th inst. They have published a card, returning thanks to Messrs. W. H. Ashurst, Gainsford, Hill, Roebuck, Falconer, Fry, and W. Walker, their solicitors and counsel, in England, as the persons to whom "they are mainly indebted, under Providence, for their restoration to liberty, to their families, and their friends."—Onondago Standard.

Iron Steamboat for Louisiana.—The ship Edwina, arrived at New Orleans from Liverpool, had on board for the New Orleans Canal and Banking Company, an iron steamboat, on the Ericson principle, intended as a tow-boat for the canal.

*The late Mr. Mathews made his first appearance in public at Richmond, as Richmond in 'Richard the Third,' wearing a light blue woman's helmet and jacket.

MOUNTAIN ADVENTURE.

Last Wednesday afternoon, a young man from New York by the name of Dodge, started from the Mansion House on horseback for the summit of Mount Holyoke. He passed some time there, and was detained until near dark by a shower before he began to descend.—Starting to return he mistook the path and wandered down the Southern side of the mountain into a trackless forest. Evening came, and as he did not return to the hotel, some alarm was felt, and late at night some person ascended the mountain to the stopping place for carriages, where his horse was found. Loud calls were made, but no answer was returned, except the dull echo the forest gave back to the voices. Pursuit was renewed by Col. Partridge and others early in the morning, and the wanderer was found, returning home, near Rock Ferry. It appears from his narrative that he followed what he supposed to be the path, after he left the summit of the mountain, until he found himself bewildered in the darkness and the track lost.

Turning himself in various directions his bearings disappeared, and there he was in a dense forest, the darkness becoming intense and a severe thunder shower rushing upon his head. His situation was painful and agonising in the extreme. He was a slender young man, clad lightly, had pumps upon his feet, and both houseless and supperless at midnight, far from any habitation, in the midst of a vast forest, scarcely ever before trod, except by the primitive savage. He continued to grope his way about in the darkness for some time, calling aloud until exhausted, when he sank down at the foot of a huge tree, which in some measure protected him from rain, which during the night descended in torrents. The first signs of returning day enabled him to learn his position; and when light came, by ascending a tree, he discovered the far offspire of South Hadley.

He directed his steps thitherward, and after some hours wearied travel, reached a farm house, where he was kindly entertained and cheered. His situation when he was first seen was unpleasant, having exhausted himself with fatigue, worn out the covering to his feet, and torn his clothes sadly in his encounters with the forest, aside from the chills and colds which he suffered from his wet couch on the mountain.—Northampton Courier.

AN AERIAL CHASE.

It is seldom that the denizens of a city have an opportunity of seeing as interesting a sight as was witnessed by several gentlemen from Ferry Bar on Sunday morning week. A large Bald Eagle was seen skimming the air and floating up the river on a foraging expedition, for the replenishment of his royal larder; but, apparently, finding no quarry worthy a stoop, he soared away, and was lost to the sight in the clouds. A short time after a fish-hawk appeared, and squinting with a knowing glance across the broad sheet of water pounced upon a fine fat fish, and, mounting, prepared to return to his nest up the south branch. He had not flown far before he put about, and, steering in the wind's eye, sailed down towards the bay with all the swiftness his powers could compass. Presently a dark speck was seen a mile or two in his wake, and soon the royal bird was discovered darting after his prey, his tail stuck a peak, and his wings compressed, flapping with rapidity that sent him along with the swiftness of an arrow from the bow of bold Robin Hood. The hawk knew his pursuer, and practised a ruse by darting upwards when about a mile this side of the fort. The eagle darted under him and rising, apparently perpendicularly, a few feet above the hawk, gave him a flap with one of his wings, which caused him to drop the fish, and the royal pirate, dropping, from his airy height caught the fish before it reached the water, and skimmed off triumphant, leaving the poor hawk to seek his breakfast where he best might find it. It is thus with mankind. We see a petty prince plundering his neighbor, until a more powerful one, like the eagle with the hawk, robs him in turn, and reaps the reward of his tyranny.—Balt. Sun.

Mysterious.—A female, apparently about 20 years of age, is now at our County House, whose mind is partially deranged. She was found in the woods in this town, near the house of Mr. Goetchius, where, from her own account, she has been for several weeks past, living upon berries, fruits, and the milk of the neighboring cows. She is in a very destitute condition, and is either unable or unwilling to communicate her name or where she came from. From slight circumstances, gathered from her conversation, it is supposed that she came from New Jersey. She is rather small, delicately formed; and at times gives evidence of a cultivated but deranged mind. It is to be hoped that her relatives, if she has any, may be made acquainted with her present deplorable condition.—Catskill Messenger.

The Wreck of the Forfarshire.—Diving.—There is at present at the Fern Island a party of divers from Winstaple, practising their art at the spot where the Forfarshire steam boat was wrecked. The persons who descend to the bottom is completely enveloped in a suit of water-proof cloths, and having on his head a metallic cap in which are placed glass eyes; the air is conducted down for his respiration by a long hose, down which it is pumped by those in the vessel. He descends to the bottom by means of a rope ladder, and it is truly astonishing the length of time he can remain under water—often an hour or an hour and a half at a time—during which he traverses to and fro with apparent ease, sending up to those on board of the vessel what he finds, which he does by a signal. It is not known as yet whether they have succeeded in finding any thing of value; what they have got is mostly pieces of machinery copper, and such like.—Scotch paper.

Mobile, Sept. 29.—We have no more favorable accounts to give of the health of the city.—The mortality is still frightful, in proportion to the population of the city, and though our tables show a singular fluctuation from day to day in the number of interments, there is, we fear, no reason to hope that the disease is mitigated in violence, or lessened in extent. The number of interments in the city grave yard from the 12th to the 18th was 90.

Melancholly Funeral Procession.—Four men, tailors by trade, lately died, in New Orleans within a few hours of each other. They were all buried at the same time. The funeral is said to have been most striking and solemn. Four hearses conveyed the bodies to their graves, attended by the friends of the deceased, and the military band of the company to which one or more of them belonged. They had all worked in the same shop.—Newark Daily Advertiser.

Snow Storm.—Our severe equinoctial storm wound up yesterday, with a fall of snow, as liberal in quantity, as it was untimely in season. It was followed last night, not by frost, but a perfect congelation. At a distance from the lake, on the highlands, we doubt not, the depth of snow, was at least, six or eight inches.

To day we have a clear weather, with a very cold atmosphere.—Buffalo Advertiser.

An Outrage.—Mr. Lofton Quinn, Onslon co., N. C., on the night of the 15th inst. was attacked by a stout negro man, dragged from his horse, beaten, robbed, tied to his cart, and threatened with instant death if he made any noise. The daring scoundrel then took Mr. Quinn's mare from his cart, mounted her, and left his victim bound on the road. In about 24 hours after the fellow was taken on board a vessel and lodged in jail.

Flour.—The news by the British Queen has had a decidedly bad effect on this article—a decline within the last ten days has been full one dollar a barrel. All prospect that England will require any supply from here is at an end. The stock arriving here is small. The farmers in the interior are bringing but little wheat to market, and the millers being cut off from their usual banking facilities are buying but moderately. Sales of Ohio at $5 94; Western, 6 a 6 12; Southern, 6 12 a 6 25 Rye Flour had declined.

Political Gammon.—A stump orator who wished to gammon some Germans just previous to an election, in order to obtain their votes, observed, that though he was not a German himself, yet he had a brother who was remarkably fond of German sausages.

Horrible.—A night or two since, one of the marines at the Navy Yard here, stayed out of the yard with his wife during the night, and returned to duty in the morning. He was immediately punished by eight lashes on his bare back, with that accursed instrument the cat; and a medical man who saw his back after the infliction, says that it was literally torn to pieces. This was his first offence.—[Phil. World].

The Seventh Ward Bank.—Isaac Carpenter, a porter of the Seventh Ward Bank, on Tuesday September 14th, left the bank with four thousand two hundred and thirty dollars in gold and silver. The porter had been employed usually in counting the specie in the vault, and it is supposed he contrived to abstract a little each day, adroitly concealing it from the persons who were in the habit of inspecting his operations. He has gone to the west, whither vigilant officers have been sent in pursuit. Great misrepresentations both as to the amount of the money stolen, and the manner in which it was obtained, we learn are abroad.—[N. Y. Eve. Post].

Fatal Accident.—Mr. Henry Bissey, a respectable farmer of Bedminster, Bucks county, Penn., was killed a few days since, by falling from his threshing floor down into the entry.

Fatal Humanity.—H. W. Ogden, of Biloxi, La. formerly of New York, plunged into a lake to save the life of a drowning man from New Orleans, caught a cold, which resulted in yellow fever, and caused his death in three days.

Damages for personal injury.—Mr. S. Crawford recovered $570 damages in the superior court at Hartford on Thursday for injury caused by the careless driving of a young man named Higley.

Mr. Mather, one of the N. Y. State Geologists, estimates that the people of Greene, Sullivan, Ulster and Albany counties, will realize this year from two to three millions of dollars from their quarries of lime and flagging stone.

MARRIED.

In this city Mr. Jacob Rysedorph to Miss M. DeForest. Also Capt. Wm. Brown to Adeline DeForest.

At New York Mills, Henry Baker, of Cazenovia, to Catharine Andrews. Also at the same place, Westwood Wright of Watervliet, to Mary Ryker.

At Auburn, Charles P. Wood to Mary E. Sherwood. At Schodach, Hiram Van Buren to Mary Ann Morris.

At Bristol, Pa. Robt. Tyler of Virginia, to Elizabeth P. daughter of Thos. Cooper, the celebrated tragedian.

In New York, Wm. A. Cromwell of Lockport, to Sarah F. Hoyt. At Madison Co. Henry Maxson to S. Ann daughter of B. Eno Esq.

DIED.

In this city Mrs. Jennet Cook, widow of the late Henry B. Cook, aged 47.

At Rochester, Frances C. Dewey. At Warren Ohio, Hon. Calvin Pease aged 63. At Troy, Caroline S. Barker aged 23.

On the 20th ult. near the Oneida Castle, Odayaka, head Chief of the Onondagas, aged about 91. At the time of his death. Odayaka with the subordinate chiefs and principal men of his nation, were on their way to join in the ceremony of electing a head chief of the Oneidias. Within a few miles of the counsel house of the latter tribe, Odayaka placed himself at the head of the deputation of the Onondagas, and commenced the performance of the ceremonies observed on such occasions when he was suddenly seized with the bilious colic. Calling the next chief in authority to fill his station, he withdrew to the road side, when he soon after expressed consciousness that 'it was the will of the Great Spirit that he should live no longer upon the earth.' He then sent for his people and took leave of them after counseling them to cultivate and practice temperance and brotherly love in their councils and among the people of the nation, and friendship and integrity with all. He soon after became unable to speak and in a few hours his spirit was gathered to the Great Spirit who gave it.—Oneida Whig.

THE LAST OF HIS TRIBE.

An aged Indian Chief
Sat by an ancient Oak—
His form was bowed with grief—
His heart by sorrow broke.

The thunders smote around—
The lightnings gleamed bright:—
He heeded not the sound,
Nor the fearful flashing light.

But he spake aloud and said
In a sad, heart-broken tone—
"Kind thunders strike me dead!
"For I am left alone.

"My tribe is wasted all—
"My wife, my sires, my sons
"By the white man's rifle fell—
"These hills contain their bones.

"Yet would the white man drive
"From their fathers' graves and home,
"The few who still survive,
"In a stranger land to roam.

"'Tis not enough to kill
"Our friends and kindred all;—
"Our only solace still,
"Our freedom too must fall.

"And must I then submit
"To another's will to bow?
"Must I these valleys quit,
"Where I have roamed till now?

"I've fought till all is gone;
"My friends, my strength, my hope—
"But I'll never leave the ground
"Where our council fires we woke.

"Ah, no! my fond wife's grave—
"My sons, my fathers' bones
"I'll die ere you I'll leave—
"I'll die near my boyhood's home!"

Long had the chief sought death,
For its slumbers now he prayed—
He sighed with a stifling breath
"O come!" and the chief was dead.

THE RICH MAN AND HIS GOODS.—A FABLE.

I KNEW a man who rich had grown
In goods laid up on earth alone:
Though having an abundant store,
He toil'd and groan'd for more and more.
I mark'd him in a busy scene;
His hand was strong, his vision keen.
That hand has nothing now to do;
That eye is closed to mortal view.
Time was, I knew his habits well,
And what I noted I will tell.

His spacious premises were full
Of engines for preparing wool
In all its stages, till its form
Was that of flannel, thick and warm.
"And here," methought, "midst winter's cold
Is comfort for the poor and old;
These well-wrought blankets may be spread
On many a needy neighbour's bed:
How blest is industry, when found
To circulate its blessings round!"

But such was not AVARO's plan:
He, wealthy, saving, frugal man,
With shadows floating in his brain,
Of some imaginary gain,
Laid up his goods. 'Twas thought by some,
They would be his for years to come.
"E'en as they might, let others live,
He would not sell, he could not give!"

Possessions, with increasing years,
Brought pains, and jealousies, and fears,
Yet lucre was a fragrant thing,
Though gather'd from a noisome spring;
And when his other senses fail'd,

The love of having still prevail'd.
Avaro died; and people said
The richest man in town was dead,
While heirs advanced, with eager toil,
To ransack and divide the spoil!
But lo! on searching, what a scene,
Of loss, corruption, and chagrin!
The MOTH had found delicious fare,
And Rust and Mildew had been there.
"Try other chests!" But these forsooth,
Large, empty cases, told the truth,
That pick-lock Thieves had borne away
All that was saved from base decay;
Whilst rags and tatters (foul remains!)
Proclaim'd the churl, and show'd his gains,
And is not this a picture true,
Of what those sordid creatures do,
Who learn to gather pelf like dust,
And in uncertain riches trust;
Who closely grind, as with a stone,
Their servants' faces and their own;
Who only give to suffering need,
When pride or interest prompts the deed?
Who for their ill-match'd daughters buy
A coronet and misery;
Helping a fop his debts to pay,
Or, thief-like, gamble all away;
Till not a trace remains to show
Of former gains, but shame and woe.

That man's effects are nothing worth,
Whose treasure only is on earth.
Gifts may turn curses: means mis-spent,
Become their owner's punishment.
Be Kind, though provident;—in brief,
Beware the Moth, the Rust, the Thief.

THE LAST GREAT WRECK.

This mighty globe, with all her flowing sails,
And streamers set, is speeding, wildly fast,
For that dim coast, where thunder-cloud and gales
Will rend the shroud, lay low the lofty mast,
And bear her down, 'mid night and howling wave,
With wail and shriek, to her engulfing grave!

No pharos there will cast its cheering ray,
To show the mariner a welcome shore,
No friendly star come forth, as dying day
Darkens above the ceaseless breakers' roar;
No signal-guns at distant hearths impress
The frenzied terrors of her last distress.

Monarchs will cease the helm to stay her roll,
Tremble, and fall upon their knees in prayer:
The learned search again the chart's wide scroll,
But drop its idle drafts, in mute despair;
While pallid myriads, on the plunging deck,
Grapple with death, in this stupendous wreck!

Till down she sinks, amid the tide of time,
And leaves no relic on the closing wave,
Except the annals of her grief and crime:
The pitying heaven shall weep above her grave,
And universal nature softly rear
A dewy urn to this departed sphere.

WAITING FOR THE HARVESTERS

BY N. P. WILLIS.

And there she sat in ripen'd loveliness,
An English mother, joying in her babes,
Whose life was bright before her, and whose lips
Were breaking into language with the sweet
And loving sentences they learn so soon.
Her face was very beautiful, and mirth
Was native on her lips; but ever now,
As a sweet tone delighted her, the smile
Went melting into sadness, and the lash
Droop'd gently to her eye, as if it knew
Affection was too chaste a thing for mirth.
It was the time for harvest, and she sat
Awaiting one. A breath of scented hay
Was in the air, and from the distance came
The noise of sickles, and the voices sent
Out on the stillness of the quiet moon.
And the low waters, coming like the strain
Of a pervading melody, stole in

And made all music. 'Twas a holiness
Of nature's making, and I lifted up
My heart to heaven, and in my gladness pray'd
That if a heart were sad, or if a tear
Were living upon earth, it might be theirs
To go abroad in nature, and to see
A mother and her gentle babes like these.

ELECTION NOTICE.—A general election is to be held in the county of Albany on the 4th, 5th, and 6th, days of November next at which will be chosen the officers mentioned in the notice from the Secretary of State, of which a copy is annexed.

MICHAEL ARTCHER, Sheriff,
State of New York, Secretary's Office,
Albany, Aug. 15, 1839.

Sir—Notice is hereby given you that the term of service of James Powers, a Senator of the Third Senate District of this state will expire on the last day of December next, and that a senator is to be chosen in that district, to which the county of which you are sheriff belongs, at the general election to be held on the fourth, fifth and sixth days of November next.

You will also take notice, that a vacancy has been caused in the representation of the Third Senate District, by the death of Nodiah Johnson, a senator from that district, whose term of office would have expired on the last day of December, 1840; and that a senator to supply the said vacancy is to be chosen at the said next general election.

You will also take notice, that a proposed amendment to the constitution is to be submitted to the people at the said election, at which the electors are to vote, "For the election of Mayors by the People," or "Against the election of Mayors by the People." At the same election the following officers are to be chosen, viz: Three members of Assembly.

JOHN C. SPENCER, Secretary of State.

N.B. You are to give notice of the aforesaid election, in writing to one of the inspectors of each town and ward in your county, and annex thereto a copy of this notice. You are also to publish the said notice and copy in all the public newspapers printed in your county.

MASONIC.

BEAUTIES OF MASONRY.

(Concluded.)

Here, then, we have before us a synopsis of Masonic duty, replete with every moral virtue, and sustained by the solemn sanctions of Divine Revelation. Sum them up, and you find them embraced in the three words which declare the tenets of your Order, "Brotherly Love, Relief and Truth." "To visit the widow and orphan in their affliction, and to keep your garments unspotted from the world," is declared by an inspired Apostle to be pure and undefiled religion. To effect the latter duty, we must seek the pure and untroubled fountains of Christianity, that under the influence of the Eternal Spirit, the thoughts of our hearts may be cleansed, and the image of our Maker reinstamped upon them, through the merits of Christ's redeeming blood. But to the performance of the first named requisition, it is Masonry's peculiar province to give heed: and in this peculiar work its brightest character appears and its secret charities are most efficient. There is a disposition peculiar to the sensitive and refined mind, which leads it to shrink in its afflictions from the mortifying gaze of the public eye. I would not call the emotion pride; it deserves a nobler name. And as much as the moralist may be disposed to censure what he may be pleased to term "a morbid sensitiveness," I have always regarded it as an evidence of honest worth, and as furnishing a strong claim to commiseration. To persons of this description the noble charities of the Order are particularly adapted.

It presents its gifts in secret, and relieves without shocking the most refined feelings of delicacy. It does not stoop to make inquiries into particulars, as if charity the noblest attribute of our nature, was to be measured by a scale of inches; it only asks, Is the object worthy? and presents its gift, not unfrequently without the recipient suspecting the hand that administers relief. Even when a sufferer is forced to make application for assistance, he can do so with confidence, for he knows that his tale of woe will not pass from the sanctuary in which his groan of distress was first heard; and that he applies to a source for help where the voice of distress has never been heard in vain! Indeed I know of but one limit to Masonic benevolence and charity, and that is, a want of means to respond to the application.

Is there any thing here to which the most fastidious could object? Is one single doctrine taught at our altars that is not in the most perfect accordance with the doctrines of the Bible? It is true no particular creed is taught—no sectarian peculiarity adopted: all are left free to worship God according to the dictates of their conscience, the great requirement of the Order being faith in God! and the reception of the Bible as his word, the rule and guide of our faith and practice. Good Masons value too highly the sacred treasure they assisted in preserving, to treat lightly its important teachings.

It is in this view of the subject that I stand amongst you to-day, an advocate for the Institution of Freemasonry. Long before admitted to its Temple, I entertained like opinions, and I shall be happy in the recollection of this day, if I succeed in contributing to the reign of the only true and legitimate principles of the society. I regard the position I occupy as one of vast responsibility and fearful reckoning, and should feel recreant to the principles I glory to maintain if I failed to assure you, that an observance of the duties pointed out, furnish your only claims to the character of a free and accepted Mason. For a man's admission to the Lodge no more makes him a Mason, than a man's entering a church makes him a Christian. "Abstain then from fleshly lusts, which war against the soul; have 'your conversation honest amongst the Gentiles,' that being established in the principles of your profession, our ancient and honorable Institution, like another Pharos, may lift its head above the stormy waters of life, pointing the troubled mariner to a haven where the waves mount not, and the storm is at rest.

An important inquiry may here arise: What is the aim of the Institution? and what can it promise to effect to render secret association necessary? The effect of the doctrines taught, in their influence on the human mind, would furnish a solution to the inquiry. Its aim is to cultivate a spirit of universal charity—to establish one common level on which men of creed and climes diverse may meet, and hold communion as brothers.—And can there be a scene on earth more nearly allied to the pure association of Heaven, than that which exhibits the feelings of party spirit stilled, local affections and natural peculiarities laid aside, and men of every creed joining in heart and voice in the sublime petition, "Our Father who art in Heaven." Angels who hold communion around the throne look down with pleasure upon a scene like this, and with Sterne, I had well nigh said, let fall a tear to obliterate the minor charges from the book of remembrance. Again, it seeks by the cultivation of this principle, to excite a laudable disposition to relieve distress, and constant reference in these acts to the great Father of our spirits.

It is so constituted that a large portion of the world's population, are, by it, brought under moral training, that are uninfluenced by other and stronger duties.

The objector may here say, "Will not the Church better prepare men for the performance of these duties; and if in times of treachery and immorality, the Order might have been necessary, it cannot be so now, and I see no necessity for a secret institution at this day to enforce moral duty." This mode of reasoning is specious and many are disposed to yield the conclusion, without having examined the premises. In the first place, it takes for granted that men are delivered from the influence of a corrupt heart, and are more disposed to the influence of moral restraint at this day than formerly. This is obviously false, for it is contradicted by the Bible. "The carnal mind is enmity to God" "The heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked." Again, as in former days, there are many who "will not come unto Christ that they might have life;" over these Masonry will exert a moral influence, and under God, lead many to the fountain opened in the house of David. In addition to this, Masonry is not "a secret institution." Its members are known; its times of meeting published; its halls grace many of our cities and villages; its laws are given to the world; its charges may be read by all. Nothing is concealed from the world but its universal language, and the traditions it carefully treasures. The whole objection must, therefore, fall to the ground.

Surely it is absurd to say, that because you cannot make men Christians, you will, therefore, cast them off as incapable of any virtuous act, and unworthy of any moral instruction. This ground taken, and what good reason can the Christian man give for his connection with that useful benevolent association, the Temperance Society? He cannot stop that by making men temperate, he makes them Christians; it is only a preparation for that great work. So with Masonry: it does not make men Christians—it only prepares the way for the Gospel, by sound moral discipline. Another objector remarks, that the association in a Masonic Lodge is some times dangerous, and that young men have been frequently led to contract dissipated habits by becoming members of the society. Have not young men been brought into the Church, and introduced into society above their former walks, and under the influence of the attentions shown them, have they not (to use a homely expression) been spoiled—raised above their level, and consequently brought disgrace upon themselves, and the holy communion of which they were members. If, then, the association of a Lodge room ever injured a young man, it was his own weakness which caused the evil; the free, friendly and affectionate communication of good feelings was too much for his discretion and prudence, unaccustomed to such communications: for however convivial some Masons may be disposed to be out of the Lodge, they all know their duty better than to be guilty of so flagrant a departure from correctness in it. The objection, then is not a valid one, because it would go to destroy every benevolent institution on earth. One thing is certain, that in all our connections with fellow men, an ounce of virtues will weigh down a pound of vices.

The true aim, therefore, of speculative Masonry, is as sublime as it is extensive; awakening in the bosom enlarged views and feelings—driving from its walks the demon bigotry, and regarding in the true spirit of the Christian institution, the inhabitants of the world as one vast family—children of one common parent—travellers to the same glorious world of spirits. Genius of Masonry! we bid thee God speed today. Let thy unconquered banners be unfurled, and thy cry onward until beneath the whole heavens, they shall be proudly floating amid the dissolving mists of moral darkness—the receding gloom of superstition and error's night—as the handmaid of Christianity, announce her glorious reign, and join the triumphal chorus of earth's redeemed millions, "the Lord God omnipotent reigneth."

It is said that Napoleon, just before the battle of the Pyramids in Egypt, sublimely remarked to his soldiers, "Forty centuries are looking down upon you from the tops of the Pyramids." This remark was designed to excite a spirit of martial glory in the minds of men whose trade was blood—whose hosannas were the groans of orphans and widows—whose trophies were cities sacked and virgins violated! Could the sublime emotions consequent upon the thought that the spirits of the illustrious dead were gazing upon them—that centuries gone by were bending their dusky forms over the summits of the time-marked monuments of ancient art, kindle one glow of martial glory in their bosoms—how much more exalted the emotions of the philanthropist when he gazes upon the memorials of the past, and feels the risings of those sublime associations they are calculated to inspire! The field of moral operation spreads before him, inviting to action. No groans and tears attend his course—no thronging of hostile legions—no charging of the routed foe. 'Tis to drive vice to its native hell—to hush the voice of sorrow, and dry the tears affliction has caused to flow. His weapons are healthy moral and religious truths mighty through God, to effect his purposes. His design to elevate man, and by controlling the affections of his heart, and correcting his errors, lead him to virtue!

If the ennobling emotions of the better world have a home on earth, it is in that bosom which burns with universal love, for every being Heaven has formed. This is pure, undefiled religion, "To love the Lord God with all the heart, soul, mind and strength, and our neighbor as ourselves."

To attain this enviable condition should be the ambition of every immortal mind; for to it must we look for useful manhood, vigorous old age, and tranquility in the closing scene of life's eventful drama. How calmly the hero retires from a field like this! No gloom disturbs the shortening moment's stay. No violated duties then upbraid—no forms of injured victims stalk around his bed and call him to account. His visions are of loftier themes. The towers of imperial Salem rise before his view; the zephyrs that fan his pillows are scented with the fragrance of Sharon's rose, while ministering spirits unseen, fan away the clouds from death's gloomy valley, and pour Heaven's glories upon the dark vista that stretches away and is lost in the distance before him. Is there no triumph here? Is there no triumph here? Is there no ambition excited to win an end like this? The seer who, for gold, sought out a curse for Jacob, might well exclaim, when from the summit of a distant hill he beheld the triumphant banners of the hosts of Israel kissing the breezes of the valley, "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his." In this field, my brethren, you are called to do battle; let it be done in your Master's name.

Such, my brethren, is a very brief view of the character of our ancient and honorable Institution: When we examine its character, and inquire into its claims, we are astonished that opposition should ever have wagged its tongue against it, especially one so vindictive in its character as that which has swept over some of the fairest portions of our country.

The despots of Europe who have opposed Freemasonry, urged as a reason, the liberal principles it taught. But it was reserved for the agitators of the enlightened nineteenth century, to find in its courts the bane of free governments, & the destruction of religious principles. No honest mind could contemplate the tide of unholy prejudice as it rolled on through the northern and eastern portions of our land, until stayed by the bright waters of the Potomac, without feelings of surprise and indignation. Names canonized by song, and living in grateful memory, were assailed with feelings akin to those that led bigots in other days to wreak their fury on the bones of the dead Reformers; and living ones, the pride of their country, were charged with foulest crime. A few disorganizers, composed of discordant materials, commenced a crusade against Masonry. Political aspirants seized the war-cry as the watchword of a new party, willing to sacrifice virtue, if preferment could by that means be secured. The ignorant and uninformed, easily cajoled by false statements, joined the melee, and it really seemed at one time, that proscription would be the order of the day. The good sense of the country, however triumphed, as soon as reason could rally her forces to soothe the excitement; and the overthrow of agitators was as signal as their existence had been sudden. The American people could not long be made to think that their "Warren," whose blood consecrated freedom's earliest page—their beloved Washington, who guided her destinies safely through the storm of war to a glorious termination—her philosophic Franklin, who disarmed the lightnings of their fury, and laid the subdued thunderbolts at his feet, and a host of other worthies, whose names and virtues are dear to Masonry as to civil liberty would ever have given their sanction to the Order, if principles so impure, association so unholy, were comprised in the bond of fellowship. With noble indignation they hurled back the charges upon their promulgators, and proclaimed their deliverance from the delusion of error into which the excitement of the times had betrayed them. The storm was blown over, and though violent our superstructure is unimpaired by its fury; no pillar, of our lofty dome is moved; no stone in our Temple is displaced; the cassia still blooms in perennial beauty—in our halls, consecrated to universal benevolence, the good and the wise still do assemble and commune as brothers. Ours are not like the leafy honors of time, which fall when the autumn's storm is abroad; but like the lofty monarch of the forest, though assailed by the storm spirit's fury, bids defiance to the blast, and looks, with proud disdain, on the ruin, that is around. Thus it must ever be while founded upon the immutable principles, of its benevolence, and truth.

But among the roses that bloom along our pathway, and fill the air with rich perfumes, permit me to place the funeral cypress, and call your minds to the solemnities of another state. "We close with the solemn thought of death." How gloomy these dreary regions of the dead, without the reviving consolations of Christianity! Across this dark gulph she places her bow, radiant with heavenly mercy! not like the refracted rays of sunlight, which fall upon the distant cloud to tell the tempest over for a season; 'tis the beamings of Almighty Mercy falling upon a Redeemer's cross, through his dripping blood. It tells that the clouds which darkened the Valley of Death, are gone to return no more; and that to him who relies upon the pleading merits of that blood, a new and living way is opened up to God! In cultivating, then, the noble principles of morality, neglect not the sublime lessons of Christianity; the former may qualify for the discharge of the duties of life, but it is the latter alone, that can prepare us for a triumphant death, and a glorious immortality.

"Repent ye, therefore, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out when the times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord," that in life as in death you may rejoice in him, and "being justified by faith have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ."

I cannot conclude these remarks, without one word to the fairer part of my audience. How often, my sisters, have you thought that regulation severe, which excludes the female from our Lodges! Believe me when I assure you, that it is not a sphere in which a merciful Providence designs you to act. The order involves duties to which the softness of your nature, not designed "to bear the world's rude contact," would render you incompetent. While this is the case, your happiness is not uncared for; it cultivates principles that secure your peaceful reign in the affections of the heart, and causes it to owe its allegiance with feelings of the most sacred veneration. To your defence and protection the Mason is most solemnly pledged. The widow and orphan he delights to watch over, and with all a parent's fondness minister to their wants. To your influence we look for the formation of the character of man. As mothers, we venerate your care and toll, that supplies the infant's wants, and forms the dawning mind with virtue's precepts. In manhood we own your influence, and delight to wear the rosy chains that bind us to you. In sickness we hail you as ministering angels; in sorrow's gloomy night our solace and adviser. Often to manhood's shame be it confessed, we see your noble and angelic affections, like the ivy, supporting the blasted hemlock, twining its freshness and beauty around rottenness and decay; drawing closer to sustain the worthless trunk it binds, when the storm beats hardest. In all these relations we regard you as "Heaven's last best gift to man," and while we feel called to bear the burden of life's labors ourselves, we would desire only to share its joys with you.

Thus, my brethren, I conclude the duty assigned me, and while I rejoice at being permitted on this occasion to congratulate you on the stability and importance of our time-honored Institution, I would most affectionately urge upon your attention, your duties as Masons. "Act justly, love mercy, and walk humbly with your God." In this evil world a thousand incidents daily occur to lead your minds from your duty to Heaven, and wreck your happiness on the breakers that lie unseen in life's eventful ocean! Whatever distinction you may win in time, will not hush the storm that rages in the anxious breast, or smooth the wrinkles on the brow of care. Seek, then, through the merits of Judah's Conquering Lion, the sweet and peaceful emotions of "a conscience void of offence to God and man." Thus shall you be prepared for an admission into the Grand Lodge above, "where upon his rainbow-royal throne the Supreme Grand Master of the universe presides"—for "Whatever farce the boasting hero plays, Virtue alone has majesty in death."

TOMATO CATSUP.—As it is now the season to make this healthy sauce, we give the following receipt: Take the tomatoes, and turn on boiling water; let them stand until you can rub off the skin; then cover them with salt, and let them stand twenty-four hours; then strain and put three ounces of cloves to two quarts, two ounces of pepper, two n tmege, boil half an hour, and add a pint of wine.

MISCELLANY.

AN IDEAL ORRERY.

Conceive the sun represented by a globe two feet in diameter; at eighty-two feet distance, put down a grain of mustard seed, and you have the size and place of the planet Mercury, that bright silvery point which is generally enveloped in the solar rays. At the distance of one hundred and 42 feet lay down a pea; it will be the similitude of Venus, or dazzling evening and morning star. Two hundred and fifteen feet from the central globe, place another pea, only imperceptibly larger: that is man's world (once the centre of the universe) the theatre of our terrestrial destinies, the birth-place of most of our thoughts! Mars is smaller still, a good pin's head being his proper representative, at the distance of three hundred and twenty-seven feet. The four small planets, Vesta, Juno, Ceres, and Pallas seem as the least possible grains of sand, about five hundred feet from the sun; Jupiter, as a middled sized orange, about a quarter of a mile; Saturn with his ring, a lesser orange at the remoteness of two fifths of a mile; and the far Uranus dwindles into a cherry, moving in a circle three quarters of a mile in radius. Such is the system of which our puny earth was so accounted the chief constituent; a system whose real absolute dimension are stupendous, as may be gathered from the size of the sun himself the glorious globe around which these orbs obediently circle; which has a diameter nearly four times larger than the immense interval which separates the moon from the earth. Compare this mighty diameter, or the space of nine hundred thousand miles, within the assumed diameter of two feet, and the proportion will tell by how many times the suppositious orbit of Uranus should be enlarged! The dimensions of the system surpass all effort to conceive or embody them; and yet a wider knowledge of the universe shows that they belong only to our first or smallest order of infinities.—Newspaper paragraph.

WHAT'S IN A NAME.

We have ever regarded the selection of a name for a child as a matter of considerable importance, as we believe it sometimes has an influence upon the future fortunes of the individual. We have often noticed names which we regarded as preposterous, but have seldom met with any more truly so than the following, which a friend of ours informs us are the identical names of a family of children in his neighbourhood. One little girl bears the romantic appellation of Belvidere Hyderella Deidamia Celestiella Adelaide Wales Hutchins. Her younger sister is denominated Pharis Parasina Celia Amelia Mary Abigail Hutchins. The brother of these hopeful daughters is styled Daniel Horatio Leander Constantine Wales Hutchins. The same gentleman informs us that another child in his acquaintance bears the following appellatives, partly borrowed from the name of the wife of the founder of Pennsylvania—Julia Elma Anne Maria Springet Penn Ester. All these, however, must yield, we think to the following which a lady on her honour assures us are the real names of two children. The first, Hinneah Maria Rebecca Sophia Hazard Wizard Gizard Penelope Gardner. The second, Caroline Adeline Jane Eliza Jefferson Jackson Beersheba Collins. As the horticulturists exclaim of their mammoth vegetables, so we say—"beat this!"

A LESSON TO YOUNG LADIES.

The eldest of two sisters was promised by her father to a gentleman, possessed of a large estate. The day was appointed for the gentleman to make his visit, he not having as yet seen either of them, and the ladies were informed of his coming, that they might be prepared to receive him. The affianced bride, who was the handsomest of the two, being desirous to show her elegant shape and slender waist to the best advantage, clothed herself in a dress, which sat very tight and close upon her, without any lining or facing of fur, thought it was in winter, and exceedingly cold. The consequence was that she appeared pale and miserable, like one perishing with the severity of the weather, while her sister, who, regardless of shape, had attired herself rationally with thick garments lined with fur, looked warm and healthy, and ruddy as a rose. The gentleman was fascinated by her who had the most health and the most prudence; and having obtained the father's consent to the change, left the mortified sister to shiver in single blessedness.—A French paper.

BENEVOLENCE OF A VOCALIST.

The principal singer of the great theatre at Lyons one day lately observed a poor woman, with four children, begging in the street. Her decent and respectable appearance, in the midst of extreme poverty, interested the kind-hearted vocalist. He desired the poor woman to follow him into the Place Ballour, where, placing himself in the corner, with his back to the wall, his head covered with his handkerchief, and his hat at his feet, he began to sing his most favourite opera airs. The beauty of his voice drew a crowd around him; the idea of some mystery stimulated the generosity of the bystanders, and five-franc pieces fell in showers into the hat. When the singer, who had thus, in the goodness of his heart, transformed himself into a street minstrel, thought he had got enough, he took up the hat, emptied its contents, into the apron of the poor woman who stood motionless with amazement and happiness, and disappeared among the crowd. His talent, however, betrayed him, though his face was concealed; the story spread, and next evening, when he appeared on stage, shouts of applause from all parts of the house proved (says the French journalist) that a good action is never thrown away.—Gaz. Musicale.

NEGRO CONVERSATION.

Negro conversation, especially when it assumes a serious cast, is very often oddly classic—the pretension to the use of words beyond the power of comprehension, and often beyond the facilities of enunciation, is sometimes, too, very numerous. We overheard a colloquy between a couple of "seeming sages." The subject of discourse appeared to have its origin in the persons of a coloured man, and a couple of boys, members of the whitewashing profession, passing up the other side of the street. "How you do Meester Pindar," bowing politely. "Ah Annybull is dat you, well how is ail de family—considerable hey, astonishing circumstance ob de cosmogrammic nostosphere dis evening." "Very markable indeed Meester Pinda—did you see de Nora Bralis de oder night—its flectionable sintimation make de stars wink and de moon to put on her nightcap." "as Shaksper de poet sas. "Why you aint got dat pratice of koaten po'try." "Hush, see—Yander, dere's pour Gustas Ceasar Jones-es boy, and dere uncle, jes quit de daily ambroccations—de boys cum in for pretty much of prop'ty." "No not de smallest quantity—see dat boy, de fore un, he name ahter de father—no a cent for him, and de young genulman be'ind wid de limperments of his purfesshin in his hand—de bucket and de brush—not a cent for him." "Why lo-lo-luk heah, Annybull, wha-wh what you talken about—you don't say dat for factum doos ye?" "Certendy—I tells ye ne'er a one ob dem boys is (whispering) ne'er a one ob om's born in padlock; both of em legerdemain children!" Imagine the theatric start which Mr. Pindar affected as he exclaimed, "Oh my purfettic sole (turning up his heel)—if I didn't think so—but is you sure." "Didn't he tell me so when he was whitewashin' dat house down dere wid de venson blinds." "Dat sews me up—good night sah!" "Good night."—Baltimore Paper.

NO VETO.

When the right of the French King's veto was so warmly agitated in the General Assembly, the mob in Paris bawled about the streets "No veto! no veto!"—Mirabeau one day accosted a woman who vociferating those magic words:—"What is the meaning of this veto!" said he, "about which the people are talking so much? I am a stranger in Paris, and do not understand it." "Oh, sir," said the itinerant politician, "it is a tax on sugar; and on she went, exclaiming as loudly as before, 'no veto! no veto!'"

GOOD WIVES.

I am acquainted with a great many good wives— notable, and so managing that they make a man every thing that is happy; and I know a great many others, who sing, and paint and play, and cut paper, and are so accomplished that they have no time to be useful. Pictures and fiddles and every thing but agreeableness and goodness, can be had for money; but as there is no market where pleasant manners and engaging conversation and Christian virtues are to be bought, methinks it is a pity the ladies do not oftener try to provide them at home.—Hannah Moore.

Hard Rub.—Mr. Bildad W., of K—n, one of the pleasantest towns in Plymouth county, Mass. was a stone cutter, and withal given to hard jokes. One morning as he was busy at work, surrounded as usual by inscription, "In memory of," he was greeted by Dr. F. who was riding by, on a visit to some of his patients. "Good morning, Mr. W.," said the Doctor, "hard at work I see; you finish your gravestones as far as 'In memory of,' and then wait, I suppose, to see who wants a monument next?" "Why, yes," replied the old man resting a moment on his mallet, "unless some body is sick, and you are doctoring him, and then I keep right on."!

AN ORATOR AT A LOSS.

The following is a literal copy of a speech made at a debating society, in one of the western towns of Pennsylvania:—"Well the subject to be excused is, whether ardent spirits does any good or not, I confer it don't. Jist think of our ancestors in future days—they lived to a most numerous age—so that I think that whisky nor nor ardent spirit don't do no good. (Long Pause.) Well the question to be excused is whether ardent spirits does any good or not—so that I include it don't. (Another long pause.) I can't get hold of the plaguy thing.

ENGLISH NAVY.

An anecdote is told of a captain in the service, since dead, that while carrying out a British ambassador to his station abroad, a quarrel arose on the subject of precedence. High words were exchanged between them on the quarter-deck, when at length the ambassador, thinking to silence the captain, exclaimed, "Recollect, sir, I am the representative of his majesty." "Then sir," retorted the captain, "recollect that here I am more than majesty itself. Can the king sieze a fellow up and give him three dozen?" Further argument was useless—the diplomatist struck.

Moral of Mining.—We see the Pagco miners always in the midst of riches, and always embarrassed: they are kept in a state of continued tantalization. The miner, it is true, sometimes has immense and rapid gains, in spite of rogues and plunderers everywhere about him, at comparatively little expense of time or money; and occasional success leads others to indulge in a hope of similar good fortune, which hurries the majority of speculators in this channel into pecuniary difficulties; for, as we have seen, the necessary outlay is often great without any compensation; and when the capital is too limited, though in the main the venture be a good one, ruin is near. Shopkeepers and dealers in platapina are tempted by prospects of commercial advantage to lend money to the harassed mine-owner to enable him to forward his works, and to repay the loan in pina at so much per mare. Such a lender is called "habilitador," but it unluckily happens for this capitalist, that, by the custom and usage of the miner, the last "habilitador," has a claim to be paid, which leads to the worst practical results. The miner is generally a reckless gambler, who spends money as fast as it comes to him, not in improving his mines, but indulging his vices; and in this manner the interest of the first habilitadors may be successively postponed to the claims of the most recent, who frequently is disappointed in his turn; while the difficulties of the miner are not removed, but merely prolonged; and he is involved in everlasting disputes and litigation.—Dr. Smith's Peru.

Beautiful Extract.—When we consider that all the powers and properties of the natural elements, of the earth and the air, of the winds and the clouds and the latent principles which govern their movements, of revolving planets, and of the warming and enlightening sun, must combine, in order to the ripening of a single grain of corn, let our thoughts arise from these second to the Great First Cause on whom they depend, and who, from the opening heavens, sends the daily food of the whole family of man, as in a great sheet knit at the four corners of the universe, and let down to the earth.—Gov. Everett's Proclamation 1839.

Fruit Trees.—The new method of raising fruit trees by planting the scions, is a great desideratum in the art of obtaining good fruit. It has many advantages over grafting, because it is more expeditious, and requires no stock or tree. They may be planted where they are required to stand, and the labour for one day will be sufficient to plant out enough for a large orchard after the scions are obtained. The method of preparing the plants is as follows: Take the scions as for grafting and at any time after the first of February, and until the buds begin to grow considerably, and put each end to shoot in melted pitch, wax or tallow, and bury it in the ground, the buds uppermost, while the body lies in a horizontal position at the depth of two or three inches. We are informed that a tree obtained in this way, will bear in three or four years from the time of planting. We have no doubt of the practicability of this method of raising fruit. A gentleman in this vicinity the last season planted about twenty scions of different kinds of pears, which appear to flourish. The composition which he used was melted shoemaker's wax.—The Cultivator.

THE FORTUNATE ATTORNEY.

There are always a considerable number of attorneys and barristers in the Queen's Bench Prison. I need scarcely say that in the great majority of cases the attorneys were without practice, and the barristers briefless before their entrance. Some of the former, however, manage to raise a tolerable business within the walls of the prison. Strange as it may appear, it does sometimes happen that persons have to date their prosperity in life to their incarceration in the Queen's Bench. One remarkable instance consists with my personal knowledge. The party was a barrister, but had never in his life had a single brief in his bag. I am not sure, indeed, having no use for it, whether he had a bag at all. He was sent to vegetate for ten or twelve months in the Bench. While there, he contracted an intimacy with one of the prisoners of some station in society, and of considerable wealth, though, through some illegal proceedings temporarily deprived of it. The case was laid before the briefless barrister, and having abundant time on his hand, he made himself completely master of it in all its bearings. On his liberation he undertook to bring it before the proper tribunal, making his remuneration entirely dependent on his success.—He did succeed; the party was liberated, and he amply rewarded for his trouble. But the remuneration he received was but a very subordinate portion of the benefit he derived from the case. Possessed of very respectable natural talents, and knowing the case so thoroughly, he made so creditable a professional appearance in court, that briefs, from that time, poured in on him in copious abundance. This was the tide in his affairs of which Shakspeare speaks: he wisely took it at the flood, and led it on to fame and fortune.—Sketches from London.

SUBSTITUTE FOR SOAP.

Put any quantity of pearl-ash, or soda, into a large jar; cover it tightly, and in a few days it will become liquid; then mix it with an equal quantity of newly slacked lime, and double its quantity of soft water; boil it half an hour; add as much more hot water off the liquor. Two ounces of pearl-ash used with a pound and a half of soap, will make a considerable saving. For coarse purposes, soft soap is a saving of nearly half. The best way of keeping hard soap is to cut it, with a twine or wire, into pieces of about a pound each, and to keep it moderately dry. A little pipe clay dissolved in the water, or rubbed with the soap on the cloths, will give the dirtiest linens the appearance of having been bleached, will clean them with half the labour, and a saving of full one-fourth of the soap. Pipe-clay will also render hard water nearly as soft as rain water. Carpets, moreen curtains, or other woollens, may be cleaned with the coarse pulp of potatoes, used as a kind of soap, with water. Put wood-ashes upon flannel in a sieve pour upon them boiling water, and it will make a strong ley for washing.—Newspaper paragraph.

POPULAR TALES.

THE LEAGUER MONK.

The evening of a fine summer day was just closing in, when two horsemen, who, from the spent condition of their steeds, had ridden far and fast, arrived at the steep hill which begins about a league and a half on the Paris side of St. Cloud. The one appeared to be a soldier; the other, by his sad coloured plain dress, seemed to belong to a more peaceful profession; but both were armed, as it befoved men to be in the troublesome times of the League, when violence and rapine roamed unpunished throughout France; and were no where less curbed than in the neighborhood of Paris. The riders checked their horses when they began the ascent, and let the tired beasts walk up the hill.

'The danger is past, said the elder, and less warlike of the two; 'the cursed leaguer-scouts dare not venture so far, and we may now breathe.'

'Ah, marry, and yet I trust them not,' replied the other. 'I would willingly dismount, but that, for I know, some cut throat may be even now on the look-out for us; in case of being out-numbered, we have no other chance but to make our steeds save themselves and us.'

'I told you it was somewhat rash to set out without an escort,' replied the elder.

'Ay, and if we had waited for that, the news I bear might have been useless; and some less cautious man would have had the command I hope for. It may do very well for you, my dear brother, who are the king's attorney-general, to take care of your valuable life; but I, who am but a younger brother of our good family of La Guesle, and a poor captain in his majesty's guard, can only hope to live by running the daily chance of being knocked on the head:—nay, even twice a day, sometimes, while the leaguers are out.'

'Yonder is one who looks suspiciously enough in my eyes, said the elder La Guesle, pointing to a monk who was kneeling before a crucifix by the roadside.

'Well, he is but one, and a monk to boot,' said the soldier.

'Let me tell you there is never a viper more dangerous than one of yon same monks. I never look at their wide sleeves, but my mind misgives me they carry pistols and poignards in them.'

'Pistols and poignards are not dangerous of themselves; and, in a monk's grasp, they are as harmless as my mistress' bodkin. But, see, yon monk looks as if he would speak.'

The subject of their conversation had finished his prayer, and approached the travellers. He was of the order of Jacobins; and his appearance was not much calculated to excite suspicion in any mind. His cowl was thrown back, and displayed his features, which, without being handsome, were sufficiently well-looking.

An expression of mildness and humanity characterised his countenance; and was somewhat exaggerated, by the mortified air with which he cast down his eyes as the travellers came up to him.

'Salve et benedicite,' said the monk, in the drawing tone, usual with his fraternity.

'Et tu quoque,' replied the elder traveller; while the soldier, returning the monk's salutation with a bow, asked—

'Whither away, good father?'

'To St. Cloud,' replied the monk; 'the unworthy bearer of letter from the President Harley to the king.'

'From my good friend the president?' cried the elder La Guesle; 'how fares he?'

'Well in health,' replied the monk, but the pains of imprisonment, and sorrow for his poor country, weigh heavily upon the good man's heart. He has written to our gracious king; and his letter contains a proposition which it may be shall end the distresses under which all men suffer.'

'God a mercy! monk,' cried the soldier, if this be true, thou art the bearer of the best tidings that I have heard for many a day; but how comes it that an errand of such importance is entrusted to thee, who makest thy way poor and alone?'

'My worn frock, and my poverty, are as good safeguards as thy bright cuirass. Other qualifications for this office have I none, save a Christian desire to bring about peace, for beati sunt pacificatores.'

'Proudly said,' cried the elder traveller; 'but let me see thy passport. I have lived long enough to know that the hood makes not the monk, and that pious sayings often issue from profane mouths.'

The monk replied not; but drew from his scribe the passport which had been required of him. The advocate inspected it, and saw that it was signed by the Count de Brienne, one of the king's generals, who was then a prisoner in Paris; and, thus satisfied of the truth of the monk's story, he returned him the paper. During this conversation they had been walking slowly, and had now reached the top of the hill, from whence the turrets of St. Cloud were seen to glitter in the last rays of the sinking sun. The captain, who saw that the monk's feet were galled by the rough road (for the holy personage's shoes were in a marvellously dilapidated condition,) said to him good-naturedly, 'A long league, holy brother, lies between this and Saint Cloud. Now, if thou thinkest thou art horseman enough to keep thy seat behind me, the road's crupper shall be thy saddle; we will ride to St. Cloud like two ancient templars.'

The monk needed not twice bidding, but leaped with considerable agility behind the captain; and the horses having by this time recovered themselves, the parties struck off at a round pace for St. Cloud. The roughness of the road prevented any further conversation; the monk employed himself in telling his rosary; the captain congratulated himself on having a chaplain added to his suite; and the attorney-general ruminated on schemes of policy adapted to the dangerous exigencies of the times.

When they reached St. Cloud, it was too late for the monk to present his letter to the king; and the attorney-general, upon whom the mildness of his manner had somewhat gained, carried him to his own quarters, where he committed him to the care of his steward, promising that early in the morning he should be introduced to the king.

In the ample hall of the Sieur La Guesle, the poor monk was treated with less respect by the servants than their master had intended should be paid to him.—They were all of course royalists; and they knew that the monks, and particularly the Jacobins, to which fraternity the stranger belonged, were amongst the most decided partisans of the League against the king. The successes which had lately attended their monarch's arms gave good reason to hope that he would shortly reduce his rebellious subjects to obedience; and they were anxiously expecting order to march to the attack of Paris, which, feebly defended, and suffering all the inconvenience of a thick population, and scarcity of provisions, seemed to require little more than the show of assault to carry it. Anticipating the triumph of which they had assured themselves, the servants showed no inclination to spare the Jacobin monk. In the course of the supper, every one had in turn giped the ecclesiastic; and he had borne all their jests with a quiet and controlled temper. An inclination of the head, a half-muttered prayer, or a look of contrition cast upwards, were the only replies that he made to the scoffs with which he was loaded, and yet, in the look which he sometimes cast about him, a keen observer might have suspected that what was passing in his heart, belied his outward appearance. The meal was ended; and Etienne Rabaut, the esquire of the Capt. La Guesle, filled his cup high, and proposed the health of the king. Seeing that the monk did not fill his goblet, he cried out to him, 'How now, brother, is that a health not payable to your reverence? what scruples can a good churchman have against drinking the health and long life of a good king?'

'None, none,' cried the monk hastily; and, as if to cover the error he had been guilty of, he drained the cup which had been set before him.

'Well pulled, my tight little monk,' said one of the grooms, who sat below him at the board, 'a most orthodox drinker. Let me see the Huguenot dog that shall drain his can like a jolly son of Mother Church.'

The monk seemed to be confused; and, as if impatient at having been thrown off his guard, he busily employed himself in paring a large apple which lay before him.

'Yes,' said another of the valets, 'and his reverence eats as well as he drinks. Didst see Pierre how he laid about him at supper with yon large black-handled knife? Marry, look at it—with your reverence's leave,' he said, as he reached his hand across the table to take up the knife which the monk had laid down, and which was a remarkably large new-looking one.

The monk clutched up his knife eagerly, and thrust it into its sheath; then, checking himself he said, with a forced smile, 'Thou shouldst never sport with edge tools.'

'The monk is as sharp as his knife,' said the disappointed valet; 'I never saw a churchman yet without a corkscrew and a knife. Now I warrant me thou wouldst sooner forget thy breviary than thy knife.'

'There is my breviary,' said the monk, drawing it from his bosom, and kissing it fervently, 'and here is my knife,' touching the handle as he spoke; and slowly pushing it within the folds of his cloak; at the same time looking calmly in the face of the servant.

'Is it true, holy father,' cried a pretty little waiting-maid who sat opposite, 'that six monks of thy fraternity have made a vow to kill the king?'

'As I am a Christian, I hope and believe not,' replied the monk; but there are good and bad men of all orders.'

'Truly and modestly spoken,' cried the steward, who began to think that the monk had been sufficiently baited, and that it was not quite decent that a person of his profession should be made the sport of ribald serving men; 'and now, my masters, silence while the holy man returns thanks.'

The monk said a short prayer; and complaining of fatigue, was shown to his chamber, leaving his character to be handled as freely as the light-tongued inconsiderate servants listed.

On the following morning the whole court was in a bustle at an early hour. The king was going to hunt, and all his attendants were on the alert preparing for the chase. The attorney-general's first thought was of the monk, and the dispatches of which he was the bearer; and he sent his servant to awake him. The valet found him lying on the bed dressed as he had been the night before, but fast asleep; his hands were folded upon his bosom; one of them clutched his breviary, and the other was thrust within his frock.

The man looked at him; and, as the thought occurred to him that nothing but a quiet conscience could procure asleep so calm, he regretted the part he had taken in teasing this holy man the night before. He shook him, and called; but, so sound were the monk's slumbers, that he was obliged to handle him even roughly before he could rouse him. At length the monk awoke; and, learning that the attorney-general had sent for him, he hastened to make ready. A very few moments sufficed for his preparations, and he accompanied Sieur La Guesle and his brother, the captain, to the king's quarters, where he was left in the ante-chamber while his conductors entered the king's room to announce his coming.

Henry III. had risen this morning in one of those cheerful moods which had of late become rare with him. He was most unreasonably in high spirits, and was so eager for the chase that he had been hurrying the business which it was necessary for him to dispatch in order that he might pursue his favourite diversion. When La Guesle entered with his brother, he found Henry standing up, while one of his gentlemen was buckling on his spurs. A small Italian greyhound was standing on its hind legs, kissing the king's hand with a fawning servility that could only be exceeded by the hum in courtiers who surrounded him.

'How now, La Guesle,' said the king as he entered, 'some new delays? Does that long important face of thine portend that we are never to get to horse?'

'If I had to choose the road, sire, said La Guesle, I would give my best hopes to see your majesty on horseback. My brother has seen some of the officers of the Picardy regiment, and has learnt that Paris needs only to be summoned in order to surround. He says that the only fighting men in Paris are the four thousand under the Duke of Mayenne's command, and that half of them are ready to desert. The rabble populace, with the canaille of priests, monks, students, and other beggars, will be knocked on the head by the women of Paris as soon as your majesty's banner shall be displayed.'

'Fair and softly, good attorney-general,' cried the king; 'much as I hate that same canaille, you and I have found that they can both give and take hard blows. But temper your ardour a little; a few days shall see us before Paris. In the mean time I thank you and your brother, whom I know for a brave and loyal chevalier, for your zeal. Nay, prithee, don't look blank on a fine morning, but come and help to strike a royal deer.'

'Your majesty's will must be obeyed, said La Guesle; but one moment's delay yet. There is a Jacobin monk waiting yonder without, whom I picked up yesterday evening on the road. He says he has a letter to your majesty from the lord president; and he comes with a pass from the Count de Brienne.'

'My poor prisoners!' cried the king; 'admit him instantly.'

At a sign from La Guesle, one of the Halbardiers drew aside the tapestry which covered the door of the ante-chamber, and beckoned to the monk to enter. Slowly and respectfully, but with a firm step, the Jacobin approached the king; and, kneeling to him, presented a letter which he held in his hand. The king stooped to take it from him; and, such was his eagerness to read it, that he began to open it without motioning to the monk to rise. Recollecting himself in a moment, but without lifting his eyes from the paper, he said, 'Rise, good father.'

The monk, who had his hands folded, rose slowly on one knee; and, as he did so, disengaged from its sheath the knife which had been observed by the servants at supper on the preceding night. Looking full in the king's face, he shortened his arm, and plunged the weapon with all his force into the belly of the unfortunate monarch. The king recoiled one step with the blow; and the monk, who had overreached himself, fell on his face. The king drew the knife from his wound and cried out, 'Cursed monk, he has killed me—stab him?' and as, at the same moment, the monk was recovering himself, the king struck him twice, with a desperate strength on the face. The first wound was just below his left eye; the second was on his upper lip, and broke several of his teeth. The Chevalier de La Guesle, who had been talking to his brother, was roused at the king's cry; and, seizing the monk immediately, and pulling him away from the king, threw him on his back, placing his sword to his throat. Some of the other gentlemen present and the guard ran up at the same time; and, acting only under the impulse of the moment, thrust their weapons into the wretched murderer's body, which fell lifeless, and pierced with innumerable wounds.

The suddenness of the whole transaction seemed to have a stunning effect on every one present; and they gazed now at the mangled wretch on the floor, now at their ill-fated monarch, who had sunk bleeding into the arms of some of his courtiers, with mingled feelings of rage and grief. The king was carried into his chamber; and, the doors being closed, was given over to the care of his spiritual and medical attendants. Inquiry was then made if any body knew the assassin; and he was soon ascertained to be a monk of the name of James Clement, who, to an ardent enthusiastic mind, joined great looseness and depravity of conduct, and had long been employed as the tool of that arch fiend and directress of the League, the Duchess of Montpensier. The indignant courtiers threw his body out of the window without ceremony; and the two brothers La Guesle bewailed bitterly the chance which had made them the unwitting instruments of introducing him to the king's presence.

In the evening the hopes which had been entertained of the king's wound proved futile, and it was declared to be decidedly mortal. All the amiability of this ill-fated monarch's character then displayed itself. With unaffected piety he forgave his enemies; and, sending for the King of Navarre, afterwards Henry IV. he embraced him tenderly, and gave him such advice as was likely to make his reign happy. The tears of all who were present at this scene proved incontestably that, although Henry had been a weak king, he was beloved by all who had been intimate enough with him to estimate his good qualities. Thus died, in the thirty-eight year of his age, Henry III. whose reign was one scene of intrigue and conspiracy, which had embittered and shortened his life, and rendered his kingdom a prey to the most destructive anarchy.

The N. O. Picayune says that all that women live for is to be looked at and to be admired. It might have added, with equal truth, that all men live for is to look at and admire them.

POPULAR FOLLIES.

For the American Masonic Register and Literary Companion.
EXCITEMENT.

We live in an age of constant excitement. It is not confined to any one profession, or branch of trade; but spreads itself throughout every circle of society and into every kind of business. And there are some who have lived so long in its turbulence that it has become the only aliment of their existence. How poorly off must he be who derives his whole happiness from a source that can be, at the most, but transitory in its being, and hurtful in its influence both to the body and mind.—It argues a lack of that moral and intellectual education which is so necessary an ingredient in the character of man. Education would teach him, that true happiness arises rather from a pure unadulterated train of thought, than from any unnatural and exciting arrangement of external circumstances. If mankind are not educated when young, there is no wonder they fly to the ever-varying round of amusements. To bid them find a home in the studio of the artist, or in the library of the student, would be but driving them into misery. They have not one feeling that could induce them to remain where mind is the presiding deity. They must have the din and bustle of business, the frivolity and frippery of fashion, the affectation of the stage, and the inspiration of the ball-room. The sober part of society would in some measure be contented, if such characters had but education enough to keep them selves within their own social sphere. But having an over estimate of their own abilities, they thrust themselves into the presence of those who can be better employed than listening to the insipid speeches of a still more insipid brain. Strange as it may seem, they even think those who will not condescend to their folly as inferior to themselves. Who has not seen a whole assembly of the votaries of fashion turn the dull eye of contempt upon a man modest and retiring in his demeanor; and who either would not, or could not, lisp the senseless nothings of their conversation. While they were fancying themselves the beau ideal of perfection, he was blessing his stars that he deserved their contempt. It is not until men of this cast become incapacitated through age for the mere enjoyment of the senses, that they begin to form a just estimate of character, and put a right value upon the endowments of mind. If however they delay until wearied nature forces them into such views, they can never hope to retrieve past follies by a future improvement of the mind. Age, with all its ills and infirmities, forbid that application which alone can fit them to associate with the gifted and the great. We therefore repeat the substance of what we have before said—that Education is the only thing that can dignify the character of man, and fit him for that sublime station to which his nature entitles him.

But let us return to the angle of our deviation from the main subject. The victim of excitement is more liable than any other being to depression of spirits.—This is verified by our daily experience. The too frequent repetition of excitement soon reduces the mind to an insensibility of excitement. It becomes as it were callous to the feeling. The being that to day is all life and activity, to-morrow is moping about the lanes and the allies with an intolerable craze preying upon him. The mind will not suffer itself to be continually on the stretch unrelieved by a moment's calmness. If it is sought to be so, it will soon lose its power, and relapse as much below an even state as it was above. It is the melancholy following high excitement that induces the frequent use of those stimulating drugs and liquids with which our country abounds. Mark the career of the voluptuary, the lover of pleasure in all its varied forms, till he enters into the vale of declining years. In proportion as he once gratified the intense passions of his nature, in that same proportion does he now feel the heavy weight of despondency and despair. Providence seems determined that man shall have a certain share of sedateness and sobriety while living.—If he chooses to defer the period of it till old age, providence acquiesces; but come, it must, if he is not cut short in the flower of his day. We feel bold to assert that those advanced in years who enjoy the most equitable and happy frame of mind, were, when in youth, moderate in their pleasures, especially those of a very exciting character. Besides, the peevishness and fretfulness of old age may be attributed in a great degree to the contrast between the present and the past. If the old look upon their youth spent in immoderate gaiety, the contrast between that period of life and the present being greater, by natural consequence they feel a greater wright of dependency and chagrin.

SKETCHES OF TRAVEL.

THE BATHS OF ALEXANDRIA.

After the mosque, the bath is the finest embellishment of oriental cities. The one to which I was conducted is a vast edifice of simple architecture, and neatly ornamented. At the entrance is a large vestibule having rooms on the right and left for the reception of cloaks, and, in the rear, a door hermetically closed.—Through this door you pass into a room warmer than the surrounding atmosphere, and from this (as I afterwards learned) you may retreat if you choose; but put your foot in one of the adjoining closets, and you are no longer your own master: two attendants seize you, and, for the time, you are the property of the establishment.

Much to my surprise, this was my predicament. I had scarcely entered a closet, when two strong men belonging to the bath laid hold of me, and, in an instant, I was stripped to the skin. One of them passed a linen shawl around my waist, while the other buckled on my feet a pair of gigantic clogs, which at once made me a foot taller. This mode of shoeing not only rendered flight impossible, but, by its clumsy elevation, destroyed my equilibrium; and I should inevitably have fallen, had not the two men supported me on either side. I was fairly caught; I could not retreat, and therefore suffered them to lead whither they would.

We passed into another room. Few whatever might be my resignation, the vapour and heat strifed me. I thought that my guides had mistaken the way, and trundled me into an oven. I tried to shake them off, but my resistance was anticipated. Besides, I was in no condition for trial of strength, and was obliged to confess myself vanquished. In a few moments I was astonished at perceiving that, as the perspiration poured from me, my lungs began to dilate, and my respiration returned. In this state I passed through five or six rooms, the heat of which increased so rapidly that I began to believe man had five thousand years mistaken his proper element, and his appropriate destiny was boiling or roasting.

At last we came to the furnace. Here the fog was dense that I could not see two steps before me, and the heat so entirely insupportable that I partly fainted. I shut my eyes, and resigned myself to my guides in utter helplessness. After leading, or rather carrying me a few steps further, they took off my girdle, unhooked my clogs, and extended me, half-swooning, on something like a marble table in the middle of the apartment.

Here again, I soon became accustomed to the infernal atmosphere. I prudently took advantage of the gradual return of my faculties, and looked about me.—With my other senses, my sight revived; and, despite the fog, I made out with tolerable accuracy the surrounding object. My tormentors seemed to have forgotten me for a moment: they were busy at one side of the room. I lay in the centre of a large, square saloon, incrustated, to the height of five or six feet, with variously coloured marbles; a series of spouts threw out incessantly streams of smoking water, which, falling, on the pavement beneath, gilded thence into four basins, like chaldron, at the four corners of the room. On the surface of the water in these basins was an indefinite number of bald heads bobbing about, and expressing, by the most grotesque contortions of face; various degrees of felicity. This spectral so occupied my attention, that I scarcely heeded the return of my masters. They came, however; one with a large wooden bowl of soap suds, the other with a ball of fine hemp. Suddenly one of the rascals inundated my face and neck with his suds; and the other seizing me by the shoulder, rubbed most furiously my face and breast with his hemp. This treatment and the pain induced by it were so perfectly intolerable, that all my powers of resistance and resentment awakened at once. I bolted upright, kicked my hempen friend half across the room, and planted my fist in the face of soap-suds with such good will that he lay sprawling on the floor. Then, knowing of no other remedy for the soap, (which was blistering my skin,) I drew a straight line for the basin that seemed the most inhabitable, and boldly plunged in. I had misjudged. The remedy worse than the disease. Before, my face and neck were cauterised; now my whole body was scalded: the water was boiling; I yelled with pain; sprang on and over my neighbors, who could not comprehend my case; and got out of the tub almost as rapidly as I got in. However, I was not rapid enough to escape the effect of the ablution: my body was as red as a lobster. I was stupified! I must be dreaming, or riding a nightmare. Yet there was no deception. Here, under my very eyes, were men stewing in a broth of which I had tried the temperature, who evidently took great delight in the operation. What could it mean? My notions of pleasure and pain became confused; they could enjoy what to me was agony! I once more resolved to resign myself to fate. I doubted my own judgment. I distrusted my own senses. I determined, again, to submit to my tormentors. They came, having recovered from my assault. I followed them without resistance to another basin. They made signs to me to descend the steps; I obeyed, and found myself in water of about thirty-five or forty degrees according to the scale of Celsius, forty of which correspond to one hundred and twenty degrees of Fahrenheit. This seemed to me temperate.

From this I passed to another of a higher temperature, but still supportable. I remained in it, as in the first, about three minutes. I then proceeded to the third, which was still some ten or twelve degrees hotter; and, finally, reached the fourth, where I had commenced my hellish apprenticeship. I approached it with the greatest repugnance, but I had made up my mind to go through with my desperate adventure. I first dipped my toe in the water; it was hot, certainly; but not so scalding as before. I gradually immersed my whole body, and was surprised to find it endurable. In a few seconds I thought no more of it, though I am confident the heat of the water must have reached to sixty or sixty-five degrees. When I emerged, my skin had changed from the lobster scarlet to a crimson.

My attendants now again took me in hand. They replaced the linen around my waist, bound a shawl on my head, and led me back through the rooms by which I had entered (taking care to add to my covering at each change of atmosphere) until I arrived at the chamber where I was so unceremoniously stripped.—Here I found a good carpet and pillow. My turban and girdle were taken off, I was enveloped in a large woollen gown, and left alone.

I had now an undefinable feeling of comfort. I was perfectly happy; yet so exhausted, that when the door was opened, half an hour after, I had not changed my position by the movement of a finger muscle.

The new comer was a sinewy and well-set Arab.—He approached my couch as if he had some business with me. I looked on him with a sort of dread very natural to a man who had passed such an ordeal I have described; but I was too weak to attempt to rise. He took my left-hand; cracked all its joints, and did the same to the right. After my hands, he administered upon my feet and knees; and, to finish the matter, he dexterously threw me into the position of a pigeon-to-be-broiled, and gave me the coup de grace by cracking the vertebrae of my spine. I screamed with terror, thinking my back-bone was broken, to a certainty. My masseur then kneaded my arms, legs and thighs for a quarter of an hour, and left me. I was weaker than ever; my joints all pained me, and I had not strength sufficient to cover myself with the carpet.

A servant now brought me coffee, pastiles, and a pipe, and left me to intoxicate myself with perfume and tobacco. I passed half an hour in a drowsy state, lost in adroaway state, lost in the vagaries of a delicious inebriation, experiencing a feeling of happiness before, unknown and entertaining a supreme indifference to every (absent) earthly thing.

I was awakened from this by a barber, who shaved me, and cut my whiskers and moustaches. Next, my Arab returned, to whom I made signs that I wished to depart. He brought my clothes, assisted me in my toilet, and led me to the chamber opening on the vestibule, where I found my cloak. The cost of this entertainment, was a piastre and a half, or about ten cents.

There is a fellow in Arkansas so short that he has repeatedly been mistaken for pie crust. The Wisconsin chap is the one whose shadow was mistaken for a shingle, and whittled to pieces, by a travelling Yankee.

AMERICAN MASONIC REGISTER.

ALBANY, SATURDAY, OCTOBER, 12, 1839.

Br. William Boardman, of 33 Jones street, N. York, is duly authorised to receive subscriptions, and collect monies on account of the Register, in that city.

Bunker's Hill Mutilated.—At length, we truly seem to have become, what foreign adventurers have repeatedly asserted, and what we have as repeatedly resisted, a nation of money seekers. To the god mammon there appears a universal homage. By his hand, scenes, made sacred by time and circumstance, are mutilated with as much impunity, as if they had not been the "Cradle of Liberty"—as if in their presence, the merest semblance of mortality, does not feel more keenly, how honorable, how glorious, it was, and would be, to struggle in such a cause as hallows their memory.—We do not intend being oratorical upon our subject, yet we do think it becomes every one who dwells with gratitude upon our early history to raise his voice against the further progress of this commercial iniquity. Bunker Hill should be esteemed as a grave that contains venerated ashes—time should only make it dearer, price should not be set upon it. If barbarians had committed an act equal to the defacing of this true Yankee boast, their names would have descended to us, inglorious as that of a Nero. What will posterity say of this act—what will foreigners? One will talk of a mercenary ancestry with disdain, while the other rejoices that America was not the place of his birth. Again we say to those who prize the fair fame of their country, and especially those who appreciate the valor of Warren, to resist the further destruction of this revered hill.—Let the government purchase it—and if it needs must produce, to accord with the spirit of the age, let it have the tillage of the plough—never let a prison-house or exchange-office prevent the dews and the sunshine from falling upon it.

To Correspondents.—On our return from an absence of a week, we find several communications on our table. We have not had a moment's leisure to look at them: but they shall be attended to.

The list of subscribers, together with the enclosure of J. B. from Poughkeepsie, came safe to hand. He will please accept our thanks for his exertions in our behalf.

We would remind officers of Chapters and Lodges, that we shall at all times be happy to insert any masonic information they may send us, either in the election of their officers, or otherwise. Much good will grow out of it. It will keep up a sort of communication among the brethren which is highly desirable. They will feel, that "though cast down," we are not "destroyed." From the opportunities we have of judging, we are satisfied, that the material is among us. All we want is some of the "rough edges knocked off" to bring forth the latent beauties of our cape-stone, and place it again in the Temple. "with shouting and praise."

It is expected, that communications will be post paid, unless such communication be in the character of an Essay or Address.

The Philadelphia Banks all suspended Specie Payments on Wednesday. The Banks in Baltimore and in the Southern Cities, will follow. The New York and Eastern Banks, it is confidently believed, will sustain themselves.

The banks of the city of Baltimore have suspended specie payments, and it is reported that two of the banks have stopped entirely.

The Farmer's Bank at Reading Pa. has suspended specie payments.

DESTRUCTIVE FIRE IN NEW YORK.

The New-York Sun Extra, of Sunday morning contains the particulars of three fires in that city on Saturday night, one of which has been more destructive than any which has occurred there since the great fire 1835, resulting, as it has, in the destruction of the entire commercial block formed by Burling slip, Fulton, Front and Water sts., and a number of stores on the opposite side of Water street.

The first broke out at 6 in the evening, consumed four houses in Albany street, Nos. 6, 8, 8½ and 10, not of much value.

The second broke out between 12 and 1 o'clock at night, in Carpenter & Sutton's carpenter shop in Eldridge street, which consumed that establishment, and spread to No. 127 and 131, two story brick buildings occupied by five families, three frame buildings, in their rear, occupied by a number of families. These buildings were consumed with such rapidity, that their unfortunate occupants lost pretty much all their furniture.

The third—a terrible conflagration.—While the latter was at its height, a third one broke out in the five story brick fur store of A. Halsey, No. 189 Water street, which spread with great rapidity, and destroyed nearly all the buildings from Holt's Hotel to the river, being almost the whole square between Fulton, Water, Front and Pearl sts. and Burling slip. Thirty buildings in all were consumed, mostly stores with large and valuable stocks of goods. We have heard no estimate of the probable amount of destruction, but it must be several hundred thousand dollars, as but a very small portion of the goods was saved. Holt's Hotel was for a long time in imminent danger, and would undoubtedly have perished with the rest but for a providential shifting of the wind, from N. E. to N. W. with a great abatement of its force.

The Corn Crop.—The Corn Crop has, we believe, generally proved to be as abundant as that of wheat.

The Winchester Republican says, that in that section of Virginia a better crop was never secured. A correspondent of the Virginian says that he attended the husking and measuring of one acre of corn for Capt. G. C. Harness, of Hardy county, and that it amounted to 178 bushels! The editor adds—"Extraordinary as this may seem, it will not be doubted by those who know the quality of the land on the South Branch. We understand that corn has been offered and refused at that town at $2 per barrel of five bushels. Last year it sold for $4, and since then has, in some instances, commanded a higher price."

UTILITY OF LIME IN PRESERVING FENCE POSTS.

Accident in some instances has led to the discovery that lime applied to wood preserves it from decay. The whitewashing of fences is practised, more as a substitute for paint and for appearance sake, than to prevent decay. Even this superficial mode of applying lime is of some use in preserving wood. Having full confidence in the efficacy of lime as a preservative of wood to make fence posts less subject to rot, I have this season, for the first time used it as follows:—

I provided a number of narrow boards, about three feet long, of various breadths, and one inch thick, with a hole in the end of each. When the hole in the ground was ready for the reception of the post, some lime was put into it; on this lime the post was placed, some of the narrow boards were then selected, and placed to and around the post in the hole after the usual manner; and when filled, the boards were drawn out. This is done with greater facility, by putting a stick into the hole in the upper end of the board, by which it may be raised by a lever or pry, if too fast to draw out otherwise. The boards being all removed, fill the space they occupied with quick lime: if but partially, it is better then if totally slaked it will expand, and make the posts stand very firm. If altogether slaked it also swells, and makes the posts quite secure. From three to five posts with hewn or uniform butts will require one bushel of lime. Boards to surround the post half an inch thick (and perhaps this thickness of lime may be sufficient) would not take half that quantity. The lime is all the additional expense, except the extra labour (which is very trifling) to be incurred by setting a fence, with that part of the posts in the ground enveloped in lime.

To prevent the ground from adhering to the posts at the surface, and occasioning their decay, this part being the one which generally first begins to rot, lime mortar is applied, plastering round the posts with an elevation adjoining to the wood. Into this mortar, gravel was pressed to prevent the rains from washing it away. This mortar may be applied at any time most convenient after the fence is made.—Memoirs of Philadelphia.

A Great Yield.—Mr. Barber, of Bloomfield, informs us, says the Hartford Courant, that he dug on Saturday 1130 pounds Rohan potatoes, the product of 13 pounds planted in the spring.

Seek not to discover the faults of a friend—for, rest assured, if he has any, they will show themselves as soon as you wish to see them.

What don't often occur.—An English paper states that Abraham Meeking and his wife, with 67 of their children and grand children, sat down to tea together, after an entertainment given to them by the farmers and their wives, in their neighborhood.

A Young European, in Constantinople a letter states has recently carried off the most beautiful of the slaves in the harem of the Sultana Esme. The female fugitive took with her jewels belonging to her mistress, worth a million of francs. They have not been traced, but if found will inevitably be put to death.

OBITUARY.

[The following merited tribute of respect to departed worth, from the Albany Argus, we take a melancholly pleasure; in transferring to our columns. Twenty-two years ago we were an indented apprentice to Mr. Buel. As a master he was kind and parental, and as the friend and counsellor of other years, we have lost one whose memory we shall ever revere with emotions of affection.—one whose place will never be filled while we sojourn here below.—Ed.]

We discharge a melancholly office in announcing the death of another of our most respected and valuable citizens, Judge JESSE BUEL expired at Danbury, Ct., at 3 o'clock on Sunday afternoon, in the 63d year of his age. In consonance with the general sorrow, and as a tribute to the character of the first proprietor of this journal, our columns appear in the habiliments of mourning.

Having accepted invitations to deliver anniversary addresses before the Horticultural and Agricultural societies of Norwich and New Haven, Conn., on the 25th and 27th ult. he left home about a fortnight since, with that view. At Danbury, he was seized on Sunday evening with bilious colic of which he was relieved in the course of twenty-four hours; but bilious fever supervened, and he sank under it after an illness of more than a week—receiving, during the time, every attention, and unremitting medical attendance, from the hands of strangers. It was not until Friday last however, soon after his son had left him on his return to Albany to request the attendance of his family physician, that the disorder assumed an alarming aspect. He was accompanied on his journey by his only daughter, of whom he took an affecting and final leave in the full possession of his mental faculties, a few moments before he calmly breathed his last.

Intelligence was brought yesterday morning by express, announcing the expected fatal termination of his illness. It was a melancholly surprise to his anxious family on reaching the steam boat wharf in the afternoon, on their route to his place of illness, to be among the first to learn that his remains had been brought up by the Columbus, the day boat from New York, which arrived before the departure of the afternoon boat.—the body had been brought from Danbury to Poughkeepsie, and thence to this city.

For the last thirty years, Judge Buel has occupied a wide space in the political and agricultural world. In 1813, he removed to this city from Ulster county, and established the Albany Argus. In the following year, he was appointed Printer to the State, and discharged the duties of that station, and of the editorship of the paper, until 1821, when he retired to the farm in the suburbs of the city, since so widely and favorably known as the "Albany Nursery." After his retirement from his editorial labors, he represented the city for successive years in the popular branch of the legislature, and at the period of his death was a Regent of the University. His last appearance in political life, was as the gubernatorial candidate of the opponents of the national administration in 1836.

But is it as an Agriculturist, in the great and broad sense of the word, practically and scientifically, that he has built his fame as a public benefactor. As such, he was known throughout this continent and in the old world; and no man has contributed more, as a writer, and in practical life, to elevate, inform and improve the Agriculture of his age. Nearly six years ago as an auxiliary to his plan for the diffusion of knowledge on this subject Judge B. established "The Cultivator," a monthly publication, of the highest value, and of great circulation throughout the American continent. His labors however were not confined to his monthly publication, ample as were its pages. His pen was in constant requisition upon nearly every subject connected with the cultivation of the soil, and his correspondence, throughout the Union, and abroad, was extensive.

In example, not less than in precept, he may be said to have conferred blessings upon the times in which he lived—blessings that will continue to fructify, and ripen into fruit, long after his body shall have mingled with his favorite earth.

As a neighbor and a citizen,—and in all the relations of domestic life—he was without reproach. He was esteemed not less for his integrity than his intelligence and worth—for the unaffected affability and simplicity of manner in his intercourse with his fellow men. He may be said to have lived for utility; and to have died in the prosecution of his favorite employment. His death is a public bereavement, which all will mourn as irreparable.

DIED.

Livingston, resigned; and that three Senators are to be chosen at the said election to represent the said Third Senate District, according to a notice from the Secretary of State, of which a copy is annexed.

MICHAEL ARTCHER, Sheriff.

STATE OF NEW-YORK,

SECRETARY'S OFFICE, Albany, Oct. 11, 1839. To the Sheriff of the County of Albany—

Sir: Notice is hereby given you that since the general notice of election was issued from this office, on the 15th day of August last, a vacancy has happened in the representation of the Third District, by the resignation of Edward P. Livingston, a Senator from that district, whose term of office would have expired on the last day of December 1841; and that a Senator to supply the said vacancy is to be chosen at the next general election, to be held on the 4th, 5th, and 6th days November next.—There are therefore three Senators to be chosen in the Third Senate District, (comprising among others the County of which you are Sheriff,) at the next general election, viz: one in the place of James Powers, whose term of service will expire on the last day of December next; one in the place of Nondiah Johnson, deceased; and one in the place of Edward P. Livingston, resigned.

JOHN C. SPENCER, Secretary of State.

N. B. You are to give notice of the above mentioned election in writing to one of the inspectors of each town and ward in your county, and to annex thereto a copy of this notice. You are also to publish such notice and copy in all public newspapers printed in your county.

STANZAS

Supposed to have been written by a celebrated writer of the day, after an estrangement from one in whom he had placed his heart's confidence.

"October, there are sadder hours than thine,
There is a never-ending winter of the heart"—Ode to Winter.

Flowers of the sunny May
Sport through summer's laughing day—
Victims fall to chill's decay, 'neath autumn's sky—
Skies that to the hills descend,
Pure as thought of friend to friend,
Shrink when on them lightnings bend their frenzied eye.

Straying free in fortune's path
Joy was mine, though now it hath Felt the cureless bruise of wrath—no matter how;
For when love by hate is stung,
And blight falls where rapture sprung,
Ties will break by which we clung, as mine do now.

Fame around love's dreamings curled,
Time each sanguine hope unfurled
On the waves those hopes are hurled, to sink forgot,
Changed is youth's devoted crowd,
Gone the shrine to which I bowed—
On life's sunshine rest, a cloud, and love's a blot!

She, adored of all below,
Friend should have been, not a foe,
To become of bitter woe, its shroud and pall.
Vain to weave the bankrupt line,
Hard to kneel at sorrow's shrine,
Drop and die, like frosted vine, in passion's thrall!

How could those eyes I've sunned beneath,
Hatred nurse and frowns bequeath,
Was't for that I won the wreath of laureled fame?—
Toss it on the shapeless blast,
It but mocks the rapture past—
Let me be on wild shores cast—without a name!

A SKETCH.

Brown is her hair, Her form divine,
Blue is her een, Her motion grace—
Complexion fair She seems love's shrine
As morning's sheen. And dwelling place.

Classic her nose, But here's the thorn,
Ruby her lip; That image fair
Her cheek a rose Is but a form,
Which red tints tip. No mind is there:

The casket bright,
The jewel dim,
Without all light,
All dark within.

T

THE OCEAN.

Likeness of Heaven.
Agent of power,
Man is thy victim,
Shipwreck thy dower;
Spices and jewels
From valley and sea;
Armies and banners,
Are buried in thee.

What are the riches
Of Mexico's mines
To the wealth that far down
In thy deep waters shines?
The proud Navies that cover
The conquering West,
Thou fling'st them to Death
With one heave of thy breast!

From the high hills that view
Thy wreck-making shore,
When the bride of the mariner,
Stricks at the roar;
When like lambs in the tempest,
Or now in the blast,

O'er thy ridge-broken billows
The canvass is cast.

How humbling to one
With a heart and a soul,
To look on thy greatness,
And list to thy roll;
To think how that heart
In cold ashes shall be,
When the voice of Eternity
Rises from thee!

Yes! where are the cities
Of Thebes and of Tyre?
Swept from the nations,
Like sparks from the fire;
The glory of Athens,
The splendor of Rome?
Dissolved, and for ever,
Like drew in its foam.

But thou art almighty,
Eternal, sublime,
Unweakened, unwasted,
Twin-brother of Time!
Fleets, tempests, nor nations
Thy glory can bow:
As the stars first beheld thee,
Still chainless art thou!

But hold! when thy surges
No longer shall roll,
And that firmament's length!
Drawn back like a scroll,
Then, then shall the spirit
That sighs by thee now
Be more mighty, more lasting,
More chainless than thou.

The following touching piece of versification was produced by a young lady of our city previous to her departure for the south. She has since made the spirit-land her home.—EL.

From the Evening Journal.

STANZAS.

I go, my father, yet I fain
Would linger with the still,
Oh clasp me in thy arms again,
I will be calm—I will.

But thoughts from mem'ry's fount burst free
Thoughts of the blessed past;
I cannot check the tears you see,
They flow so thick and fast.

But let them flow; my breaking heart
Will in them find relief;
I cannot act the Stoic's part,
For mine's no common grief.

I leave thee father, leave my home,
To breathe a balmy air:
In southern climes for health I'll roam,—
But you will not be there.

And who save you, on earth can give Me all a father's care;
I'll miss you every day I live,
I'll miss you every where.

THE DEATH BED.

There was an hour of weeping—for the young
And beautiful was sinking in the wave
Which rolls in bitterness upon the shore
Of being, and a spirit on the wing
For Heaven, yet lingered, in that last strange dream
Whose waking is Eternity. Her eye
Was closed by fallen lashes; and a smile
Hung on her lip, as imaged by the bright
Revelments from the spiritual world of joy.
She lay there in her loveliness—a bud
Rent from its parent stem, ere yet its bloom
Had opened to the spring time. On her cheek
Crimson and paleness came—as life's last light
Went trembling into darkness. It was hard—Yea—very hard to die!

There came a change—
A murmur and a shudder like the leaf

Which trembles ere it falls. One feeble sigh—
An inarticulate motion of the lip—
And all was o'er. The prisoned soul was free!

THE HEART'S FREEDOM.

BY MISS BARDOX.

Oh! the heart is a free and a fetterless thing,
A wave of the ocean! a bird on the wing!
A riderless steed o'er the desert-plain bounding,
A peal of the storm o'er the valley resounding:
It spurns at all bonds, and it mocks the decree
Of the world and its proud ones, and dares to be free!

Oh! the heart may be tamed by a smile or a tone
From the lip and the eye of a beautiful one;
But the frown and the force with its impulse contending,
Ever find it as adamant, cold and unbending;
It may break, it may burst, but its tyrants will see
That even in ruin it dares to be free!

New York, Sept. 1839.

SHERIFF'S OFFICE.—City and county of Albany, August 15, 1839.

ELECTION NOTICE.—A general election is to be held in the county of Albany on the 4th, 5th, and 6th, days of November next at which will be chosen the officers mentioned in the notice from the Secretary of State, of which a copy is annexed.

MICHAEL ARTCHER, Sheriff,
State of New York, Secretary's Office,
Albany, Aug. 15, 1839.

Sir—Notice is hereby given you that the term of service of James Powers, a Senator of the Third Senate District of this state will expire on the last day of December next, and that a senator is to be chosen in that district, to which the county of which you are sheriff belongs. at the general election to be held on the fourth, fifth and sixth days of November next.

You will also take notice, that a vacancy has been caused in the representation of the Third Senate District, by the death of Nadiash Johnson, a senator from that district, whose term of office would have expired on the last day of December, 1840: and that a senator to supply the said vacancy is to be chosen at the said next general election.

You will also take notice, that a proposed amendment to the constitution is to be submitted to the people at the said election, at which the electors are to vote, "For the election of Mayors by the People," or "Against the election of Mayors by the People." At the same election the following officers are to be chosen, viz: Three members of Assembly.

JOHN C. SPENCER, Secretary of State.

MISCELLANY.

HOW TO MAKE A YOUNG WIFE OF AN OLD MAID.

The following true story might perhaps furnish matter for a little comedy, if comedies were still written in England. It is generally the case that the more beautiful and the richer a young female is, the more difficult are both her parents and herself in the choice of a husband, and the more offers they refuse. The one is too tall the other too short, this not wealthy, that not respectable enough. Meanwhile one spring passes after another, and year after year carries away leaf after leaf of the bloom of youth, and opportunity after opportunity. Miss Harriet Selwood was the richest heiress in her native town; but she had already completed her twenty-seventh year, and beheld almost all her young friends united to men whom she had at one time or other discarded. Harriet began to be set down for an old maid. Her parents became really uneasy, and she herself lamented in private a position which is not a natural one, and to which those to whom nature and fortune have been niggardly of their gifts are obliged to submit; but Harriet as we have said, was both handsome and very rich. Such was the state of things when her uncle a wealthy merchant in the north of England, came on a visit to her parents. He was a jovial, lively, straight-forward man, accustomed to attack all difficulties boldly and coolly. "You see," said her father to him one day, "Harriet continues single. The girl is handsome; what she is to have for her fortune, you know: even in this scandal-loving town, not a creature can breathe the slightest imputation against her; and yet she is getting to be an old maid."

"True," replied the uncle; "but, look you, brother, the grand point in every affair in this world is to seize the right moment: this you have not done—it is a misfortune; but let the girl go along with me, and before the end of three months I will return her to you as the wife of a man as young and wealthy as herself." Away went the niece with the uncle. On the way home he thus addressed her:—"Mind what I am going to say. You are no longer Miss Selwood, but Mrs. Lumley, my niece, a young, wealthy, childless widow; you had the misfortune to lose your husband, Colonel Lumley, after a happy union of a quarter of a year, by a fall from his horse while hunting." "But, uncle—" "Let me manage, if you please, Mrs. Lumley. Your father has invested me with full powers. Here look you, is the wedding ring given you by your late husband. Jewels, and whatever else you need, your aunt will supply you with; and accustom yourself to cast down your eyes." The keen witted uncle introduced his niece every where, and the young widow excited a great sensation. The gentleman thronged about her, and she soon had her choice out of twenty suitors. Her uncle advised her to take the one who was deepest in love with her, and a rare chance decreed that this should be precisely the most amiable and opulent. The match was soon concluded, and one day the uncle desired to say a few words to his future nephew in private. "My dear, sir," he began, "we have told you an untruth." "How so? Are Mrs. Lumley's affections—" "Nothing of the kind. My niece is sincerely attached to you." "Then, her fortune, I suppose, is not equal to what you told me?" "On the contrary it is larger." "Well, what is the matter then?" "A joke, an innocent joke which came into my head one day when I was in good humour,—we could not well recall it afterward. My niece is not a widow." "What! is Colonel Lumley living?" "No, no—she is a spinster." The lover protested that he was a happier fellow than he had conceived himself; and the old maid was forthwith metamorphosed into a young wife."

JUST REPROOF.

A woodman having been subpoenaed as a witness in a cause, pertinaciously insisted on some point which it was the object of counsel to get over; the poor woodman answered every beguiling question by a plain repetition of the fact which he had at first stated. He was allowed to stand aside, and happy was he of this partial respite. His temporary quiescence was, however soon broken in upon, by the leading barrister, in a cross examination, darting his fierce inuendo. "You, sir, with the leather jacket, how much have you been paid for swearing in this cause?" The reply was tart and true, and redounded to the credit of our hero. "If you were no better paid for bawling and squalling than I am for swearing, you'd wear a leather jacket too." The legal luminary was silenced.

DUEL FOR THE HONOUR OF ABERDEEN BUTTER.

Sir Walter Scott has alluded to the laird of Culrossie "who fought a duel for the honour of Aberdeen butter" (Crocker's Boswell, vol. iii. p. 38). Would that he had told the story! It goes that an English gentleman supping in a Glasgow coffee-room, ordered the waiter to remove the butter on the table and bring him better. The servant replied that his master had no better, for that was Aberdeen butter; and the Englishman was proceeding to growl in very audible terms at Scotch butter in general, and particularly Aberdeen butter, when a gentleman from a neighbouring box addressed him with "That's nae true; Aberdeen butter is as gude butter as e'er gaed down your ha'se!" The consequences may be imagined; a challenge was promptly given and as promptly accepted, and the parties met. In the combat, which was with small-swords, Culrossie was worsted; but after thanking his adversary for his fe, he added, "I'll say yet, that better butter than Aberdeen butter ne'er gaed down a Southron's thrapple Book Bon Accord."

A HINT TO TEA DRINKERS.

The invaluable beverage, tea, sometimes produces injurious effects, more particularly green tea; and this arises from its containing a considerable quantity of free gallic acid. The fact may be rendered evident by adding to an infusion of the leaves a few drops of a solution of green copperas, which will turn the liquid black. This acid is a powerful astringent, and in peculiar habits is productive of much inconvenience. To prevent any evil effects, a few grains of carbonate of soda, mixed with the tea, will be found an infallible specific. The acid and alkali by their union form a neutral salt of mild but effective virtues. The quantity of acid contained in tea may be fairly estimated by noticing the effervescence which occurs when carbonate of soda is added to the infusion. The deep colour of the latter is greatly increased by the alkali, and taste is not only uninjured by it, but some think actually improved.

BRUMMELIANA.

The celebrated Beau Brummel was the subject of a short paper in a former Journal. To the memorabilia of him, there recorded, the following, from a publication of past date, entitled the Literary Pocket Book form an appropriate addition:—

Having taken it into his head, at one time, to eat no vegetables, and being asked by a lady if he had never eaten any in his life, "Yes, madam; I once ate a pea."

Being met limping in Bond street, and asked what was the matter, he said he had hurt his leg, and "the worst of it was, it was his favorite leg."

Somebody inquiring where he was going to dine next day, was told that he really did not now: "they put me in a coach and take me somewhere."

He pronounced of a fashionable tailor that he made a good coat, an exceedingly good coat, all but the collar: nobody could achieve, a good collar, but Jenkins.

Having borrowed some money of a city beau, whom he patronised in return, he was one day asked to repay it; upon which he thus complained to a friend: "Do you know what has happened?" "No." "Why, do you know, there's that fellow Tompkins, who lent me five hundred pounds; he has had the face to ask me for it; and yet I had called the dog 'Tom,' and let myself dine with him."

"You have a cold, Mr. Brummel," observed a sympathising group. "Why, do you know," said he, "that on the Brighton road, the other day, that infidel Weston (his valet) put me in a room with a damp stranger."

Being asked if he liked port, he said, with an air of difficult recollection, "port? port!—Oh, port!—Oh, ay; what, the hot intoxicating liquor so much drunk by the lower orders?"

Going to a rout, where he had not been invited, or rather, perhaps, where the host wished to mortify him and attempted it, he turned placidly round to him, and with a happy mixture of indifference and surprise, asked him his name. "Johnson," was the answer. "Jaulson," said Brummel, recollecting, and pretending to feel for a card; "Oh, the name, I remember, was Thauson (Thompson); and Jaunson and Thompson; you know, Jaunson and Thauson, are really so much the same kind of thing!"

A beggar petitioned him for charity, even if it was only a farthing: "Fellow," said Mr. Brummel, softening the disdain of the appellation in the gentleness of his tone, "I don't know the coin."

Having thought himself invited to somebody's country seat, and being given to understand, after one night's lodging, that he was in error, he told an unconscious friend in town, who asked him what sort of a place it was, that it was an "exceedingly good place for stopping one night in."

Speaking lightly of a man, and wishing to convey his maximum of contemptuous feeling about him, he said, "He is a fellow, now, that would send his plate up twice for soup."

It being supposed that he once failed in a matrimonial speculation, somebody consoled with him; upon which he smiled, with an air of better knowledge on that point, and said, with a sort of indifferent feel of his neckcloth. "Why, sir, the truth is, I had great reluctance in cutting the connection; but what could I do (Here he looked deploring and conclusive.) Sir, I discovered that the wretch, positively did eat cabbage."

On being asked by a friend during an unreasonable summer, if he had ever seen such a one? "Yes," replied Brummel, "last winter."

On a reference being made to him as to what sum would be sufficient to meet the annual expenditure for clothes, he said, "That with a moderate degree of prudence and economy, he thought it might be managed for eight hundred per annum."

He told a friend that he was reforming his way of life. "For instance," said he, "I sup early; I take a-a-little lobster, an apricot puff, or so, and some burnt champagne, about twelve; and my man gets me to bed by three."

From the Edinburgh Journal.

THE MAIDEN AN ANCIENT INSTRUMENT OF EXECUTION.

A favourite theme of gossips, stories in Scotland is the Maiden, an instrument of execution very nearly resembling the modern French guillotine, which was in considerable practice during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, especially for the punishment of state offenders. The common tale is, that the Earl of Morton, so eminent as a statesman during the reign of Mary, who ultimately came to be Regent of Scotland, introduced this instrument from abroad, and was himself—so willed the fates—the first to suffer by it. It does not seem to have been used since the Revolution: when Pennant visited our northern clime in 1772, he found a specimen of the implement, being probably that which had been used in Edinburgh, laid aside as a piece of lumber in a room under the Parliament House. The axe connected with another has long been kept in the town's armoury of Aberdeen. About twenty-five years ago, the machine kept underneath the Parliament House, was obtained by the Scottish Antiquarian Society, and placed by them in their hall, or museum, where it still exists, and is open every day to public inspection.

This remarkable engine of death—in all probability the very same which dispatched Morton and many not less eminent men—is a huge ungainly piece of timber work, about ten feet high, blackened over, and altogether such a thing in look and bearing, as any one would at a glance presume, to have had a terrible history. Two upright beams, about twelve inches apart, connected at the top and bottom, by cross pieces, form a grooved channel for the rising and falling of the axe—a deep blade, loaded with a vast weight of lead. At 4 feet from the ground, is another cross bar, covered deeply with leather, on which the culprit laid his head. A moveable piece, coming down above, enclosed and fixed the neck till the axe had done its duty. The rope used for pulling up and sustaining the axe, was fastened to a trigger placed upon a sloping beam which supports the upright grooved frame, like hypotenuse of a triangle. On the trigger being moved, the rope of course gave way, and the axe, descending with a force derived from its weight, and the space traversed (about six feet), sheared through the interposed neck, and only stopped on the leather-covered cross bar—the head falling into a basket behind, the hook for suspending which is still fixed in the Wood. The body of the criminal is supposed to have been laid along upon a bench or table, the end of which was brought against the two upright beams, at about the same height with the bar for the neck. Of this bench no part has been preserved. It is also to be remarked that one of the upright beams, having been found greatly decayed was replaced by another of fresh timber, at the expense of the Society. The upright and sloping beams are fixed on a lying framework, necessary for giving stability to the instrument.

It will be observed from this description that the celebrated invention of Dr. Guillotin is in some respects an improvement upon the Scottish Maiden. The axe in that case, is arrested by no cross beam, but, after sheering through the neck, descends several feet lower. Its lip is also oblique, in order that it may have a surer effect in cutting through what is opposed to its descent. Finally, in connection with the frame-work for the axe, there is a moveable board, on which the culprit is bound upright, which is then folded down and pushed forward the forward movement being that which loosens the axe, so that the whole operation is conducted with the greatest possible dispatch and certainty. Hence it is that the average duration of a French execution, from the arrival of the criminal on the scaffold, to his being a headless corpse, is from one minute and a half to two minutes.

Notwithstanding the confidence with which tradition speaks of the introduction of the Maiden into Scotland, the early history of our employment of the instrument must be considered as obscure. Beheading with a sword was a common mode of punishment in the middle ages. It prevailed in Scotland, as well as in other European countries. For example, the gallant Sir John Gordon, who suffered at Aberdeen in 1562 for rebellion, was beheaded with a sword, and cruelly mangled, we are told, by an unskilful executioner. As this was an operation which necessarily depended much on the skill and strength of the man employed in it, we cannot wonder that ingenuity was set to work in various places, to effect decollation with mechanical accuracy. We have heard of such mechanical contrivances being in use both in Italy and Germany. At Halifax in Yorkshire, from an early period, an instrument exactly like the Scottish Maiden was used, being the only thing of the kind ever employed, as far as we are aware, in England. Whether it was set up there, by Earl Warren, son-in-law of the Conqueror, to punish trespassers on his forest of Hardwick, or in the reign of Henry VII., to repress the depredations suffered by the cloth-tenters who then began to flourish in Halifax, is unsettled by antiquaries; perhaps neither surmise is true. The instrument, however, would appear to have been designed from an early age for a peculiar terror to evil-doers in that district; and the promptitude with which it was put into action became proverbial. By a quaint regulation highly characteristic of our ancestors, when a cow or a horse was the piece of property stolen, the animal was caused by means of a rope to pull the trigger, and thus become the proximate executioner of justice upon the offender. By records it is ascertained that twenty-five persons suffered by the Maiden at Halifax in the reign of Elizabeth, and at least twelve between 1623 and 1650 after which it became disused. Pennant, in 1772, saw, at the end of the town, the stone-built platform, about four feet high and thirteen broad, on which the instrument used to do its deadly work.

According to the History of the House of Douglas, the author of which lived in Scotland at the time when Morton suffered, that nobleman had caused the Maiden to be made "after the pattern which he had seen in Halifax in Yorkshire. The author says nothing which can countenance the now existing story as to Morton having been the first to suffer by the instrument in Scotland. In a manuscript work of inferior authority, entitled "Divine Providence," written in the reign of Charles the II., by a clergyman named Fraser, and which is preserved in the Advocates' Library, it is stated that Morton took the pattern of the instrument from one which he saw in Italy during his travels in early life; and it is added, that from his being the first to suffer by the machine, a popular and not very delicate remark was made, which gave rise to the appellation by which the instrument came to be distinguished. It is also worthy of notice, that Kelly introduces it into his collection of proverbs. "He that invented the Maiden, first hanged it." That Morton did introduce the Maiden, is to be considered as likely, since we have the respectable authority of Hume of Godscroft on that point; but that he was not the first to suffer by it, has lately been rendered certain by a paper read before the Scottish Antiquarian Society by the Rev. Dr. Lee, one of the ministers of Edinburgh. In this paper the following excerpt is given from the books of the treasurer of the city of Edinburgh, where it appears under date of April 3, 1566. "For beiring dailis and puncheons fra the Blackfrisers to the Croce with the Gibbet and Madin, and awaiting thereon, the day when Thomas Scot was justefeit, vij sh. To Andro Gotterson, snyth, for grynding of the Madin, v sh." Now, though Morton was one of the most guilty parties in the murder of Rizzio, for which the comparatively humble Thomas Scot was "justefeit," this event was fifteen years antecedent to the death of the Regent. In the ensuing August, Andro Gotterson gets five shillings "for grynding of the Widow." Are we to suppose that the Maiden and the Widow were at this time employed as convertible terms for the same instrument? It is shrewdly remarked in a clever book just published, that, the story of Morton's being the first to suffer by the Maiden, is "just such an exaggeration as the popular voice most affects. Thus to the fact that Deacon Brodie suffered by his own improved drop, common fame has added the embellishment that he was the first to prove its efficiency. And thus Dr.

Joseph Ignace Guillotin died quietly in his bed, on the 26th of May, 1814, aged three score and seven years, long after it was universally reported and believed that he had perished by the machine which has given to his name an immortality of infamy."

The Earl of Gowrie in 1584 (father of the celebrated conspirator) seems to have been the only man of distinction who suffered by the Maiden between the period of Morton's death and the time of the Civil War. Hanging and burning were the favorite modes of executions during the intermediate age. The instrument appears to have been again brought into use in 1646, when the Scotch Parliament found an opportunity of wreaking their vengeance upon Sir Robert Spotiswood, the distinguished Royalist, who had been taken prisoner at the battle of Philiphaugh. Sir Robert had come to Scotland with a commission from Charles I as secretary of state: it could not be alleged against him that he had born arms among the Royalists, unless, as he said, his walking-cane could be so designated. In fact, his only crime was that of being son to the late Archbishop of St Andrews. Nevertheless the Estate determined that he should suffer. They were at that time sitting at St. Andrews, on account of the plague which raged in Edinburgh, and they determined to have their iniquitous sentence carried into execution in that town, from an idea that the seat of his father's aggrandisement was an appropriate scene for the degradation of their victim. They accordingly issued the following warrant to have the Maiden brought to St. Andrews from Dundee, in which town, for some reason unknown, it happened to be at that time.

"Decimo sexto Januarii, 1649—38 die Parl, at St. Andrews.—The Estates of Parliament give hereby warrant to transport the Maiden from Dundee to St. Andrews, and ordains the Magistrates of Dundee to deliver the Maiden to sic as sal be sent from the town of St. Andrews for transporting thereof. Quharanent thir present sal be ane warrant."

It was accordingly used for the execution of this venerable gentlemen—one of those rash and vindictive proceedings which were only expiated in the succeeding reign by the oppressions and persecutions to which the Scottish Presbyterians were in their turn subjected by the Royalists. Two or three other prisoners taken at Philiphaugh were executed by the Maiden.

The next personage who fell a sacrifice to it was the Marquis of Huntly, in 1649. About this period, and for some years later, it was used to execute almost all kinds of criminals. We have observed from a manuscript abridgment of the Books of Justiciary child-murder were executed by it. Perhaps it was as a peculiar ignominious distinction that the Marquis of Montrose, in 1650, was hanged. A return to the disgrace of the rope, in his case, might be looked upon as not the least severe part of a punishment intended to comprehend every possible indignity.

After the Restoration, if less actively employed, the Maiden was still continued in use. It was brought into play at the execution of the Marquis of Argyll, in 1661, as also that of his son the Earl in 1665; the latter, in kneeling to submit his neck to the axe, embraced the instrument in his arms, and said it was the sweetest maiden he had ever kissed. After this time, there occurs no notice of its ever having been again employed.

GRIMALDI AND HIS WIFE—A CASE OF POISONING.

I cannot refrain from telling a story, which I know to be true, of the oldest Grimaldi, the first of the race. Grimaldi and his wife were occasionally in the habit of quarrelling. At length their feuds assumed a very serious aspect: and after communing together upon their most miserable state of "incompatibility of temper," they resolved to destroy themselves, as the only means of relieving themselves from their most miserable condition. In accordance with this most extraordinary resolution, Mr. Grimaldi proceeded to an apothecary's shop in the neighbourhood, and asked for an ounce of arsenic "to poison de rats." The "culler of simples" obsequiously bowed, and delivered to the devoted Grimaldi the dose that he trusted would emancipate him from all worldly ills. Firm to their purpose, the illustrious Punch and Judy swallowed in tumblers of water, each a moiety of the deadly "drink," and then embracing, retired, one to their hymeneal bed in the bed-room, and the other to a sofa in the sitting room—both rooms communicating—the door between them being left open. The pair of suicides lay down, tears filling their eyes; a long and solemn pause ensued—no sound of groans, no sigh of anguish was heard—all was still as night. At last wearied out with expectation, Grimaldi raised his head from the pillow, and in the deepest possible tone of voice cried out, "Mrs. Grimaldi are you dead, my love?" Upon which Mrs. Grimaldi, in the highest possible squeak, replied, "No, Mr. Grimaldi." The rejoinder sounded something like "Dom:" what it meant, the imagination of the delicate reader may supply. At the end of another half hour, it became Mrs. Grimaldi's turn to be anxious as to the success of the potion, and she hearing nothing in the next room, raised herself in the bed and said in her squeak, "Mr. Grimaldi, my dear, are you dead?" To which the gruff reply was, "No, Mrs. Grimaldi." And for two hours these questions and answers went on periodically, till at last, the lady's turn coming again, she repeated the inquiry in a somewhat more excited and exalted tone, and almost screamed out Mr. Grimaldi, my love, are you not dead? No, my dear," said Grimaldi, "I am not; nor do I think I can die to-night, unless it be of starvation, Mrs. Grimaldi; get up out of bed and see for some supper, for I am very hungry." So ended this fatal performance; the apothecary, who had heard of the perpetual bickerings of Punch and Jumpy in their menage, having prudentially given him a small parcel of magnesia, which the unhappy pair had divided between them.—New Monthly Magazine.

THE WALTZING BEAR

In the end of the year 1837, a scene took place at Czerny in Bohemia, which might be remembered with advantage at this particular period in Britain, where there is a growing passion for the exhibition of wild beast on public stages. A Bohemian manager of a theatre, having heard of the immense success attending representations where real dogs, elephants, monkeys, &c. were introduced, bethought himself of trying to turn a bear to account in his own dramatic temple. Accordingly, he got his literary assistant to compose a little melodrama, in which all was made subservient to the operations of a trained bear, which the manager had got hold of. The plot ran thus:—A dethroned king having fled to the mountains, fell in with a bear that had been wounded by the hunters. Androcles-like, the monarch relieved the bear of its pain, and thus acquired its warmest gratitude. The feats of agility performed by the bear, several dances by him and by savages, or rather peasants, with a due allowance of thunder and particoloured flames, formed the leading attractions of the piece. It was beyond measure successful. Every body admired the docility of Bruin, his agility in climbing, and his grace in a closing waltz with a young peasant girl. After a run of several nights, however, the bear seemed on one evening disinclined to his work. The star of the night—Ursa Major—appeared desirous to withdraw its light. But by dint of energetic remonstrances at the side-scene, he was got to move on till the appointed time for the waltz. He stood up with his fair partner, and began to advance and retreat very elegantly. The audience were in raptures. They stood up on the seats to see more perfectly. All at once a shriek burst from the stage. All who were upon it fled, and the first to be off was the partner of the bear. The spectators were not alarmed at first at this, thinking it a part of the usual performance; but they speedily saw their error when the bear turned round and moved forward to the front of the stage, with the muzzle, which formed the wonted protection against his freaks, hanging loose from his neck! Off went the musicians in one instant; and off the shrieking audience tried to go also. The crush was terrible. Many were trampled down and seriously hurt. At length all the lower part of the theatre was cleared without any injury inflicted by Bruin, who continued, meanwhile, to the unspeakable horror of those who were hindmost in the crush, to cross from the stage to the pit benches. There he lay quietly down to sleep, and there he was quietly muzzled sometime afterwards by his keepers.

On account of the alarm and the contusions received on this occasion, the authorities interfered, and the Great Bear never starred it again in the theatre of Czerny.—French Newspaper.

HEROISM OF A PEASANT.

The following generous action has always struck me extremely; there is somewhat even of sublime in it.

A great inundation having taken place in the north of Italy, owing to an excessive fall of snow in the Alps, followed by a speedy thaw, the river Adige carried off a bridge near Verona, except the middle part, on which was the house of the toll-gatherer, or porter, I forget which; and who, with his whole family, thus remained imprisoned by the waves, and in momentary danger of destruction. They were discovered from the banks, stretching forth their hands, screaming and imploring succour, while fragments of this remaining arch were continually dropping into the water. In this extreme danger, a nobleman, who was present, a Count of Pulverini, held out a purse of one hundred sequins, as a reward to any adventurer who would take a boat and deliver this unhappy family. But the risk was so great of being borne down by the rapidity of the stream, or being dashed against the fragment of the bridge, or of being crushed by the falling stones, that not one, in the vast number of spectators, had courage enough to attempt such an exploit. A peasant, passing along, was informed of the proposed reward. Immediately jumped into a boat, he by strength of oars gained the middle of the river, brought his boat under the pile, and the whole family safely descended by means of a rope. "Courage!" cried he, "now you are safe." By a still more strenuous effort, and great strength of arm, he brought the boat and family to shore. "Brave fellow," exclaimed the count, handing the purse to him, "here is the promised recompense." "I shall never expose my life for money," answered the peasant.—"My labour is a sufficient livelihood for myself, my wife, and children. Give the purse to this poor family, who have lost all."

A Dutiful Son.—A jockey in this town, wishing to make an advantageous display of a horse that he was desirous of selling to a bystander, placed his boy upon the beast, ordering him to ride him around a short distance. The boy, though well instructed in his trade, unfortunately, in this instance, knew not whether the horse was already his father's or yet to be bargained for—being anxious; therefore, to learn the will of his father, he stopped after riding a short distance and inquired with a loud voice, "Father, shall I ride this horse to buy or sell?"

CHARACTER.

LORD EXMOUTH.

ADMIRAL LORD EXMOUTH (formerly Mr. Pellew) was noted in boyhood for an extraordinary degree of daring and spirit. "While he was a midshipman in the Blonde," says Mr. Osler in his life of the Admiral, "he did the ship's duty with a smartness which none of them could equal; and as every one takes pleasure where he excels, he had soon become a thorough seaman. At the same time, the buoyancy of youth, and a naturally playful disposition, led him continually into feats of more than common daring. In the spring of 1775, General Burgoyne took his passage to America in the Blonde, and when he came alongside the yards were manned to receive him. Looking up, he was surprised to see a midshipman on the yard arm standing on his head. Captain Pownoll, who was at his side, soon quieted his apprehensions by assuring him it was only one of the usual frolics of young Pellew, and that the General might make himself quite at ease for his safety, for that if he should fall he would only go under the ship's bottom and come up on the other side. What on this occasion was probably spoken but in jest, was afterwards more than realized; for he actually sprang from the foreyard of the Blonde, while she was going fast through the water, and saved a man who had fallen overboard. Captain Pownoll reproached him for his rashness, but he shed tears when he spoke of it to the officers, and declared that Pellew was a noble fellow."

The number of human beings, whom he saved from death, by his personal exertions in the course of his long career, is said to have been very great. Perhaps the most notable of all his actions of this order was the following:—"On the 26th of January 1796, when the Indefatigable was lying in Hamoaze, after having been docked, the Dutton, a large East Indiaman, employed in the transport service, on her way to the West Indies, with part of the 2d or Queen's regiment, was driven into Plymouth by stress of weather. She had been out seven weeks, and had many sick on board. The gale increasing in the afternoon, it was determined to run, for greater safety, to Catwater; but the buoy at the extremity of the reef off Mount Batten having broke a drift, of which the pilots were not aware, she touched on the shoal and carried away her rudder. Thus rendered unmanageable, she fell off, and grounded under the citadel where, beating round she lay rolling heavily with her broadside to the waves. At the second roll, she threw all her masts overboard together.

Sir Edward (he had then been knighted) and Lady Pellew, were engaged to dine on that day with Dr. Hawker, the excellent vicar of Charles, who had become acquainted with Mr. Pellew when they were serving together at Plymouth as surgeons to the marines, and continued through life the intimate and valued friend of all the brothers. Sir Edward noticed the crowds running to the Hoe, and, having learned the cause, he sprang out of the carriage, and ran off with the rest. Arrived at the beach, he saw at once that the loss of nearly all on board, between five and six hundred was inevitable, without some one to direct them. The principal officers of the ship had abandoned their charge, and got on shore, just as he arrived on the beach. Having urged them, but without success, to return to their duty, and vainly offered rewards to pilots and others belonging to the port, to board the wreck, for all thought it too hazardous to be attempted, he exclaimed, "then I will go myself." A single rope, by which the officers and a few others had landed, formed the only communication with the ship, and by this he was hauled on board through the surf. The danger was greatly increased by the wreck of the masts, which had fallen towards the shore; and he received an injury on the back, which confined him to his bed for a week, in consequence of being dragged under the mainmast. But disregarding this at the time, he reached the deck, declared himself, and assumed the command. He assured the people that every one would be saved, if they quietly obeyed his orders; that he would himself be the last to quit the wreck; but that he would run any one through who disobeyed him. His well known name, with the calmness and energy he displayed, gave confidence to the despairing multitude. He was received with three hearty cheers, which were echoed by the multitude on shore; and his promptitude at resource soon enabled him to find and apply the means by which all might be safely landed. His officers in the meantime, though not knowing that he was on board, were exerting themselves to bring assistance from the Indefatigable, Mr. Pellew, first lieutenant, left the ship in the barge, and Mr. Thomson, acting master, in the launch; but the boats could not be brought alongside the wreck, and were obliged to run for the Barbican. A small boat, belonging to a merchant vessel, was more fortunate. Mr. Esdell, signal midshipman to the port admiral, and Mr. Coglan, mate of the vessel, succeeded, at the risk of their lives, in bringing her alongside. The ends of two additional hawsers were got on shore, & Sir Edward contrived cradles to be slung upon them, with travelling ropes to pass forward and backward between the ship and the beach. Each hawser was held on shore by a number of men, who watched the rolling of the wreck, and kept the ropes tight and steady. Meantime a cutter had with great difficulty worked out of Plymouth Pool, and two large boats arrived from the dock-yard, under the direction of Mr. Hemmings, the master-attendant, by whose caution and judgment they were enabled to approach the wreck, and receive the more helpless of the passengers, who were carried to the cutter. Sir Edward, with his sword drawn, directed the proceedings, and preserved order; a task the more difficult as the soldiers had got at the spirits before he came on board, and many were drunk. The children, the women, and the sick, were the first landed. One of them was only three weeks old, and nothing in the whole transaction impressed Sir Edward more strongly than, the struggle of the mother's feelings before she would entrust her infant to his care, or afforded him more pleasure than the success of his attempt to save it. Next the soldiers were got on shore; then the ship's company; and, finally Sir Edward himself, who was one of the last to leave her. Every one was saved, and presently after the wreck went to pieces.

Nothing could equal the lustre of such an action, except the modesty of him who was the hero of it. He would have assigned the whole praise to others in his report of this deed. But the truth was known, and the freedom of the town of Plymouth, and a service of plate from the Liverpool merchants, were voted to him in acknowledgment of the act.

A TALE OF SLANDER.

BY A YOUNG LADY.

There is perhaps no vice so much tolerated in society at the same time so deleterious in its effect as evil speaking. It is confined to no class of community; the high, the low, the rich, the poor, the old and young are alike its victims.

'Good morning,' Mrs. Adams, I hope you will excuse my troubling you so early, I have called to enquire concerning Mary Munson, she informs me that she has been living with you the last three months, and if you can give her a character, I shall be glad to take her into my employ.

'Why, as to character, I suppose she is well enough, but she is a perfect drone, and there is no keeping one's patience when she is about the house, besides she is so untidy that I was obliged to dismiss her. I felt sorry for the child, and bore with her as long as I could; but she is a very artful girl and one consideration that weighed more especially, with me, was a certain turn of mind that I have recently discovered in her that does not promise very fair. You know Mary is rather pretty, and the truth is I did not choose to expose my son, who is but two years older than herself, to her fascinating lures, you know Mrs. Smith, it becomes a mother to be prudent.'

'It does indeed;' but really I am shocked, that one so young and lovely in appearance, should indicate a disposition so far from amiable; for certainly I felt quite an interest in the child. She does not appear to be more than 16 years of age. 'I am sorry that any thing I have said, should diminish your interest in her, and wish I could recall it; but I should not like to be deceived myself, and to tell the truth, I much feared her influence on my Caroline, for, although I should not permit Caroline to associate with a servant, yet she was necessarily thrown frequently into her presence, and the unhappy effect was already obvious. For myself, although it was very painful to my feelings, and an entire violation of the sympathies of my nature, I feel that in the removal of that girl from my family, a heavy load is removed from my spirit. It is true, since she left I have missed several articles of value from the house, but I do not accuse her, and yet I know of no other person who could have taken them.'

'O well, it is most fortunate, that I called on you, for I had thought seriously of receiving her into my family as a companion, for Louisa; but if there are such dark traits in her character, it will never do.'

'Oh, now Mrs. Smith, do not let any thing that I have said, hinder your generosity. It is true these things look dark, and I have not told you half, but you might reform her perhaps.'

'Ah there is little hope of that; when one so young indicates that vice is germinating in her bosom, the chance of reform is very small. No, I must not permit my sympathy to warp my judgment; and yet her poor mother, I feel for her.'

'Her mother's case is indeed pitiable, but still I am told she has brought her affliction upon herself, by her pride, and imprudence: though even that, should not close our hearts to pity, yet one feels more free to exercise charity when the object is worthy. But pray Mrs. Smith how come you to know any thing of Mary?'

'I have heard her spoken of with interest by both my son, and daughter; and she called on me last week to obtain a situation as domestic.'

'Is it possible! Ah! I understand it now; your son George noticed her when here, and now she wishes to place herself in his way. Take my word for it Mrs. Smith, Mary Munson is a dangerous girl to adopt into your family. I know your generous heart, would be too easily duped by that artful girl, but I have said enough to put you on your guard, if you have the interest of your children, especially your son, at heart.'

The persons we have thus unceremoniously introduced to our readers, were as opposite in their disposition, as will be imagined. The one a widow, generous to a fault but weak, and unsuspecting. Her family consisted of herself, a son at the age of twenty years, and a daughter of 16. The other lady was an artful designing woman whose husband followed the sea. She had already been intimated, had a son aged 18, and a daughter, 17 years older. But who was Mary Munson. She was a distant relative of Mrs. A——, and indeed a child of sorrow. Her father, though once respectable had quaffed from the inebriating cup and sank into an abyss, shame and misery, and his amiable and lovely daughter, were now reaping the fruits of his departure from the paths of virtue.

Mary besides all her other misfortunes, was the victim of detraction and envy. She had at first (as a very great favour) been received into the family of Mrs. Adams, in the capacity of seamstress, and by this means she became acquainted with many who frequented Mrs. A——'s house; and among others, Mr. George Smith the son of the lady first introduced.—This young gentleman called at first from mere etiquette to see Mrs. Adams, but attracted by the superior charms of Mary had become a frequent visitor; a circumstance of no little importance to an ambitious, and designing mother. And when she first saw his partiality to her she took measures to prevent their farther intercourse, and accordingly degraded her to the capacity of a common servant, and subsequently discharged her entirely. Mary had learned that Mrs. Smith was in need of help, and applied for a situation; but was entirely ignorant of the relation existing between that lady, and George.

'My dear hand me a glass of water, I feel as if the struggle will soon be over. I soon shall be where I shall no more say, I thirst, and you my daughter will be an orphan indeed, but I feel assured that you will find friends. He that feeds the ravens, and clothes the lilies will feed and clothe my poor deserted child, yes, deserted by him who should have been my stay, and thine.'

'These words were uttered by an emaciated female who was struggling with the King of Terrors, on a bed of straw, in a lowly cabin. It was evidently the abode of poverty, and yet neatness pervaded the whole apartment. The dying female was Mary's mother, and Mary was her nurse. The damp of death was standing on her brow.'

'Mary, she exclaimed, I shall not see your father but he will doubtless return, before the grave shall cover my poor body. Yes he will have sober moments ere that, and then, my daughter promise to deliver to him my dying message.'

'Tell him continued she, it is my last and dying request, that he will return to the paths of virtue; treat him for my sake, for the love of our early years, those years unstained by crime and sorrow, to renounce his present course, and cast from him forever the cup of death; and Oh! Mary, strive yourself to win him back, to integrity. I know full well, your youthful hopes have all been blighted by his folly, and crime.—I know, that through his maddening course you have not only been doomed to a life of bitter poverty, but also to the contumely and reproach of those who are your superiors only in fortune. I know too my dear child, that should you leave this place, which has been the scene of so many trials to you, and seek a home where your father's degradation is unknown, your education is sufficient to secure you a comfortable living, and to introduce you into a respectable circle of friends; but, deem not your mother cruel, if she advises you, nay urges you not to take such a course. There is a nobler object before you, my daughter, the object of reclaiming your unhappy father. Mary, I feel as if commissioned by high Heaven to enjoin upon you this duty. The world may deride you; but you will have the approval of your Almighty Friend, and your own conscience, which will far outweigh their censure or their praise. Besides, the truly great of earth, will appreciate your motives, and befriend you.'

Such was the dying charge of Mary's mother, and she soon after closed her eyes forever on things of earth.

Two days had already elapsed, and through the kindness of neighbors, the corpse was decently committed to the tomb; but the miserable father had not yet returned to his wretched home. Mary was musing alone, on her hapless situation; she thought of the days when prosperity smiled upon them, and when she was the pride and joy of a virtuous father, and a fond mother. But Oh how changed the scene! The dearest object her young affections had ever known, was sleeping in the charnel house of death, and her only remaining earthly stay, was the wandering victim of intemperance, and yet, that being so degraded was still dear to her; he was her father! and the tie had been rendered more sacred, by the dying charge of the departed. Her bosom was truly desolate; and in the deep loneliness of her sorrow, she opened her mother's well worn bible as if by Providential guidance, a sweet assurance met her eye. "When my father and mother forsake me, then the Lord will take me up." She clasped the sacred volume to her heart, and bowed in humble adoration, and childlike confidence at a Saviour's feet. She felt that she could rely on such a Friend; that though the world was cold and comfortless, yet, leaning on such an arm she could meet its chilling blasts undaunted. In the midst of these reflections, the unsteady step of her wretched parent fell upon her ear. But partially recovered from the effects of his late indulgence, and unapprized of the death of his companion, he enquired with an oath for her mother, this was agony to the heart of the bereaved child, and it was long ere she could reply; but lifting her heart in silent supplication to Him who reads every thought, she was enabled to soothe by kindness the warring passions of his soul, at the same time studiously concealing her mother's death; hoping for an opportunity when reason should be re-enthroned. The morrow dawned; but ere the sun had commenced his tour in the East, this worshipper, at Bacchus's shrine had gone forth to pay his devotions. It was now time for the poor girl to devise some means of subsistence, and with a dejected heart she went to seek employ. She recollected that Mrs. Smith had treated her kindly, and given her some encouragement when she called there to obtain a situation previous to her mother's death. She now resolved to seek her advice and patronage in an effort to raise a school in the neighborhood. Poor Mary! she was doomed to realize far more than she had anticipated of the heartlessness of the world. While she was engaged in the care of a sick and dying mother exerting all her youthful powers, and expending her health and strength in ministering to her wants, the cruel tongue of slander was busy in blighting her reputation.

When, conscious of having injured another with the hope of gaining some selfish end, the Heavenly monitor within utters its whispered rebuke, it is a dark, a cruel trait in the perpetrator, to seek justification, by adding to the calumnious list already invented, a history of every frailty which that deep research of malice can discover, and then to array the motives of action in just such a garb as suits an envious imagination.

Thus was it with Mrs. Adams. Conscience was faithful to its office, but self-love, and pride, its legitimate off-spring, were permitted to prevail. She knew the insinuations she had artfully thrown out concerning Mary, were false; and her own heart secretly acknowledged her excellency; yet, what had she said?—She had made no positive charge against her; and might it not actually be as she had said? True, she appeared amiable, and retiring; but she must be artful to have so fascinated the heart of young Smith, and after all she might be as bad as she had intimated. In this manner Mrs. A—— reasoned with herself till she succeeded in lulling conscience, and by repeating to her neighbors as opportunity offered her artfully wrought tale, she at length almost cheated herself into belief of its truth. To complete the work, Miss Adams was one afternoon shortly after Mrs. Munson's death, paying a visit to Miss Smith, and George, being present, the conversation turned on Mary. What had become of your friend Miss Munson Miss Adams? asked George. "Really! Mr. Smith," replied Miss Adams, "you have touched on a subject that is wounding to my heart; I have loved that girl too well to speak of her unmoved, though she has proved herself strangely unworthy of my friendship, and if you will spare me the painful task of explaining myself, I would prefer, for her sake, being silent." I do not wish to pain you, answered George, but if it would not be too lacerating to your feelings, I would beg you to proceed, as I have felt too much interested in that young lady, to hear such hints, without desiring some further elucidation concerning her real character. If Miss Adams' motives were not sufficiently strong before, she needed no farther inducement to the exercise of her calumnious artillery, than that now, offered by Mr. Smith's ingenuous confession of his interest for Mary. Instructed under such a mother, and herself possessing powers well adapted to her purpose, it was no difficult task for Caroline Adams to blast the reputation of one so unobtruding, and friendless as Mary; and she succeeded. Although she brought no positive charge against her, she did that which was far more effectual, she threw out such insinuations as rendered her victim an object of dark suspicion, and distrust, and withal fixed upon her the stigma of theft. She said that after Mary left, she missed an elegant linen cambric handkerchief together with several smaller articles. Mrs. Smith started at this, exclaiming, "her guilt is then too manifest; for I noticed in her hand the day she called here, a beautiful handkerchief of that description, marked with your name, and supposed at the time, it had been a present. Caroline's countenance crimsoned at this last remark, and had she listened to the voice of conscience at that moment, she would have repaired the injury she had done: well she knew that if they were acquainted with the circumstances by which Mary came in possession of that handkerchief, it would change their sentiments toward her into those of unmingled admiration; she knew too it would fix upon herself those of the character of ingrate; notwithstanding, conscience prompted to an explanation; but she had gone too far to retract to her own credit, and the circumstance was just in time to criminate Mary, at least in the minds of Mrs. Smith and her children.—She had accompanied the recital with tears, and commiserated, and thus impressed George favorably concerning her own amiable and compassionate heart; and he began to suspect that in his too hasty admiration for Mary, he had permitted himself to overlook the true but less imposing merits of Caroline, and he now resolved at least to cultivate such an acquaintance, with her as would develop to his mind her real worth.

But to return to Mary; several weeks had elapsed and she had only succeeded in obtaining a little needle work at a very trifling remuneration, scarce sufficient to provide necessary food. As yet, no opportunity had offered for her to converse seriously with her infatuated father, he came home but seldom, and then only to abuse with unkind words the child who ministered to his wants, and to help to consume without replenishing her scanty store of provision. Her mother's injunction was still fresh in her mind, but at times she felt almost discouraged, and then it would seem as if a gentle spirit was watching and nerving her to bear accumulated woes, assuring her victory should crown her efforts, and her bright reward should be a father rescued from ruin; and then she would toil on with patience. There were moments when her thoughts would recur to George Smith, and the kind attention she had received from him, while at Mrs. Adams's.—Her innocent heart had truly received an impression, while enjoying his society, of the real nature of which it was itself unconscious; and she thought that if he knew her situation, he would surely devise some means for her relief; but a certain innate delicacy of feeling prevented her applying to him, even had she known where to find him. Little did she think it was from his mother that she had learned the bitterest lesson of the vanity of human dependence, and still less did she imagine that one she so much esteemed, regarded her, only with contempt and pity.

One day when perusing that dearest of all legacies, the bible, her attention was attracted by a confused noise, to the street; and what was her consternation, to discover her father, borne by four men on a litter, and the blood flowing profusely from his head which was bandaged. He had fallen from a height of several feet and struck his head upon a sharp stone. He was laid in a state of insensibility on his bed and the strictest charge given his distracted child, as she valued her father's life, to watch over him with the utmost quiet, and care. "I should not think she would value it much," said one of the heartless crowd assembled on the occasion. "No" said another, it would be better for her, and for community if he was in his grave." At another time words like these would have cut her to the heart; but now her mind was so much engrossed with anxiety for her father, to notice aught so heartless.

Come George, said Dr. Willard, ride about a mile with me, and I will disclose to you an angel in human form, ministering to the wants of wretched humanity; but to find aught so bright you will have to enter a lowly hovel, and perhaps it may be too humbling to you: pride. "I am proud Doctor, I confess," replied George, "but it flows in a different channel from what you intimate; and I will gladly avail myself of your in-itation. But who is this angel of whom you speak?" "Her name is Miss Munson," said the Doctor, and she is sacrificing such loveliness as you seldom find in the halls of the great, to nurse and console a father whose recent years have been given entirely to intoxication. "Mary Munson," exclaimed George, "why she is an old friend of mine. The truth is Doctor, I was once half in love with her, but circumstances which I shall not now name, led me to break off the acquaintance, and as I am now engaged to another fair one, perhaps it will not be safe for me to trust myself in such fascinating society. However I think I have a safeguard, and will venture to see how the young enchantress will conduct herself." Enchantress you may call her if you please, said the Doctor, as they alighted, but hark; one moment; do you not hear that sweet tone. They listened and caught a few words. "But my dear father," said Mary, "you will live;" and will you not promise me to leave forever the intoxicating cup, and seek happiness in that which is worthy the deathless spirit; it was my dear mother's dying entreaty to you. Mary said the invalid, you have conquered, and by grace divine I promise. Now my dear kneel down and pray for your unworthy father. A solemn pause ensued; and our listeners waited in breathless attention, and presently the sweet strains of prayer, humble fervent, broke the solemn silence. It was such a prayer as George had never heard before.

There was a pathos, and holy fervor in her supplication, that would have moved an adamant heart; and such surely was not the heart of George.

"Let us enter" said the Doctor, taking the arm of his companion, and if ere we leave this lowly habitation, you are not sick of the heartless throng that crowd the halls of fashion, I will acknowledge myself entirely mistaken in your character. George, answered not, but suffered himself to be led in silence to the invalid's apartment.

"Welcome most heartily my ever kind friend," said the sick man to the Doctor, "you have come to share the joy of the returning prodigal. Through the instrumentality of that dear child, I have been led to cast myself at a Saviour's feet, and He has designed to forgive and love even me, the most unworthy, I feel that my stay on earth is brief, but I am not afraid to die. I fear not the King of terrors, Jesus has disarmed him of his sting, and am safe. I have but one source of regret, and that is, my poor Mary. The heart that has long been degraded to that of a brute, has just awakened to a sense of the precious treasure committed to its care, and of the wretched condition in which I must leave her. Alas! she will be the inheritor of all her father's degradation."

"Say not so my dearest father" exclaimed Mary.—To lose you at such a moment as this, a moment when I have found you all that my heart ever yearned for, is indeed affliction, anguish to my spirit, but I have learned to school my heart for earth's bitterest woes. Be comforted then my father, concerning me, the conflict will not be long; I expect soon to join you in that brighter world where the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest. I would not my father, have your last hours clouded with gloomy fears for me. George's feelings had been nearly overcome by what he had just witnessed but unfortunately at this moment he saw the name of Caroline Adams on the handkerchief with which Mary wiped the death-damp from her father's brow, and he again shrank from her, as one too vile to share his sympathy. The next time the physician called, he found their dwelling desolate. The father had gone to his long home, and Mary had already left the scene of so many sorrows, and gone, he could not learn whither.

Months had elapsed since the scene above described and none of the inhabitants of her native town had sought after, or cared for the fate of the poor orphan. It was a chilly morning in November, when one of those benevolent people denominated Quakers, or more appropriately, Friends, was passing the grave yard.—His attention was attracted by a young youthful female form, thinly clad who appeared to be weeping over the last resting place of some dear departed one. He approached the spot, and learning her situation, (for it was Mary) without waiting to enquire her character offered her an asylum at his own home, so long as she should act worthy of his friendship.

In the mean time, the day appointed for George's nuptials with Miss A——, had arrived and they were to be celebrated at a neighboring village. On their way thither, the horses took fright, and they were thrown from the carriage, and Miss Adams seriously injured. Fever ensued, and she was brought to the verge of the grave. In the near prospect of death, remorse constrained her to repair, as far as possible, the injury she had done to her humble friend. She called her affianced husband to her bedside, and confessed the vile artifice she had used to deprive Mary of his affections, and secure him to herself. She told him that Mary's character for integrity, was without blemish; and that, could she see him united to her, before she died, it would deprive remorse of half its venom.—The handkerchief, she said, that had so completely served her vile purpose, had been a gift of gratitude from herself to Mary, for the unremitting vigilance with which she had attended her, through a protracted illness. George was astounded at these disclosures, and could illly conceal his chagrin and resentment, even in presence of the apparently dying penitent.—He waited a few days to see what would be the result of her illness, but felt that it needed not death to free him honorably from the engagement. Contrary to expectation, Miss Adams recovered; and with returning health, returned also her cruel, nay almost diabolical propensity to detraction. Gladly would she have persuaded George, that what she had said was the mere ravings of delirium; but he was no longer her dupe, he cast her from him as a despicable being from whose near relationship he was happily released. After making fruitless enquiry for Mary, he resolved to seek relief to his feelings by spending a few months in the bustling city of New York. He eagerly visited every place of fashionable amusement, and soon became a favorite, among the young ladies of taste and fortune. He improved every opportunity of joining their social circles, and eliciting their powers of conversation, but though he felt himself pleased, and at times almost enchanted, it was for another form, of lowlier pretensions which often flitted through his imagination, to cast its brightest spell around his soul and hold the key of his heart's citadel; he thought of the lovely child of poverty and sorrow, ministering to the wants of a degraded father, and for his sake bearing patiently the contumely of a cold world, and he longed to take to his heart such a companion. One day when walking alone on the battery he observed a young Quakeress in company with two beautiful little girls who were prattling by her side; her lovely form and elastic step attracted his attention, but her face was concealed beneath the close bonnet that she wore. In a few moments they were seated under the shade of a large tree. "Mary," said one, "how glad I am that father brought thee home, to be our sister; for Oh we were so lonely after mother died." Anna and I used to cry ourselves to sleep every night; but now thee has come, we are happy again; I hope thee will stay with us always. Father says he loves thee almost as well as he does us. George listened in breathless attention for her reply, and his heart leaped with delight, as the sweet tones of Mary Munson's voice, once more greeted his ear; and his first impulse was to hasten to her, and inform her of his sentiments; but on reflection he felt himself in rather an embarrassing situation. A fortunate circumstance however soon occurred to open the way. They had approached the water and one of the children dropped a handkerchief into it which called forth an exclamation from Mary. "Oh Anna, I am very sorry, that handkerchief was the gift of a once dear friend; and there were several associations that rendered it valuable to me; it has been used to wipe the dew of death from my father's and mother's brow; and it was that thought that led me to fetch it out this afternoon." Well do not look so sad, Mary, I think I can get it; see, it does not sink, it is fast to that stone, and I can almost reach it. At this instant the child, fearless of danger, stooped over, and losing her balance, fell into the water. A shriek from Mary called George to her side, and he instantly plunged into the water, and rescued the drowning Anna, and also the handkerchief. A recognition soon took place and George accompanied her to the house of her friend, to whom she presented him as the preserver of his daughter's life. Gratitude swelled high in the old man's bosom, and George seized the golden moment, to solicit of him the hand of his adopted daughter Mary Munson, which was heartily bestowed, with a third of his fortune

The matter of the linen cambrie handkerchief, was discussed at their wedding breakfast, and that article was kept, ever after, as a sacred memento. Miss Adams lived to be threescore years and ten; lived unbeloved and died unlamented. Mr. and Mrs. Smith lived too to a good old age, and their graves were watered with the tears of grateful remembrance.

AMERICAN MASONIC REGISTER.

ALBANY, SATURDAY, OCTOBER, 19, 1839.

Br. William Boardman, of 33 Jones street, N. York, is duly authorised to receive subscriptions, and collect monies on account of the Register, in that city.

To Correspondents.—The tale of Frank Lytleton, shall have a place next week. Dr Thimblewell, in another volume, writes well. He is caustic and happy. The present age, as he truly observes, determined to "go through by day light." The boiler must burst some of these days. We hope to hear from him often.

Under the head of Popular Tales, the reader will observe, that we have commenced and finished the Tale of Slander, a part of which appeared in our first No. The story is well told, affording an excellent moral, and as a literary production would not disparage the pen of an Edgeworth. The tale is by a young lady who has been residing 200 miles from the city, and the fact, that she has changed her name since the commencement of the story, will be her apology for the delay, and ours of course follows.

Literary Notoriety.—The poetic article in our last entitled "A Sketch," appeared also on the same day in another paper of this city. It came too late for one publication, and we noticed it for insertion in the next. The author, whoever he is, must have been exceedingly anxious to have his production thrust forth into this "breathing world" if "half made up." If his vanity will permit, we will suggest for his consideration, a little more patience next time. We took upon it as a small affair.

It is said that the total value of gold taken from all the mines in the United States for the last ten years, exceeds thirty millions of dollars.

The North American Coal company at Philadelphia have failed and assigned over to their creditors. The operatives at the Potsville Mines are great sufferers.

The Portsmouth (Va.) Times learns that snow fell quite briskly on Saturday about sixty miles west of that place.

Murder.—A man named John Hinton, was found murdered, near Washington, (Geo.) on the 28th ult. From circumstances, the horrid suspicion fell on his son, a lad about 15 years old, that he was the murderer, and the jury of inquest, from the evidence, returned a verdict of wilful murder against him.

Suicide.—Jane Titus, a colored woman, of Albany, put an end to her life on Wednesday, at New York, by taking opium, in consequence of the brutal treatment of one Joseph Jackson, with whom she lived as his wife.

Mail Robbery.—The mail was robbed between Albany and Hudson on Monday evening, 7th inst., and its contents rifled. The P. M. of Hudson offers a reward of $50 for the apprehension and conviction of the robber or robbers.

On the 19th Sept. the house of widow Keefer on Pipe creek Carroll county, Md. was entered by two men named Thomas Riffle and Isaac Thomas, of Adams county, who tied her, and robbed her of $2770 in gold and silver. After tying her, they knocked her down with a club, injuring her so much that her life is despaired of. The villains were arrested, and are now in jail at Westminster, awaiting their trial.

THE AGE.

For the American Masonic Register and Literary Companion.
EXTRACT

From a discourse by Dr. Thimblewell, delivered before the Society for the Correction of Popular Errors.

This is a locomotive age—an age of wonders—nothing short of endless vanity will suffice. The spirit of innovation has unsheathed her sword and ruthlessly despoiled every thing which in bygone days was esteemed valuable in the philosophy of life.

These observations apply with peculiar force to our own country.

The paths which Antiquity traversed are completely overgrown with grass—we have royal rail-roads which enable us to accomplish every thing by steam.

Many causes may be mentioned that will satisfactorily explain these developments.

Among them are the following—an immense extent of territory—the peculiar character of our institutions—the infancy of our country and the numberless avenues, every where offered for progressive advancement.

But what are some of the features of the times?

1st. We notice an all pervading propensity to attain wealth. Time was when fortunes were slowly coined; then the operations of the mint were conducted by manual labor; and if a man was fortunate enough to become wealthy, all were ready to pay him homage. But in the present day mints have vastly multiplied, and are differently constructed from what they once were.

Now they have a complexity of machinery, that would bewilder the brains of the most accomplished professor in mechanics; and wonderful to relate, they are all propelled by steam. If some of our worthy sires could unlock their tombs, and behold the amazing discoveries, that have been made in the art of making money, they would be confounded, and at once retire to their silent mansions.

But badinage aside—our countrymen imbibing the spirit of the age, are not contented to make fortunes in the natural way, if I may be permitted to make use of the expression. The old way to wealth, in sooth, was a tiresome one; yet it was usually traversed in safety. Although aware of this circumstance, we nevertheless prefer a rickety rail road originated by the spirit of internal improvement, and on which vast numbers make fearful shipwreck. Truth to say, a feverish desire to amass wealth is our besetting sin.

The credit system proffers its kindly assistance to all classes in society—hence capital stock in trade has become an obsolete term, and is rarely inserted in the vocabulary of modern times. The young merchant with an empty purse opens a large commission house under the most auspicious circumstances. Trusting to the generosity of the future, and relying upon the assistance of long accommodation notes, he at once launches forth into a wide and deep sea of business. But the narrow enclosures of a mere mercantile life is too insignificant a field for the manifestation of his lofty genius and daring enterprise. He therefore takes his place on change and assumes the air of an accomplished financier; he gambles in stocks—becomes a worthy member of the Board of Brokers—purchases farms a few miles out of town—divides them into lots and with a lithographic map in hand wends his way to the auctioneer's room. Thus he goes on "conquering and to conquer;" and in the brief period of one or two years boasts of his thousands; and now if in mute astonishment one should demand proof of his assertions, with evident satisfaction, he will point his finger to Texas and Maine, and village lots, and immense tracts of lands, quietly embosomed beyond the verdant hills of the far West, lands forsooth which he believes will soon be covered with splendid cities.

The mechanic and farmer are no longer willing to earn their subsistence by the "sweat of their brows." They desire more than a competency; and pray why should they not when fortunes are so easily acquired? Hence they cheerfully desert the wonted channels of their industry and become speculators. The young student pants to be liberated from the gloomy walls of college in order that he may fill his pockets with bank notes. In fine men in all trades and occupations do likewise.

Now these are facts which observation hath recorded, and who is prepared to refute them.

2d. As a consequent of what has just been considered we notice a demoralising extravagance in public and private, hitherto unknown in the history of our republic

Saunter through our large cities; behold the magnificent squares, and stately palaces embellished with the costliest trophies of art; the broad and beautiful promenades teeming and sparkling with the jewelled votaries of fashion; the long train of carriages emblazoned with armorial bearings and surrounded with a liveried retinue. And now rest thy wearied limbs awhile in yonder mansion, where luxury itself revels. Ramble through the spacious apartments, garnished with the most sumptuous furniture; as the shades of evening come stealing along, place thy cushioned chair at the dinner table, gleaming with the family plate, and partake freely of the voluptuous viands, wines, and fruits, that surround thee; retire to the drawing rooms, and behold the fashionable assemblage, amid the mazes of the dance; accompany the family to their numberless routes and fashionable pastimes; and when thy curiosity is satisfied, depart hence with some correct views concerning the stereotype history of a fashionable household; I have thus feebly sketched a portraiture of city life—it is an accurate likeness although it is deficient in that warmth and richness of colouring, and poetic beauty of design which constitutes a good picture.

The higher classes in our cities, however do not alone court fashion, study display, and follow the chase of pleasure.

The Mechanic and retailer under the influence of our free institutions boldly imitate those who move in a higher sphere. They also vote large appropriation bills for their respective households; their wives give parties, and exchange morning calls; their daughters dress in silks and study conic sections; and as to their sons, they must need at some future day shine in the Senate or at the Bar.

Extravagance has also infused its poison in our towns and villages. In short it reigns every where, triumphantly "debauching the moral tone of Society," and perpetuating a policy which must soon undermine our fair institutions. May Providence avert the impending ruin; and restore to us the golden days of Wouter Van Twiller and Testy the Doubter, when all men were contented with their situation in life and avoided as they would a viper, innovation in any, and every form. 3d. A mighty intellectual and moral movement is another prominent feature of the times. The extraordinary and unprecedented schemes in morals, science, Literature, the arts, politics, &c. and constantly perfected, clearly illustrates the truth of this proposition. The extent and magnificence of mere conquest seems to absorb the less attractive consideration of means and results.

Our high pressure activity indeed affords us no time to settle the question, whether the means we are employing are proper or not; or whether society on the whole will be benefitted by our exertions. We are bent on going through by day light; and hence we do too much to do any thing well. The present aspect of society plainly indicates this popular error.

IRISH WIT AND HUMOUR.

The poverty of the Irish is not exaggerated—neither is their wit—nor their good humour—nor their whimsical absurdity—nor their courage. Wit—I gave a fellow a shilling on some occasion when sixpence was the fee! "Remember you owe me sixpence, Pat!" "May your honour live till I pay you!" There was courtesy as well as art in this, and all the clothes on Pat's back would have been dearly bought by the sum in question. Humour—There is perpetual kindness in the Irish cabin; butter milk, potatoes; a stool is offered, or a stone is rolled, that your honour may sit down and be out of the smoke, and those every where else seem desirous to exercise free hospitality in their own house. Their natural disposition is turned to gaiety and happiness; while a Scotchman is thinking about term day, or, if easy on that subject, about hell in the next world; while an Englishman is making a little hell in the present, because his muffin is not well roasted—Pat's mind is always turned to fun and ridicule. They are terribly excitable to murder you on slight suspicion, and find out next day that it was all mistake, and that it was not yourself they meant to kill at all at all.—The Genius and Wisdom of Sir Walter Scott.

ELECTION NOTICE.—Sheriff's Office, City and County of Albany, October 11, 1839. Notice is hereby given that at the next general election to be held in the county of Albany on the 4th, 5th, & 6th days of November next, a Senator is to be chosen to represent the Third Senate District in the Senate of this State in the place of Edward P. Livingston, resigned; and that three Senators are to be chosen at the said election to represent the said Third Senate District, according to a notice from the Secretary of State, of which a copy is annexed.

MICHAEL ARTCHER, Sheriff.

STATE OF NEW-YORK.

SECRETARY'S OFFICE, Albany, Oct. 11, 1839. }
To the Sheriff of the County of Albany—
Sir: Notice is hereby given you that since the general notice of election was issued from this office, on the 15th day of August last a vacancy has happened in the representation of the Third District, by the resignation of Edward P. Livingston, a Senator from that district, whose term of office would have expired on the last day of December 1841; and that a Senator to supply the said vacancy is to be chosen at the next general election, to be held on the 4th, 5th, and 6th days November next.—There are therefore three Senators to be chosen in the Third Senate District, (comprising among others the county of which you are Sheriff,) at the next general election, viz: one in the place of James Powers, whose term of service will expire on the last day of December next; one in the place of Noadiah Johnson, deceased; and one in the place of Edward P. Livingston, resigned.

JOHN C. SPENCER, Secretary of State.

N. B. You are to give notice of the above mentioned election in writing to one of the inspectors of each town and ward in your county, and to annex thereto a copy of this notice. You are also to publish such notice and copy in all public newspapers printed in your county.

POETRY.

A SKETCH.

"You took me, William, when a girl, unto your home
and heart,
To bear in all your after-fate a fond and faithful part;
And tell me have I ever tried, that duty to forego,
Or pined there was not joy for me when you were sunk in woe?
No; I would rather share your tear than any other glee.
For though your nothing to the world, you're ALL THE WORLD TO ME.
You make a palace of my shed, this rough-hewn bench
a throne,
There's sunlight for me in your smiles, and music in your tone.
I look upon you when you sleep—my eyes with tears grow dim,
I cry, 'Oh Parent of the Poor, look down from heaven on him;
Behold him toil from day to day, exhausting strength and soul,
Oh look with mercy on him, Lord, for thou canst make him whole!'
And when at last relieving sleep has on my eyelid smiled,
How oft are they forbade to close in slumber by our child?
I take the little murmurer, that spoils my span of rest,
And feel it is a part of thee I lull upon my breast.
There's only one return I crave, I may not need it long,
And it may sooth thee when I'm where the wretched feel no wrong:
I ask not for a kinder tone, for thou wert ever kind;
I ask not for less frugal fare, my fare I do not mind;
I ask not for attire more gay—if such as I have got Suffice to make me fair to thee, for more I ~~murmure~~ not.
But I would ask some share of hours that you on clubs bestow,
Of knowledge which you prize so much, might I not something know?
Subtract from meetings amongst men each even an hour for me,
Make me companion of your soul, as I may safely be.
If you will read, I'll sit and work, then think when you're away,
Less tedious I shall find the time, dear William, of your stay.
A meet companion soon I'll be for e'en your studious hours,
And teacher of those little one's you call your cottage
flowers;
And if we be not rich and great, we may be wise and kind
And as my heart can warm your heart, so may my mind your mind."

From the Knickerbocker.

THE TELL-TALE FACE.

[BY WILLIAM CUTTER OF NEW YORK.]

I hate those frigid notions,
Which seem to count it sin
To show the kind emotions,
True kindness wakes within;
Those manners cold and guarded,
With words dealt out by rule,
Pronounced just as Mamma did,
Or Madame F—, at school.

I wonder how the ladies,
Dear angels that they are!
Can live where so much shade is,
There loveliness to mar!
Where they fairer than the graces,
And wiser than the light,
Such cold such moonlight faces,
Would put young love to flight.

I love the playful fancies
Of an unsuspecting heart,
That speak in songs and glances,
Unchecked by rules of art:
I love the face that appareth
Of all that's in the mind;
The brow, the eye, that taketh
Its hue from what's behind.

These are the voice of nature,
The language of the soul:
Words change, but o'er the features,

Guile may not have control;
The tongue may tell of feelings
Which may be—or may not!
But the eye hath sure revelations
Of the deeply-hidden thought.

I love that quick expression,
Which flashes the full eye,
When truth would make confession,
While modesty would lie;
Those heavenly blushes,
That crimson brow and cheek.
When feeling's fountain gushes,
With thoughts it dares not speak

Those shades that came unbidden
From every passing cloud,
With tales of some deep hidden
'Neath merry looks, or proud;
The sudden gleam of pleasure,
From brow, and eye, and lip,
That tells the heart hath treasures
It scarce knows how to keep.

These, these are voices given,
For soul to speak to soul,
As true to truth and heaven,
As the needle to the pole.
I bow to wit and beauty,
I almost worship grace,
But I owe especial duty
To an honest tell-tale face.

AUGUSTUS BROOM,

A SONG.

TUNE—"On bank of Flowers."

In a parlour gay, one summer day,
With heat and port oppress.
Augustus Broom, a young bridegroom,
Lay down to take some rest;
When Agnes sweet his darling bride.
Came and sat down by his side,
And said, "My dear, your Nancy's here;"
He with a snore replied.

"What, asleep!" said she, "and as yet but three Weeks since we too were wed;
I thought of a walk, or at least some talk,
Is all your fondness fled?
Do give me some attention, pray,
And let not Nancy have to say,
That when she has dressed, and done her best,
Her pains are thrown away.

Nay, since you will be snoring still,
I know what I shall do;
Those whiskers fair, beyond compare,
I'll clip a curl or two,
I know you love them passing well,
And would not one for a kingdom sell,
But 'twill serve you right for this shameful slight,
And be a joke to tell."

The deed was done, and she thought 'twas fun,
For hair can grow again;
But when Broom did feel the cold hard steel,
He started up amain.
"My dear," he cried, with a frantic roar,
And quickly off both whiskers tore—
"It is too bad—you would make one mad—
They cost me two pound four."

SONG FROM THE DUTCH.

AS TRANSLATED IN THE STUDENT'S ALMANACK OF LEY-DEN.

I
Long for thy coming I've waited and sighed,
Breathless the air, love and calm is the night.
Golden with stars, oh! the heavens are bright:
Long for thy coming I've waited and sighed,
With thoughts it dares not speak:
Mary, my love!
Sweet are the perfumes of flowering of May;
Soft through the meadow the brook sighs its lay;
Tender the moon beams with glittering ray,
Mary, my love!

II

And is thy name not angel, maid!

Thy locks of blackest jet are made;
More white the lily is thy bosom
Than on the banks the wavering blossom;
As on the rose the sunbeams play,
So far thy cheek a smile does ray:
That modest look of thine did move me,
Oh! didst thou love me, as I love thee!

III

My boat is on the wavering sea—
Oh, to my cottage come with me,
There, lonely, the shade of beeches,
No noise, no human talk should reach us;
There, playing with thy curling hair,
Naught should I sing but sweetest dove, thee,
If as I love thee, thou didst love me!

IV

A heaven is opened on thy brow,
Oh, don't belie that heaven's show;
Nor be the sun of bounty thwarted,
Since from me freedom's sun has parted;
Oh, let no pitying laugh, then, sweet,
Insult the passion I do feed!—
The answer would a kiss of love be,
If thou didst love me, as I love thee!

MASONIC.

The following Address, from the Rev. Joshua Bradley, delivered about the commencement of the Masonic difficulties, will probably be new to nine-tenths of our readers. We copy it for a two-fold reason. 1st, Because the sentiments contained in it are just such as every mason will respond to. 2nd, Because to every reflecting man, it will be a fair portraiture of the beauties of that system of opposition which the fraternity have had to contend against so long. Can it be believed, that the author of such an address, after being the recipient of masonic favor and kindness for near thirty years, would basely turn ingrate, and ad-der-like, sting the hands of those who warmed him in-being? Alas! "to what base uses may we come!"—We knew Mr. Bradley well. His uame in 1820, was a passport to the hearth of every mason in western New York—every door was open to him, every hand ready to grasp his with brotherly affection and kindness. Now—"who so poor as to do him reverence." He exists but for scorn and pity to point her finger at.

The great imperfections of our natures; errors that abound in every community; the selfishness of every individual, and the many deprivations that some have to suffer, in carrying their plans of learning, of experiments, of visitations, and labours, towards perfection, all combine to urge the necessity of privy councils, of solemn obligations, and mutual benefactions to those members, should failures happen, or sickness deprive one from actively providing for his necessities—or death close the scene of his useful operations, and his family be left in poverty. Multitudinous are the societies of this description.

The masonic is not the least among the thousands that flourish, in these days of illumination. This society has been more cautious, more vigilant, and moral, than any other, in forming its constitution so perfectly that no one particle can be found to incline any of its members to trample upon the laws of their country, or to interrupt any religious denomination in the free and full enjoyment of their sentiments, and the administration of their ceremonies. Though our particular labors in admitting members, and explaining all parts of our system; are done in retired apartments, from the noise of the world, and the gaze of the ignorant; yet all our laws are published, and no one is desired to become a member till he has read them, and is fully satisfied that they are founded in righteousness and worthy of his obedience. Should any one wish to be dismissed from our connexion, it is granted, unless he has blemished his character. Admonitions, suspensions, and expulsions, are all the punishments that masons can inflict upon their unworthy and crime committing members.

The whole charge given to a candidate, on the commencement of his connexion with us, embraces the outline of his deportment among his kindred, and mankind, wherever he may sojourn, settle, or transact the concerns of life. There is not a single article in our constitution, nor a sentence in any of our charges, that can lead any one to infer that our secret assemblies and labors are designed or in the least calculated to injure the morals, tarnish the virgin purity of republicanism, or condemn the all important doctrines of christianity.

The sons of morals, science and religion, of different nations and opinions, meet, as masons, in one hall, treat each other as brothers, and move forward in the participation of our rights.

It is good and pleasant for masonic brethren to dwell together in unity. 1st. For they have experienced similar duties. Every mason is, or ought to be, a moral, social, and benevolent man. None should be recommended to unite with us, who are deficient in these characteristics; for every particle of our institution is laid for the expansion of charity—the embellishment of our minds, and the government of our passions, that we may be qualified to fill every station in life to which it may be called.

Every emblem of our order invites to union, and every explanation, consistently given, concerning them, tends to soften the heart, and prepare us to sympathize with the sons and daughters of affliction.

In the suitable administration of our rites, we are taught the frailty of our existence—the certainty of our dissolution, and the appearance of our souls in the august presence of Jehovah, there to receive his approbation, and dwell in the everlasting splendors of his kingdom; or to feel his frowns, and hear his voice announce, "depart ye cursed into everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels." Our system abounds with the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead—of rewards and punishments. Every rite, and every degree in masonry, acknowledged by the learned of our order, are full of meaning. As we advance in the knowledge of these experimentally, we are conscious of our ignorance, and are constrained to acknowledge our littleness and vanity. The brave and dauntless general, that has laid cities in ashes, and an empire withering before his countenance, when brought into a lodge, bows before the altar, listens to the voice of instruction, and is voluntarily obedient. The haughty monarch, around whose throne, and before whom, millions prostrate and kiss the dust, when made a mason, takes his seat among the least of the fraternity, and considers himself honored, when he is permitted, in the lodge-room to take lessons from the lips of those who wear no titles in his kingdom, except those that masons confer upon the worthy.

At the threshold of our temple, political distinctions and ecclesiastical dignities are laid aside, and men meet on the level.

Though our gates are open to all who acknowledge the existence of one eternal, all wise, omnipresent God and who with this confession and after critical examination, are found to sustain characters of morality, and possess amiable dispositions, and necessary qualifications to render themselves useful among us and mankind; yet masonry cannot admit any within her walls to contend about the peculiarities that divide them on the wide field of the world. This is the only system in which different denominations agree to meet, instruct each other, and labour for the happiness of themselves, families, and mankind. And doubtless this order is designed by the Great Architect of all things to flourish in every clime, till all political and religious partizans shall rise into light, liberty, and indescribable union, and the whole world move in the beauty and cloudless effulgence of the latter day glory.

Union, among us, will be good and pleasant, if we consider.

2dly. The multitudes who oppose us, and the various positions that individuals have taken to represent our system as injurious to government, and hostile to christianity. "This sect is every where spoken against." The objections raised against us, in ancient and modern times, have, in the opinion of the speaker, been candidly answered; therefore, he is not disposed, on this occasion, to give even a momentary resurrection to them. We know of no system ever proposed, even by the Deity himself, for the benefit of mankind, that has not been opposed and misrepresented.

Opposition to a system, generally draws its members into a closer union. It has a tendency to make them more watchful, more diligent, more learned, and more extensively known and useful. Our opponents have appeared in different ages and countries, wrapped in prophetic garments, declaring that our system was defective and would shortly crumble to atoms. Their predictions have not yet been fulfilled.

Masonry has progressed in every region of the globe, where freedom, learning and religion have flourished. In America it has taken deep root, sprung up, and spread over every state. We have now in our connection more than 80,000 members. Among so large a number, some may not be worthy of the name they bear; others sustain characters of the highest respectability; many fill offices of trust, and are much esteemed by a free and enlightened people. Their learning, valuable labours, political sagacity, pure morals, evangelical piety, and unbating attachment to our country and government, are of such primary importance to mankind, that ages to come will delight in announcing their deeds, as we do now the virtues of the immortal Washington, and the achievements of all the magnanimous heroes of America.

Wherever the fraternity have been the most ardent, the most active, and benevolent, there jealousy, intrigue, and malevolence have rallied all their forces, taken the heights of prejudice, and commissioned defamation, "to stand sleepless" on his tower, and blow his alarming trumpet louder and louder, till all the sons and daughters of deception and evil mindedness should start from their midnight slumbers, and with frantic wildness, run about the world to wake up all their kindred and raise a mighty army under the command of some intemperate, profane, and atheistical desperadoes. These generals, rising from sweeping the streets, or from the obscure recesses of bacchanalian hilarity, "speaking great swelling words" to their adherents, promising to march them into regions of light, where they may behold, on paper, at a very cheap rate, all that Masons have done for ages, and all they now do, and know about mysteries. Furthermore they promise, that we shall be compelled to abandon our professions, or be hurled from every office in our Republican government, and these brave invaders of Masonic dominions shall be robed in honour, and "fare sumptuously every day." Can the men of this generation enlist in such a cause, and be governed by such pretenders?

Whom shall the people believe? Can they put confidence in men, who are puffing and swearing about those who have done them no injury? Who are these men that burn day and night with such quenchless zeal for justice, the peace of the community, and our republic. What is their character at home? Who has ever known them to belong, or remain supporters of any moral society, or devout assembly of christians?—We venture the assertion, that none will ever appear in opposition to our sentiments and strive to have the order disbanded, who is a mason, and maintains an unblemished character in the fraternity; or is a member of any church of Christ, and lives in the enjoyment of that religion which fills the soul with good will to mankind.

The present whirlwind, raised into a storm by disordered minds and excited to irritability, may beat against our temple, and carry away the rubbish that has been gathered around it, while the wise and foolish have slept together, but can never move the edifice. The thunder of anathema and destruction will soon cease to roar, and all will be calm. The dust raised about masonry by a few worthless creatures, galloping after lucre, who could not obtain it by loitering about cities and villages, will soon be wiped from the eyes of a cheated multitude, and then every man will be seen walking in his own likeness, and he that is without sin among them, may cast the first stone at Masons.

The pure system that descended from Heaven for the salvation of the world, has been misrepresented and set at naught, and its founder crucified. Thousands of deluded mortals have assailed that system, and proclaimed to nations that it was not worthy of their acceptance; that it could be exterminated—its professors dismayed and ruined forever. Have they dried up the streams of mercy, and covered the heavens with blackness? Have they, by puffing, blown away the purifying influences of grace from every repentant heart? Have they shut the gates of infinite glory, and shrouded immensity to atheistical darkness? No, my brethren; the undiminished powers of Immanuel are still abroad in the earth, and millions are seeking salvation. Those vain boasters and despisers of the Gospel, have perished in their puny warfare, and their disciples begin to lick the dust. A few more revolving years and not one of these contaminating and staggering sons of dissipation will be seen trembling on the shores of time. Let us adhere to our profession, move onward in peace, and show how good and pleasant it is for brethren, to dwell in unity. This will appear important if we consider, 3dly. The labours and benefactions to which we, as Masons are called. In our large community, there are some who have borne the burden and heat of the day. They have suffered many losses, and are now bowed down under the weight of years and infirmities. These we must visit. We must contribute freely from our funds for their support. We must soften the hardness of adversity, and show that Masons can love their brethren at all times. We must watch with them when they are sick; and be ardently engaged for their present and future happiness. Nay, more, when we have wiped the cold dews of death from their foreheads, and laid their bodies in the grave overspread with an emblem of a glorious resurrection, their surviving relations demand our respectful attention and liberality. The widow and fatherless must not be driven away to waste their sighs and tears in the vale of obscurity and wretchedness. These hands now spread before you, have borne liberal donations from Lodges to the abodes of dying brethren, mourning widows and orphans. O, what homage of gratitude have I seen, even at the very gates of death, when a Brother's eyes, just sinking in their dying sockets, half glazed, but open, and fixed upon his weeping wife and children, had beheld the fruits of our labours presented for their refreshment, and heard accents of promise from faithful brethren, that his family should not suffer. Turning his eyes upwards he breathed out thanks to God, that there were Masons to survive him. One moment and he leaves the world. He struggles and agonizes all over. He gathers a little strength to raise his hands towards Heaven and exclaim, "O Lord my God, having peace in believing in Jesus, and my family under the patronage of true and faithful brethren; now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace." The curtain of eternity lifts up, and he enters Heaven. These, my brothers, are seasons of no ordinary feelings.

Can I, can you, give up labouring in Masonry, to raise funds for these noble, these important distributions? "The poor," said the Saviour, "you have always with you." Can he be my friend—can he love charity—can he wish to aid the widow and the fatherless, who tells me, that I must not be a Mason? That I must not meet with them—I must not bear their gifts to the penniless sojourner—conduct a physician to the sick—and carry light and food into the dark chambers of poverty and lamentation? Can he be a meek disciple of Christ and a promoter of his glorious Gospel, who wishes to demolish all our Lodges, disband the Fraternity, and shut the sanctuary doors against the preachers who are Masons? He may be a revealer of secrets, a publisher of pamphlets, and folios of criminations and hearsays about Masons; he may employ an hundred pedlars and send them about the world with his books; he may, through their instrumentality, gather wealth, spread discord among brethren, and throw whole congregations into confusion; but he never can break up one Lodge of well disciplined members—but he can never have the consciousness of doing good of being a peacemaker, or a zealous advocate of the pure doctrine of man's redemption. I wish to pursue a different course. Let me inherit the friendship of my brethren, die in their fellowship, and be buried by their hands. Is this your desire? I beseech you to examine critically the principles we profess, and adorn them by living virtuously, and putting on daily a robe of righteousness girded with truth.

SKETCHES OF TRAVEL.

From the Knickerbocker of October

FAMILIAR LETTERS FROM LONDON. CHURCHES OF THE METROPOLIS.

I should dearly love to 'go snacks' with the Archbishop of Canterbury; his revenue being, they say, sixty thousand pounds, beside being Primate of England, and holding rank next to the royal family. Nearly the same exuberant revenue is enjoyed by the Bishop of London; and the average income of the twenty-four Bishops gives each ten thousand pounds a year. They are members, all of the House of Lords, and on state occasions, make a display of equipages equal at least to the secular peers, and live in their several palaces with a magnificence corresponding to their eminent fortunes. One of Bunyan's pretty visions is here realized: 'I saw religion walk forth in her golden slippers in the sunshine.' Most of the deans, also, are sufficiently provided; that of Durham, with twelve thousand pounds a year, and the twelve Prebends of the see, with from two to three hundred each. The laborers of the Church have about the same scanty allowance as the same class in secular employments. Of the Curates, fifty-nine have annual salaries of from ten to twenty pounds: two hundred and seventeen, from twenty to thirty; six hundred and seventy-nine, from thirty to forty; six hundred and eighty-three, from forty to fifty; five hundred and seventeen, from fifty to sixty; two hundred and thirty-four, from sixty to seventy; and three hundred and nine, from seventy to eighty. The two archbishops, all the bishops, most of the deans, five hundred and fifty-two rectors, and four hundred and thirty-six vicars, are appointed by the king; the rest by the bishops, or lay patrons. The number of parishes for England and Wales is ten thousand, sustained by tithes, or a commutation of tithes, and endowments: the former, six hundred thousand pounds, the latter, three and a half millions. Cathedral revenues are incomes attached to certain churches, enjoyed by the deans, canons, etc. Two hundred and fifty thousand pounds is the annual allowance for keeping the churches in repair. The incumbents are two archbishops—of Canterbury and York; twenty-four bishops: sixty archdeacons, twenty-seven deans, six hundred and forty-four canons and prebends and of rectors vicars, curates, and chapters, seventeen thousand three hundred and forty-three.

Of the Dissenters, the most numerous are the Methodists; next, Independents, or Congregationalists, who have seventeen hundred places of worship: the Baptists have ten hundred and eighty; Presbyterians, two hundred and sixty; Roman Catholics, four hundred and thirty (seventy in London); Friends, three hundred and eighty—in all, six thousand five hundred. These are called chapels, and are not allowed to lift their heads too aspiringly. They are forbidden to have spires, towers, and bells. They are beginning to claim a majority of members over the established church.

There are altogether six hundred and eighty places of worship in London, affording seats for six hundred and forty thousand persons, and it is said that near a million are destitute of accommodation. You may quote these statistics, with authority of Parliament. I have written them down in spite of my dislike for arithmetic. The English church being now a matter of tea-table gossip, one cannot be too careful in reducing ladies' conversation to mathematical certainty.

Our religious system acknowledges no connection of church with state; it inculcates universal tolerance and is supported by voluntary contributions; to all which principles the English being directly opposed, we are impressed into its disputes; to be commended on one side, and abused on the other; the proportion being, as usual, about ten to one in favor of the abuse. So it often happens, that a wretch of a witness is dragged into court, bantered and set up for a rogue, without his having the slightest interest in the quarrel. The paper in which our poor efforts at religion are stigmatized most unmercifully, is the 'John Bull,' which, by some chance, is the only one which pays me a Sunday morning visit; and in walking out, I see its extracts placarded upon the conspicuous walls, and in large capitals overhead: 'Voluntary System,' 'The Experiment,' 'Model Republic,' and other sarcastic devices. A poor clergyman is served up this morning in such caricature as would make him a good scare-crow in his own corn-field; perhaps deservedly but is it not scandalous, that a dozen of clergymen, whom I know to be as honest as Saint Anthony, should be of no account, and that this one man should be set up as an example of 'the state of religion in America?' I was tempted to write angrily on this subject; and no doubt the Bishop of London would have been quite vexed at being abused all the way to Pottsville. But reflecting that these satires design us no ill, but are intended merely to support an argument I have relented. I am glad, moreover, of a chance of giving what is unusual in religious discussions an example of moderation. I know but one other; it is of Saint Michael, who declares he never used a harsh expression, when able to find a gentle one, and would not be abusive though the devil himself were his antagonist.

The complaints against the church, most frequent in the writings of the opposition, are as follows: i. The excessive wealth of the high dignitaries, and poverty of the lower orders; ii. The patronage, in which opens a field of intrigue and favoritism in the appointments; in most instances, they say, a mere business of bargain and sale, by which persons are admitted to orders, deficient in piety, and other qualifications; iii. Tithes, burthensome to the church, and peculiarly unjust towards Dissenters, who are at least one half of the population; and especially towards Ireland, of which four fifths are Catholic. How would you like, in America, to pay for the support of a religion you do not profess, beside sustaining the burthen of your own? iv. Non-residents and pluralities.—Near three thousands persons hold one, two, or more livings, and receive the income, without performing any of the duties; they do not even reside in their parishes, but travel abroad, or mix in the fashionable amusements of the capital; the poor laborer doing the duty, at twenty pounds per annum. v. The union of the clerical functions and those of magistrate and legislator. They call in question, too, the supremacy of the king, and think such rakes as George IV. badly fitted for supreme 'Heads and Defenders of the Faith.' These charges are expanded and set out in relief by examples; of clergy getting tipsy, gambling, dancing, etc.; of the eldest son of one of the bishops holding, by favor of his father, six preferments at once, worth more than twenty thousand pounds; of oppressive seizures for tithes—even widows' beds sometimes sold, and the money used on the sacramental wine; and examples of appointments in the hands, some of Roman Catholics, some of no religion at all, or even in a state of mental derangement. The income of the diocese of Durham they state to be worth one hundred thousand pounds; of which forty thousand go to the dean, prebends, and canons; and the average number of persons who attend service, is seventy-five!

I cannot say, from any experiences of my own, how much of this may be true; but I will give you a few reflections I have been led to make, in considering the subject. The common experience of life proves, that a very high degree of power, of any kind, even religious, tends to abuse; on the other hand, that men, of what ever condition will have little respect for any human institution, unsupported by worldly distinction; by wealth, title, or some equivalent honors. The author of Christianity had a special mission to perform, which required unusual means; the duty of his followers is to superintend a religion already established, to adapt it to the social institutions, and to those dispositions of human nature which may give it the most beneficial effect. It was the order of the Deity himself, that the High Priest's garments be glorious and beautiful, not only of rich stuff, and curious in workmanship; but orient in pearls, and resplendent with jewels. It is certain, that an appearance of independence, a splendor of lodging and dress, give weight of character and authority to men, and deference to their discourses; and that a poor clergy falls into contempt and incompetency to do good. He who advises a return to the poverty and simplicity* of the apostles, as a means of promoting the interest of religion and morals, has much yet to learn of the nature of his species. As far as wealth may be an evil, it is incident to the American as to the English system. There is nothing to prevent a Bishop in New York becoming as rich as in London. It is required only, that some pious testator should bestow upon his office an income of forty thousand pounds, and no fair handed justice could prevent him and his successors from enjoying it. And there is nothing to prevent a laborer in his vineyard being as poor as an English curate. There is nothing to force a man in London to preach for twenty pounds a year.

The English clergy mix much in the amusements of society, and run sometime into excesses of pleasure: ours are more rigid and ascetic, and I believe are not seldom carried into the opposite excesses of bigotry. Amusements are a part of the wants of human nature, of which clergymen partake, as other men. It is certain, that all attempts to set apart a class of men, and give them attributes above humanity, have failed, or been successful only in times of unnatural emotion, or extreme ignorance; and attempts to set social asidements in opposition to religious duties, have failed also. The clergy, mixing more in society, would impose order and decency upon its amusements, and save them often from disreputable excesses.

As for tithes, I would not defend at all. I see no reason to continue the odious tax, since the church may as well be supported from the general fund. A man pays willingly for a highway he does not use, but taxed expressly for such road, would murmur inconsolably. I do not see why a part of the support might not be supplied by voluntary contributions. It would keep alive industry in the clergy, and establish a kindly intercourse between them and their parishioners. We love the few we voluntary pay for, and the clergyman we voluntary patronize; and principles of gratitude and affection are established on both sides. Corporations have no souls, and individuals have no souls in dealing with them. The king is the government; and in this sense, whether a Charles II., or a Saint Edward, is Defender of the Faith. His power of appointment consists only in issuing leave to elect (conge d'elire) to the dean and chapter, who have the presentation.

The non-residence of the clergy in their parishes is indefensible. Who sees nothing of his sheep but the fleece, is a bad shepherd. Exemption from pastoral duties leads to idleness, and vicious habits; and the present state of the world requires both a reasonable religion, and unexceptionable morals and piety, in its professors. The English clergyman, settled in the duties of his parish church, is, by the testimony of every one, the most respectable of human beings. Whether the unequal distribution of the church revenues admits of a remedy, I cannot say: it certainly is an evil. In religion, there are few menial services, and he who administers the duties, ought to have consideration. The man intended for the whole field, should not be heaped up in a few spots.

Uniformity in religion must be given up; it exists no where in Christendom. Diversity of sects has its good and evil. The good, is the censorial inspection exercised by one over the other; a rivalry of abilities among the opposing clergy: an emulation in building better churches, and contributing to their support. The evils are, the weakening of religious influence and means of subsistence. We have twenty religions from Europe, with several of our own, and these often getting together into a village, starve one another. In the large cities, this evil is little felt. There is, beside, a continual tendency to subdivision and contention, which brings out bad passions, injurious to religion itself. We have already two sets of Episcopalians, Presbyterians, and even Quakers. It leads men, also, to dogmatize too much, and reason themselves into bigotry or infidelity. Nothing could save such a system, but the belief, every day spreading that the essence being preserved, the difference of church is immaterial. The dispute is then reduced to mere propriety of forms. On this ground, religion is safe, and the forms best administered and suited to human nature, will become prosperous, and supersede the others.

SPIRIT OF DISCOVERY.

A MARTYR TO SCIENCE.

After Franklin made his great discovery of the identity of lightning and electricity, by means, of a kite sent up into the air during a thunder-storm, many philosophers eagerly sought to repeat his experiments.—Amongst these Professors Richman of St. Petersburg was the most indefatigable and fearless. In pursuing a series of experiments on atmospheric electricity, he erected what was called a gnomon, which consisted principally of a Leyden jar, communicating with an iron rod, which rose some feet above the roof of his house; and an electrometer, consisting of a linen thread with half a grain of lead tied to it. Of course, when the gnomon was charged with electricity, and had communicated that fluid to the thread and the metal, the latter, being easily moved, would be repelled from the gnomon; and its angular ascent on the face of a divided quadrant or index indicated the force of the electricity which had been accumulated. On the 9th of August, 1752, Richman obtained from the end of the rod electrical flashes, which could be heard at several feet distant; and if any person touched the apparatus, a smart shock was felt.

On the 6th of August, 1753, the professor, whilst at a meeting of the Academy of Sciences, heard the sounds of distant thunder; and having previously made every arrangement for making experiments, he instantly quitted the assembly, taking with him his engineer, Mr. Sokolow, to make draughts of whatever might appear interesting in the phenomena. On their arrival at Richman's house, the plummet of the electrometer was found elevated four degrees from the perpendicular; in other words, the electricity in the gnomon had accumulated to such an extent, that it repelled the lead to the distance mentioned. Whilst the philosopher was in the act of describing to his companion the dangerous consequences which might follow if the thread rose to forty-five degrees, a tremendous crash of thunder shook the imperial city. He bent his head over the gnomon to observe the indications of the electrometer, and in this position, with his head a foot from the iron rod a globe of bluish-white fire, about the size of Mr. Sokolow's fist, shot from the iron rod to the professor's head, accompanied by a report as loud as that of a pistol. The discharge proved fatal, he fell back on a chest, and expired in a moment. Sokolow was stupified and benumbed by a kind of vapour which had been generated, and his clothes were covered with burn marks produced by the red-hot fragments of a metallic wire which had struck his person.

On recovering himself he rushed out of the house, and made known the terrible disaster which had taken place. In the meanwhile, Madam Richman, alarmed by the thunder stroke, hastened to the chamber, and found her lifeless husband in the attitude of sitting upon the chest, and leaning against the wall.

The medical part of the case is not without interest. Aid was of course instantly obtained; a vein was opened, but no blood flowed from it; and although every attempt was made to restore life by violent friction and other means, all was in vain. When the body was turned, a small quantity of blood dropped from the mouth, and from a red spot which marked the forehead a few drops also oozed out. Several red and blue spots, not unlike leather shrunk by burning, were discovered on different parts of the body. The shoe of the left foot was burst open, and a blue mark appeared on the foot beneath the apperture. The stocking exhibited no corresponding hole, and the coat had been uninjured. On opening the body, neither the brain nor the cranium showed any appearance of injury; a little blood appeared in the cavities below the lungs, and in the lungs towards the back, which were of a dark brown colour. The heart-glands and smaller intestines were all inflamed, but the entrails were of the natural appearance. Some silver in one of the pockets remained uninjured by the electric fluid. Immediately after the fatal explosion, the house was filled with a sulphureous vapour. A clock was stopped in the adjoining room; the ashes of the hearth were strewn about; the doorcase of the room was rent asunder, a part of the door itself was torn off. The Leyden jar was shattered, and its metallic filings were scattered over the apartment's.

CAOUTCHOUC.

The caoutchouc [or Indian rubber] tree occurs very generally as a solitary tree, although occasionally two or three may be found grouped together. It is among the most magnificent of forest trees, and is second to the banian only, because that tree admits of indefinite extension. Such is the size of the caoutchouc, that it may be distinguished from a distance of several miles by its dense, immense, and lofty crown. The dimensions of one of the largest are as follow:—The circumference of the main trunk and the supporters, a hundred and twenty feet; and of the area covered by the branches, six hundred and ten feet; more than a tenth of a mile! the estimated height, a hundred feet. The appearance of the tree, as one approaches the trunk, is majestic. It has a natural tendency to throw out branches both from the main trunk and from the branches; and these have a strong disposition to cohere with the trunk and with the trunk and with each other. When the roots are thrown out, either from the main trunk or very near it, they ordinarily run down its surface, and impart to it the picturesque appearance of elaborate sculpture. Frequently the caoutchouc plants itself on other trees, and, as soon as it is firmly fixed, casts down its roots to the ground. These, according to their nature, seek each other; a net work is soon formed round the tree; the reticulations diminish with the multiplications of the roots; and at length a solid and firm cylinder is formed round the tree which received the young seedling, which is eventually stifled in the embrace of the caoutchouc. The juice is procured from a transverse incision made in the larger root. The incision reaches the wood, and even penetrates it; but the flow of juice is from the bark alone. Under the incision a hole is scooped in the earth, in which a leaf, folded up into the shape of a rude cup, is placed. The fluid as it issues is, when good, nearly of the consistence of cream and of a very fine white colour. Its excellence is known by the degree of its consistence; and the quality of caoutchouc,—which would appear to depend on this consistence—is readily ascertained by rubbing a few drops on the palm of the hand, when the caoutchouc rapidly becomes separated. By kneading this up again, it speedily becomes elastic. Many incisions are made in one tree; the juice flows rapidly at first; but diminishes in a few moments. It flows more copiously during the night. In two or three days a layer of caoutchouc is formed over the wound, and the flowing consequently ceases.—Friend of India.

INFIDELITY.

A Professor in one of the German Universities, whose unconcern for religion in general was notorious, was not less remarkable for the care which he took in the religious instruction of his children. One of his friends, astonished at this inconsistency, and asking him the reason of this conduct, was told in reply, "It is because I wish my children may enjoy more peace of mind, and more content in this life, than has ever fallen to my lot; and this they can only obtain by possessing more faith than myself."

Suicide.—A young woman named Anna Wilkinson who resided at No. 106 Cherry street committed suicide on Thursday, by swallowing laudanum. She was a native of England, not quite seventeen years old, and had been married more than a year. It appeared that she did not live very happily with her husband.—N. Y. paper.

NOTE.—We differ entirely with the writer. The promise of beauty in the Christian system, is its "Simplicity." The mind can easier be brought to believe in no religion at all, than that the gowags of this world are to find acceptance with Him, who took upon Himself the form of a servant, and declared through his whole life, that his kingdom was not of this world. Fashionable Christianity, and white blackbirds, are of the same kidney.

POPULAR TALES.

For the American Masonic Register and Literary Companion.
FRANK LYTTLETON.

There is not in New England a spot that presents to the eye more beautiful scenery than the VALLEY OF THE CONNECTICUT. From its mouth to its source the eye of the traveller is continually greeted by a succession of pictures ever varying, but always beautiful. It reminds one of the pleasant valleys of romance where all of lovely and enchanting, is walled in by lofty mountains from the rough world without. For hundreds of miles the blithe Connecticut goes chaunting on his way through meadows fair as the fields of Arcadia, until, like a youth who has outlived the pleasures and the hopes of life, he plunges with despair into the ocean. At the time our tale commences the beams of the sun just rising above the tops of the hills fell upon the river's breast and glittered in the dewy meadows while the fields farther back under the hills were yet cold and shady. It was many years ago, and the Valley wore an aspect far different from what it now presents. Instead of the numerous little villages which are at this day, seen on its banks all was forest except where once in a few miles the house of some pioneer farmer rose cheerfully from the garden which his labor had cleared in the woods. These little castles in the wilderness were continually exposed to the ruthless invasions of straggling parties of Indians who were passing up and down the river for war or hunting around these houses. Ambitious clearings often extended a mile or two or even farther upon the river. At the time we speak of a single pedestrian was seen walking lightly along the unworn road, and following up the course of the river. His youth could be known by the glow of health, which the exercise of the morning caused to mantle in his cheek, and by the downy beard scarcely perceptible upon his lips. His hat was thrown back from his brow shewing a prepossessing countenance with large dark eyes, capable of flashing with the fierce passion of war or melting into tenderness in a fair ladies' bower. He carried a light valise, which contained a few changes of garments, with a couple of pistols, as some guard against unlucky contingencies was at this period deemed indispensable. This traveller was Frank Lyttleton. He was a member of Harvard University, and was now spending a Summer vacation in a manner consonant with a mind strongly admiring the beauties and open to all the unimaginable influences of nature, and a disposition tinctured withal in no slight degree with a love of the romantic. He had been born on the Connecticut, and from his earliest boyhood it had been to him a delight and a passion to roam on its banks or climb the rugged mountains and survey from their summits its winding course till it was hidden in the distance, or sport like the dolphin upon its bosom. As he sat upon a rock musing over the current that flowed beneath him, he pictured to himself the delight it would afford him to follow the stream up even to its source, alone with nature and his own heart. This plan so lightly conceived he brooded upon till it became with him a settled object. He determined to accomplish his wish on the first opportunity. One year more was to close his college course, and as another occasion so convenient as the present might not soon offer, it was not to be slighted. His father was a merchant, and like many merchants of that day had himself been liberally educated. He was not therefore inclined to check a propensity which he knew to be common to youth & usually to cease with it. We see our hero then started upon his solitary journey; now to him infinitely attractive as it promised so much of adventure and of romance to his warm imagination. On the morning above mentioned he had long since left behind the last public house and had trusted to the hospitality and courtesy of the inhabitants for accommodations, which were granted cheerfully without distrust to one who bore upon his title page evidences of an open disposition and a gentle demeanor. He loitered leisurely on his way frequently stopping to gaze upon the calm river as if wrapt in pleasant fancies, or to mark the leaping of a salmon or the artful gyrations of the fish hawk in the act of descending for his prey. At length when he had begun to tire of his long walk, the few last miles of which had been in the woods affording only occasional glimpses of the river through the trees, he emerged into a cleared space and the scene that burst upon his sight was such as for a long time to rivet his attention and make him forgetful of his fatigue in his present gratification. A long wide bend of the river lay before him and upon its bank a dwelling-house that seen in such a place and at that day seemed to his delighted imagination a very palace. He suffered his fancy to picture it to him as a fairy castle within whose walls perhaps some fair lady was held captive by sage enchanters, whom it was his duty as a Knight to set a liberty at every hazard. Little did he imagine at the time that there was a fair lady there of whom he should himself become instead of the deliverer, the sage enchanter. He directed his way towards the house and had time to survey its situation and appearance which he was the more charmed with the more he gazed. From the house to the river, a distance of some 30 or a hundred rods stretched a smooth lawn with a gentle declivity even to the water's edge. Close by one side of the house ran a clear stream that emptied itself into the river. So that the house stood upon the point of land between these two streams. Back from the house the ground rose gradually to the woods and then to the hills. It realized almost all he had imagined of the Elysian fields which he had been so long accustomed to anticipate discovering among the green woods where he was now rambling. He gazed awhile in admiration and then stepped aside a short distance to make enquiries of some laborers, who informed him that this was the residence of Mr. D—, formerly a trader but who had three or four years previously removed to this distant spot and made the improvements which he saw around him. Before it reached the house the road passed down through a little shady dell through which a jolly rivalet ran hopping along to the river. Observing a foot path which seemed to cross it and lead more directly to the house he took advantage of the shade which that afforded and went along till he had arrived at the bottom of the little valley casting his eyes to the right and left, as each step portrayed to his view some different modification of the delightful scenery through which he was passing, when suddenly his eyes were fixed upon a beautifully shaded arbor, all covered with the trellis work of vines and wedding flowers, situated on a level plot of grass at the way edge of the little stream. But he stopped not to notice the beauties of the arbor as his eyes were riveted upon the figure of a fair girl who was half sitting, half reclining on a cushioned bench, and being absorbed in the perusal of a book who she held in her hand, had not noticed his approach. Her face was averted, presenting a profile which shewed all the regularity and admirable proportions of the Grecian cast with less as he thought of the masculine, than such features usually exhibit. Thus he judged though her face were partly shaded, not hidden by the profusion of bright locks that hung loose about her neck and forehead. A slight scarf of silk had been thrown over her shoulders, but had fallen so low as to make visible a beautifully rounded neck and breast while one shoulder was unconsciously peeping forth above her dress to be fanned by the refreshing breeze. As Frank feasted his eyes upon this beautiful apparition he almost thought that some nymph of the wood, was before him, in her sylvan abode.

All loose her negligent attire,
All loose her golden hair.

But recovering himself from his trance he perceived that he had been guilty of a rudeness and immediately walked on. His steps aroused the maiden who looked up, and as her dark eyes fell upon a young and handsome stranger so unexpectedly before her, her cheek was suffused with crimson, while she resumed an upright position and drew the scarf more closely about her shoulders. As her eyes met his, it must be confessed that our hero himself felt an undesirable, fluttering within, and as he bowed involuntarily and passed on, he could not help thinking afterwards that his bow was quite as respectful and profound as he was accustomed to give when at college, even to the "Prex" himself. Frank went on in high spirits at this, to him so romantic an incident. The young are easily smitten, their hearts, those that are innocent as well as inexperienced are ever open to the perception of loveliness, be it in the rough mountain top, the rolling river, or though last not least, the fair face of woman. He had hardly yet regained his wonted self-possession, and was humming half to himself, half aloud these lines of Milton.

Who had thought this clime had held
A Deity so unparalleled?

When he found himself suddenly before the house to which he had directed his way. Sitting in the verandah which surrounded two sides of the house, he saw a person whom he at once took, (and he was not mistaken) for Mr. D—the owner of the mansion. He was a lively old gentleman with a countenance that bespoke health and intelligence. He immediately welcomed our young traveller with all the cordial and frank hospitality of our fathers in that age, and that for very obvious reasons was more peculiarly a characteristic of the frontier settlers. They withdrew into the house, which Frank noticed was furnished within in a manner that corresponded with its outward appearance. After they had partaken of refreshments, which the old gentleman ordered, they were soon seated again in the verandah conversing as freely as old acquaintances, Mr. D— soon discovered that the young traveller was the son of an old friend of his own and upon this he was so elated that he could not refrain from giving another shake of welcome.— Frank's father and Mr. D— had in their young days formed an intimacy which ripened as age advanced into firm friendship, though by the circumstances of the war and their own domestic affairs, they had become so far separated that their intercourse as well as correspondence had of late years entirely ceased. But the good old man had many stories and intercourse of their boyish days to relate which he did with a great deal of enthusiasm, though Heaven forgive me, I believe my hero (the rascal) was thinking more of the lovely apparition that had appeared to him in the morning than of the old man's stories, and would rather have caught a glimpse of her at that moment than to have seen even his father himself. He had no doubt that she was the daughter of Mr. D—and that he should see her in process of time, but he could hardly help attempting to make sure of the fact by drawing the old man out on the subject. Soon Mr. D. took his young guest on to his grounds—showed him his gardens, his flowers and his arbors. "I am rejoiced at this chance, visit Mr. Lyttleton said he, I was getting exceedingly lonesome here, having no one but my daughter, and I am determined you shall make an addition to our family for a long time. You will not of course think of going farther up the river?" To this half question, half assertion, Frank replied by expressing his thanks for the invitation to remain, in such a manner as to declare his intention neither way, though his heart leapt as he resolved to take advantage of the hospitality so freely offered him. They retired again to a sitting room, and sat conversing, a short time during which Frank's eyes were frequently turned towards the door hoping to see the entrance of the daughter. Soon he heard steps approaching, and then the door was softly opened. He was seized with an irrepressible tremor; but on looking up discovered that the intruder was merely a servant who came to announce the supper hour. On entering thereon his first glance showed him the object of his thoughts, who manifested her recognition by an involuntary blush. The old gentleman introduced them in due form, without noticing their embarrassment. "Mr. Lyttleton—my daughter, Sir, Mary, this is a young gentleman from—a son of an old friend of mine—we shall detain him as our guest a long time I hope." Thus spoke the old man in the sympathy of his heart. Mary did not say she hoped so too. The supper was a good one because it was enjoyed by these three alone, and there were many more such. From day to day Frank did remain there, and the longer he remained; the less inclination had he to leave them. He found what he had often sought in vain to find, amid the fashionable circles of town, he found in this wild flower of the country, a mind worthy of the beautiful dwelling place which nature had assigned it. He and the daughter of his father's friend could not long live thus, being almost continually together, after the first few days, strolling by the river in the first flush of morning, and in the twilight reposing in the arbor which bore a peculiar charm to each without feeling for each other a friendship which soon ripened into a warm and reciprocal attachment. A fortnight had passed in this way, and our hero was in full course of the enjoyment of that rapture which comes but once, and only from one source. He noted not the lapse of time—he had scarcely enough of recollection for his friends to inform them of his place of sojourn. This love was not strange, indeed in the nature of things it was unavoidable—they were both in the acme youth, both till now 'fancy free.' Their acquaintance had commenced in a manner sufficiently romantic for the most ardent, and the predilection which each had formed, grounded upon outward appearance and a superficial acquaintance, had been sanctioned and strengthened by the mutual perception of more valuable qualities, and a more intimate knowledge. Among the laborers whom Mr. D. employed, and who lived in small dwelling-houses near his own, was one with whom Frank became acquainted through a slight incident in which he had rendered him some trifling assistance by the name of Gerry. As he was extremely loquacious to know every thing, Frank sometimes found amusement in listening to his stories, though he half suspected that he like other people who know everything, told more than he knew. From this man he learned there was another motive besides caprice or interest that had induced his host to emigrate to this retired region—the safety of his daughter. While they were resident at the town of——, a year or two before, there came to the place, a young man who called himself Serle. He seemed to have no employment beyond his own gratification, and had every appearance of being wealthy and respectable. He had been favored with a chance introduction to our heroine, and used frequently to call on her, though she met his advances coldly, as there was something repulsive in his occasional dark look and mysterious demeanor, though disguised by all the artfulness that fashion could teach. But as he saw the probability of success in his pursuit daily lessening, he grew the more resolute and determined in his purpose. In truth he was deeply in love and sought all means to further his advances. One night he had left a company of young revellers like himself, and full of insolence, and wine, had directed his way to the house of Mr. D—and obtained an interview with the daughter during which he had, though not for the first time declared his absorbing passion, but met with a decided repulse. Incensed at this and maddened with the fumes of liquor he had offered personal violence, but she was rescued from him by her father who forthwith banished him from the house with an injunction, not to enter it again. He departed uttering imprecations, and deep vows of revenge. And he did not forget them but laid his plans so deep that, but for an accidental discovery of the plot, the days of home and happiness to our heroine, would have been cut short. Fearing the future attempts of the villain, Mr. D— had been induced to put into immediate execution his intention of removing to a distance up the river. To this the laborer added that Serle in a fit of mingled disappointment, and rage had joined himself to the Indians, and had been seen and known as a white man notwithstanding he was Indian in his outward appearance. In the various incursions of small parties to which he had been attached, he was distinguished among them for the more than savage cruelty of his deeds. It was supposed that he was still among them carrying as far as was in his power an exterminating war against his own race.

NOVELS.

The present age has all the means for mental cultivation that heart can desire. Books of every description and upon every science, instruments from the most simple construction up to those of the most intricate, are all within the reach of man. It needs but the will to gain access to these, and afterwards, but application to become a proficient in whatsoever branch of science man may choose. But I would by no means infer that all books have a tendency to cultivate the mind, or even to advance it in any respect whatever—far be it from me to uphold such an inference. Most generally all those which do not exert a salutary influence may be ranked under the head of novels. By novels, I mean those fictitious compositions which lay claim to but little, if any truth, and have for their sole object the excitement of the passions. There are indeed different degrees as it regards quality, in romantic as well as in real composition; but there is sufficient in them all, even if it is only the title, to condemn them to merited infamy. There are those who pass censure upon a book from the mere title page or index—this, when exercised upon this class of writings, is not so far inconsistent with good sense, as many would suppose. Wherever the word, novel, or romance, lies snugly couched in the title page under the author's name, in nonpareil or minion type, as though afraid to show its diminutive head, throw it aside or consign it to the flames—for death, the death of mind, lurks within the covers. What are the deleterious effects? asks the lover of fancy. Why, they stand out as huge as mountains—the sight of them cannot be eschewed. The beetling crags bend to warn the timid adventurer to beware, lest his fragile bark be rifted upon the dreadful ridges ere he has hardly launched upon the ocean of life. They bend to tell him of those fatal spots upon which so many have struck, and plunged to rise no more.

They destroy taste for other and more substantial reading. This I consider as one of their greatest evils, especially to the young. When we look at the necessity of a sound education being given to the young, and of that character which shall fit them for stations of importance, give them a clear head, and a generous heart—when we look at the utter want of power an imaginary work has to do this—does it not show a weakness in us to encourage the circulation of them, and extol the authors as preservers of a purified literature? Our nation is young, and by no means eminently advanced in the higher branches of science; and therefore there is more necessity that our most strenuous exertions should be spent on these, instead of the soul degrading trash that floods in upon us under the head of romances. I said, our country was not gifted in the sciences—it is indeed true, we are sadly deficient—but if we wish the flaming chariot of science to roll on, let us cut off immediately the dead weights that are pulling it back. Who are to take the reins of this government? Who are to fill its executive offices, if we suffer the minds of our youth to be enfeebled and effeminized by mawkish, sickish love-tales? There is a spell, an enchantment, thrown around novels that can be found in no other books, and which takes deep hold upon the young. Like the venomous serpent, beautiful to the eye, every movement grace; but when its victim is once within its folds, escape is impossible. Let a person read the most interesting romance ever written (for instance, Scott's Ivanhoe), and then let him take Rollin's Ancient History or a Biography, and it will be as dull and uninteresting as though it were Hebrew. There is nothing for the imagination to grasp at, nothing to interest one's self in, no hero, no heroine, painted before the reader. Precisely this effect do they have upon all more or less. They unfit him for the duties of life—they unfit him to acquire beneficial knowledge for his own good and the good of his country.

But the reading of them is by no means confined to the male part of community. The majority is from the other sex. Strange it is, that ladies, whose hearts should be as chaste as the driven snow, free from those grosser faults that mark the common herd, will suffer their minds to be contaminated by this balderdash, this greatest foe to their sex. What pleasure can they derive from reading two or three hundred pages for the simple purpose of seeing how a creature, hatched in the brain of some fanciful tyro, fared in the world? How their consciences will let them spend day after day in this miserable employment, I cannot conceive. But if they must be read, I would say, read the last ten or fifteen pages of each novel and you will learn all there is to be learned. How many females have been ruined by these unprincipled books that might have stood in the foremost ranks of the literature. They have degraded their minds by this kind of reading, and have acquired so strong a taste for it that it is like cutting off a right arm, or plucking out a right eye, to peruse any book of another style. Almost every village in the world can point out many such. They stand like guide-boards to direct others to the right road.

Novels place a human being above this world—they fill him with romantic ideas—they infuse into him the chivalrous spirit of old—and he becomes altogether too fond of making this world the theatre or tournament of his gallantry and love. Of all the incentives to unsteadiness, novels stand foremost. Strange it is that all the sage logicians who have commented upon them should have passed by this one redeeming quality. Frequently we read in them of persons becoming very affluent suddenly, and arriving at the acme of honor and fame.

This causes the reader to suppose, and really believe, that through some mysterious way he shall obtain the same; and therefore he gives up all his pursuits and exertions, and settles down into inactivity. Often persons have been known to relinquish the business from which they receive their daily support under the baneful influence of novels.

It has been said, they are nearly all founded on fact; and information on facts is not injurious. I reply, scarcely one in fifty is founded on fact, and those that are, are none the better for it, if any thing, worse. They are worse, because it is an endeavor to throw a cloak over crime—it is like a gilded charnel-house—truth and fiction are blended together, which is infinitely worse than to have no truth at all. They give us confused ideas of things. We cannot tell which part comes from the novelist's brain and which part is true, and therefore we shall imbibe wrong ideas of men and manners. A person reading Miss Porter's Scottish Chiefs, a work founded on fact, would have a very different idea of Wallace from a correct one. Thus we see that a romance had better make no pretensions to truth, than to make them and not act up to them. All the information you get from any novel concerning a place, or man, cannot be relied upon; it will deceive you, and perhaps at a time when it will not be so consoling to pride. The scenery is exaggerated, and man is made either to excel an angel or to be worse than a devil. The virtue of the hero is praised to the skies, while his faults are left in the dark; and not unfrequently does it happen that the hero or heroine's sins and enormities are praised and commended, while their good morals are esteemed as prudish. Is this the kind of books for the growth of mind?—is this the kind we should place in the hands of our youth?—is this the kind that is going to fit us for eminent service in the ministry, in the law, or any other profession? No!—and this negation will find and echo in the breast of every friend of science. The lover of romances will quote with great satisfaction the words of Virgil:

It is fair to derive instruction even from an enemy.

This is true in many instances. But were it universally practised, what a dreadful state of society we should have. What an anodyne we could then have in our possession to lull conscience in the commission of gross faults. Our theatres and our gambling houses would be thronged with learners of human nature; and all our heretical churches would be crowded with those who wished to learn the depravity of the human heart. Equally pernicious is that other sentiment, if acted upon without any limitation:

“Seize upon truth where'er 'tis found,

Amongst your friends, amongst your foes,

On Christian or on heathen ground;

The flower's divine where'er it grows:

Neglect the prickles and assume the rose.”

And are these all the faults to be found?—by no means. Let the friends of Zion and the friends of purity mourn that lubricity has found a supporter in the novelist—that the violation of one of the most important points in the decalogue is encouraged by pretended preservers of refined taste. Blush, O, ye Novelists! who would fain display the guilty workings of the heart, and call forth the passions that would forever have slumbered in peace, under the fair cloak of morality. Surely Juvenal must have been possessed of the gift of prophecy, for he has so well adapted these lines to the present age:

Nil dictu scdum, visuque, hæc limina tangat

Intra quæ puer est.*

Which translated by Dryden, runs thus:

Suffer no lewdness, nor indecent speech,

Th' apartment of the tender youth to reach.

The style of the writing is the most formidable argument that can be adduced in favor of imaginary works; but herein I think an error is committed, in giving it too much importance. It is indeed smooth and easy; it glides along like the gentle stream without one ripple; but this is not the diction we want—we want the torrent, the flood, the cataract, that sweeps every thing before it—we want that which will make men feel. This smooth, easy, round-period, elegant exclamation, writing that moves along as though peculiar pains had been taken to lubricate every sentence, is not the kind calculated to waken up the dormant powers of the mind, and throw men's souls into the work. On the conry, it lulls them to sleep in the cradle of dreams and reveries. The pulpit demands an eloquence that spurns the dull rules of romance. The divine must wield the sword of truth with no flowers pinned upon it. The law also demands a fire that all the novels ever written cannot give. It is not the romantic that bears off the palm, and may that day never be seen when it shall. It is the sincere wish of every advocate of a purified literature, every friend of science uncontaminated, that the happy epoch may soon be known when the reign of mind shall commence; and imagination, instead of dominating, only exert its proper influence. May the day soon arrive when the cabinet, the parlor, and the boudoir, shall be ornamented with scientific, metaphysical and ethical books, instead of mind dissipating folly and nonsense;—when the words of Cowper shall exert a practical influence upon the novelist as well as the poet.

Happy the bard (if that fair name belong
To him, that blends no fable with his song,
Whose lines uniting, by an honest art,
The faithful monitor's and poet's part,
Seek to delight that they may mend mankind,
And, while they captivate, inform the mind.

THE FIRST ENGLISH BIBLE.

In the year 1535, this most valuable present to English Protestants was complete abroad, under the direction of Miles Coverdale, a man greatly and deservedly esteemed for piety, knowledge of the Scriptures, and diligent preaching, on account of which qualities King Edward the sixth advanced him to the see of Exeter. This first translation of the whole Bible ever printed in English is generally called "Coverdale's Bible;" it is a folio volume, and from the appearance of the types, it is now generally considered to have been printed at Zurich, in the printing-office of Christopher Froschover.

The following specimen contains the nineteenth Psalm (conformably to the numeration in the Hebrew Bibles,) as translated by Coverdale, by whom it is numbered xviii., according to the order found in the Septuagint Greek and in the Latin Vulgate versions.

A letter from Pensacola, dated the 19th inst., to a respectable mercantile house in this city, says,—“To day it is reported that there are thirty cases of yellow fever in town, but as yet there have been but few deaths and adds, if we should not have rain soon, the fever will be as bad as it has been in Mo^o.”

MANNERS AND CUSTC MS.

THE WHITE POPPY—OPIUM—AND OPIUM-EATERS.

The milky juice found in many plants,—as, for instance, in the poppy, the lettuce, the dandelion, and others,—has long been known for its soporific effects. This narcotic principle has been found to exist more particularly in the juice of the white poppy, from which is prepared the Opium of commerce. Laudanum, which is a solution of Opium in spirits, is well known, both for its beneficial effects when carefully administered, and for its fatal results in the hands of ignorance or wickedness.

The Poppy is cultivated to a great extent, for the purpose of extracting the Opium, in many parts of Asia, and even in the southern countries of Europe. In India, the cultivation is confined to certain districts, and is carried on for the benefit of the government. The greatest part of the crops of Hindostan are carried to China, and smuggled into that country, in spite of the regulations which forbids its importation; for even the functionaries appointed to exclude the drugs are anxious as others to obtain it. This desire for Opium, on the part of the Chinese, arises from a pernicious habit prevalent among them, of smoking it, and of swallowing it in the shape of pills, for the purpose of producing a species of intoxication.

The mode of culture in India is as follows:—The field being well prepared by the plough and harrow is divided into small beds, seven feet long, and five wide; the spaces between being formed into channels, for the purpose of conveying water to the different parts of the field. The seeds are sown in October or November: the plants are allowed to grow six or eight inches from each other, and are plentifully supplied with water, till about eight inches high, when they are watered more sparingly. As they are about to come in blossom, the quantity of water is increased, and manure, and a large portion of nitrous earth, are strewn over the beds. When the seedpods are half grown, no more water is given, and the cultivators begin to collect opium. At sunset they make two incisions in each pod, passing from below upwards, taking care not to penetrate the cavity of the capsule. The incisions are repeated every evening, until the capsules have received six or eight wounds: they are then allowed to ripen their seeds.

Early in the morning, the juice which has trickled from the wounds, is scraped off by women and children with a small scoop; it is then placed in an earthen pot, and allowed to become sufficiently hard to be formed into globular masses of about four pounds weight. These cakes are covered over with leaves, and dried, until they are fit for use.

The Poppy is a very hardy plant, and in most climates can be sown either in the Spring, or the Autumn as it stands the cold weather tolerably well. It will not bear transplanting; and must, consequently, be sown more thickly than it is intended to grow, and afterwards be thinned out.

Modern chemistry has succeeded in extracting the narcotic principle from crude Opium, in the form of a white crystallized substance, which is called Morphinum. Small doses of this are now frequently administered, instead of larger quantities Laudanum or Opium.

The seeds of the poppy yield, by expression, an excellent oil, equal, for the purposes of cookery, to the best olive, and possessing none of the properties of opium itself, which appears to reside only in the milky juices of the plant. In Europe, although the poppy is considerable extent, it is chiefly for the sake of the seeds, and of the dry seed-pods, which are used in medicine.

The destructive habit of taking large doses of Opium, to produce a sort of temporary intoxication, prevails to a great extent in Eastern countries, particularly among the Turks. The effects are to be daily witnessed in Constantinople; were the miserable beings addicted to this vice may be seen assembled in some favorite house, enjoying their deadly luxury.

“I had heard so much of the sensations produced by this drug,” says Dr. Madden, “that I resolved to know the truth; and accordingly took my seat in the coffee house, with half a dozen Theriakis. Their gestures were frightful: those who were completely under the influence of the opium, talked incoherently; their features were flushed, their eyes had an unnatural brilliancy, and the general expression of their countenances was horribly wild. The effect is usually produced in two hours, and lasts four or five; the dose varies from three grains to a drachm. I saw one old man take four pills, of six grains each, in the course of two hours. I was told he had been using opium for five-and-twenty years; but this is a very rare example, as an opium-eater seldom passes thirty years of age, if he commences the practice early. The debility, both moral and physical, attendant on its excitement, is terrible; the appetite is soon destroyed, every fibre in the body trembles, the nerves of the neck become affected and the muscles get rigid. Several of those I have seen in this place, at various times, had wry necks and contracted fingers: but still they cannot abandon the habit. They are miserable till the time arrives for taking their daily dose; and when its influence begins, they are all fire and animation. Some of them compose verses, and others address the by-standers in eloquent discourses, imagining themselves to be emperors, and to have all the world at their command.

“I commenced with one grain: in the course of an hour and a half it produced no perceptible effect. The coffee-house keeper was very anxious to give me an additional pill of two grains, but I was contented with half a one; and in another half an hour, feeling nothing of the expected reverie, I took half a grain more, making two grains in the course of two hours. After two hours and a half from the first dose, I took two grains more; and shortly after this dose, my spirits became sensibly excited. The pleasure of the sensation seemed to depend on a universal expansion of mind and matter; my faculties appeared enlarged, every thing I looked on seemed increased in volume; but I had no longer the same pleasure when I closed my eyes, which I had when they were open. I made my way home as fast as possible, dreading at every step I should commit some extravagance. I was hardly sensible my feet touched the ground; and I got to bed the moment I reached home. The most extraordinary visions of delight filled my brain all night. In the morning I rose, pale and dispirited; my head ached; and my body was debilitated, that I was obliged to remain on the sofa all the day, dearly paying for my first essay at opium eating.”

The following description is from Hopes Anastasius, which, although a work of fiction, contains, in its descriptive scenes, correct and vivid representations of the manners of the East.

“The great mart of that deleterious drug, is the Theriakie Tchatchee. There, in elegant coffee-houses, adorned with trellised awnings, the dose of delusion is measured out to each customer according to his wishes. But, lest its visitors should forget to what place they are hieing, directly facing its painted porticoes stands the great receptacle of mental imbecility, erected by Sultan Suleiman for the use of his capital.

“In this Tchatchee might be seen, any day, a numerous collection of those whom private sorrows have driven to a public exhibition of insanity. There, each reeling idiot might take his neighbour by the hand and say, ‘Brother, and what ailed thee, to seek so dire a cure?’ There did I, with the rest of its familiars, now take my habitual station in my solitary niche, like an insensible, motionless idol, sitting with sightless eyeballs, staring on vacancy.

“One day, as I lay in less entire absence of mind than usual, under the purple vines of the porch, admiring the gold-tipped domes of the majestic Sulimanye, the appearance of an old man with a snow-white beard, reclining on the couch beside me, caught my attention. Half-plunged in stupor, he every now and then burst out into a wild laugh, occasioned by the grotesque phantasms which the ample dose he had swallowed was sending up into his brain. I sat contemplating him with mixed curiosity and dismay, when, as if for a moment roused from his torpor, he took me by the hand, and fixing on my countenance his dim, vacant eyes, said, in an impressive tone, ‘Young man, thy days are yet few; take the advice of one, who, alas, has counted many. Lose no time; hie thee hence, nor cast behind one lingering look: but if thou has not the strength, why tarry even here? Thy journey is but half achieved. At once go on to that large mansion before thee. It is thy ultimate destination; and by thus beginning where thou must end at last, thou mayest at least save both thy time and thy money.’”

AMERICAN MASONIC REGISTER.

ALBANY, SATURDAY, OCTOBER, 26, 1839.

Br. William Boardman, of 33 Jones street, N. York, is duly authorised to receive subscriptions, and collect monies on account of the Register, in that city.

The Apollo—is a neat little place recently fitted up in Green-street, for the giving of Concerts, and Dramatic efforts, under the management of Mess. Taylor and Stilwell. It appears to be very respectably patronised—is free from noise—no improper persons allowed to enter its walls, and no ardent spirits permitted about the premises. These considerations, with a very clever company, make it deserving of patronage.

Mobile.—This place may be emphatically termed a "doomed city." After suffering all the horrors of a pestilence, almost unequalled, in the history of any country—fiends in human shape, are prowling about its deserted streets, adding to the general horror, by the destruction of vacant tenements. A correspondent says, that such is the excitement at present in that city, that reasonable suspicion against any individual, would settle his doom at the first place a rope could be fastened to. Who could say nay to it.

The enclosure from Royalton, was duly received. Likewise, the one from Middlebury, Gen.

China.—The English and American residents have again got into difficulty with the Chinese, on account of the smuggling of opium into the 'Celestial Empire.' The Chinese are determined to settle the matter in their own despotic way. If the British and American government, would but send a few frigates to Canton, an hour's reasoning in that way, would learn them good manners for half a century.

Gov. Seward, has recommended Thursday, the 28th of November, as a day to be observed throughout this state, for public Worship, Thanksgiving and Prayer.

At a recent commencement of Columbia college, the honorary degree of D. D. was conferred on the Rev. William M. Carmichael, rector of St. George's church, in Hempsted, L. I. Mr. C. was formerly a resident of this city.

Those of our fair readers who dissent to the remarks of our correspondent on "Novels," shall have a column for reply.

Gen. Van Rensselaer, of Patriot notoriety, has been found guilty, at the term of the U. States court held in this city, under an indictment for a violation of the laws of the U. S., in the frontier affairs in which he was engaged, and sentenced by Judge Thompson to an imprisonment of six months, and a fine of two hundred and fifty dollars.

The tables turned.—The New York Sun says, that a new act in the drama of the Amistad, came off in that city yesterday. Messrs. Ruez and Montez, the Spanish claimants of the negroes taken on board the Amistad, were yesterday morning arrested here at the suite of Jingua, alias Cinquez, and Fulah, on process issued by Judge Ingraham of the Court of Common Pleas, and Chief Justice Jones of the Superior Court, on a plea of trespass and assault, and false imprisonment.—Don Fonni, another of the African captives, has, we understand, by his counsel, obtained a capias to arrest the same individuals; and probably some others also.

A homicide of rather a singular character was perpetrated last Thursday near Syracuse. A pedler, bending under the weight of his pack, encountered on one of the bye-roads of that region a foot pad who demanded his money. The pedler handed out his pocket book.

"Is this all?" asked the robber. "No," said the pedler.—"Well fork up, and be quick!" The pedler put his hand in his bosom, drew out a pistol and shot the robber through the heart. The body was recognised as that of the convict just discharged from the Auburn prison.—Buffalo Jour.

Horrible.—A man named William Kitchman, in a beastly state of intoxication, was brought to the police at noon Thursday and placed in a cell, and there left till yesterday morning, when he was found dead, and his face eaten off by rats!—N. Y. Star.

Horrid case of Murder by a German Boy.—A boy named Godfrey Zapf, aged 14, took with him three small boys, just arrived from Germany, and went into the woods near Jeffersonville (La.) on a hunting excursion. About a mile from town he told the boys he would shoot them, and accordingly raised his gun and shot one down, finishing the work of death by beating his victim with a club before he expired. He re-loaded and threatened to shoot them if they ever disclosed the murder. He arranged the story for them to tell, they separated. The two little fellows returned home and disclosed the secret. The parents, who had been searching the river, now took two hounds, and by their aid found the body. The murderer is arrested, and pleads accident. He displays great intelligence, but evinces, by this unheard of act, an atrocity of character surpassing the most terrific tragedies that the fictions of his countrymen have ever received.—N. Y. Star.

LAMENTABLE OCCURRENCE.

Four persons drowned in Lake Michigan.

We are indebted to Mr. A. H. Gardner, barkeeper of the steamboat De Witt Clinton, for the following particulars. He says: "On the 11th inst., while on our return trip from Chicago, stopped at Milwaukee. There is no pier at that place, and such vessels as touch there have to anchor one mile from the beach. On the day above mentioned, a boat's crew, consisting of Capt. A. H. Squires, L. Randall, clerk, W. Vosburgh, steward, C. Brown, mate, — Johnson, the general agent of the Norwegian company, Captain of the steamboat Towbridge, a stranger, name unknown, and myself, went on shore at that place. Business compelled us to do so, and it was 8 o'clock at night before we attempted to return.

When about half way from the shore the boat swamped, and all were in an instant buried in the lake. It was so dark that we could hardly distinguish each other. While in the water I was seized with both hands in my neckcloth by the Norwegian. I attempted to disengage myself from him, but could not, and we sank together. When at the bottom I seized one of the man's hands, and with a desperate effort with my feet and hands, freed myself, and I saw him no more.

On coming to the surface chance threw an oar in my way, which I seized, and it gave me confidence. After a few minutes I was thrown against the yawl, and by much exertion I got in. There was no person in it, or near, that I could see. Presently I saw the arm of a man above the water, near the stern of the boat. It turned out to be Capt. Squires.

At this time I was much exhausted, but still strong enough to clasp the thwart of the boat, which prevented my being washed overboard again. But of the captain. He some how or other regained the yawl, and run his arm through the stern "ring bolt." The waves were all the while washing over us. After a moment I spoke, and was answered in a feeble tone. The captain much exhausted, and made me repeat my name so anxious was he for my safety. While in this situation the body of Brown floated by—the captain caught hold of it, but it was washed out of his hands, and was found on shore next morning.

In this situation we must have remained over an hour, each cheering the other, until finally the captain said, "Gardner, call out, I am going. If you reach shore, tell them where I am." I tried to encourage the captain, and told him I saw a light. He made no answer, and I saw his head throw back, as if dead. I again called upon him to exert himself, but to no use. At this time the light approached us. It was on the shore towards which we had been washing all the time. What followed I cannot say. When I came to, I was on board the little steamboat Towbridge, in the hands of my rescuers, as was also the captain, and alive.

We farther learn from Mr. G., that of the boat's crew four were lost, viz: Messrs Randall, Vosburgh, Brown, and the Norwegian. The captain of the Towbridge and the stranger saved themselves by swimming. All those who perished had on their coats, and those saved pulled them off, to aid in rowing the boat. Mr. Brown was not found; he had in his coat pocket $2,600 in bills and $400 in gold. Mr. Gardner, in losing his coat, lost $309.—Buffalo Com. Adv.

DIED.

At Natchitoches, La. on the 28 ult. of congestive fever, Mr. William Gough, second son of Mr. Thos. Gough of this city, aged 27 years.

Suddenly at Sand Lake, on Monday last, Mr. Peter Chase, of Newport, R. I.

ELECTION NOTICE.—Sheriff's Office, City and County of Albany, October 11, 1839. Notice is hereby given that at the next general election to be held in the county of Albany on the 4th, 5th, & 6th days of November next, a Senator is to be chosen to represent the Third Senate District in the Senate of this State in the place of Edward P. Livingston, resigned; and that three Senators are to be chosen at the said election to represent the said Third Senate District, according to a notice from the Secretary of State, of which a copy is annexed.

MICHAEL ARCHER, Sheriff.

STATE OF NEW-YORK.

SECRETARY'S OFFICE, Albany, Oct. 11, 1839.

To the Sheriff of the County of Albany—

Sir: Notice is hereby given you that since the general notice of election was issued from this office, on the 15th day of August last, a vacancy has happened in the representation of the Third District, by the resignation of Edward P. Livingston, a Senator from that district, whose term of office would have expired on the last day of December 1841; and that a Senator to supply the said vacancy is to be chosen at the next general election, to be held on the 4th, 5th, and 6th days November next.—There are therefore three Senators to be chosen in the Third Senate District, (comprising among others the county of which you are Sheriff,) at the next general election, viz: one in the place of James Powers, whose term of service will expire on the last day of December next; one in the place of Noadiah Johnson, deceased; and one in the place of Edward P. Livingston, resigned.

JOHN C. SPENCER, Secretary of State.

N. B. You are to give notice of the above mentioned election in writing to one of the inspectors of each town and ward in your county, and to annex thereto a copy of his notice. You are also to publish such notice and copy in all public newspapers printed in your county.

SHERIFF'S OFFICE.—City and county of Albany, August 7, 1839.

ELECTION NOTICE.—A general election is to be held in the county of Albany on the 4th, 5th, and 6th, days of November next at which will be chosen the officers mentioned in the notice from the Secretary of State, of which a copy is annexed.

MICHAEL ARCHER, Sheriff, State of New York, Secretary's Office, Albany, Aug. 15, 1839.

Sir—Notice is hereby given you that the term of service of James Powers, a Senator of the Third Senate District of this state will expire on the last day of December next, and that a senator is to be chosen in that district, to which the county of which you are sheriff belongs, at the general election to be held on the fourth, fifth and sixth days of November next.

You will also take notice, that a vacancy has been caused in the representation of the Third Senate District, by the death of Noadiah Johnson, a senator from that district, whose term of office would have expired on the last day of December, 1840; and that a senator to supply the said vacancy is to be chosen at the said next general election.

You will also take notice, that a proposed amendment to the constitution is to be submitted to the people at the said election, at which the electors are to vote, "For the election of Mayors by the People," or "Against the election of Mayors by the People." At the said election the following officers are to be chosen, viz: Three members of Assembly.

JOHN C. SPENCER, Secretary of State.

N. B. You are to give notice of the aforesaid election, in writing to one of the inspectors of each town and ward in your county, and annex thereto a copy of this notice. You are also to publish the said notice and copy in all the public newspapers printed in your county.

SYMPATHIES WITH NATURE.

Hark! the roar of ocean,
Storms are on the sea,
The mighty winds are marching to
Their wildest mins' ere.

They are rushing o'er the ocean,
They are bending o'er the wood,
They are on the lofty mountain-top,
And in the solitude.

The clouds come riding out of heaven
In roughest welcome to the birth
Of the tempest on the ocean,—
Of the whirlwind on the earth.

But the whirlwind in his rage is calm,
And the billows' wildest roll,
To the torment of my heart,
To the tempest of my soul.

Listen; the winds are still,
The clouds have passed away,
The sun-set breaks o'er hill and dale,
And winding shore and bay.

The lakes and fields and streams
Glance in the sun like snow—
Beauty and light combine to form
A paradise below.

O now my heart is melted,
To the winning influence true
Of the sky with stars all lighted
And the earth o'erspread with dew.

And so it is—my mother earth
I evermore obey,
I weep when nature's face is sad,
And rejoice when it is gay.

MEMORY.

I.

Oh! sweet is the hour when Memory brings
The forms we've loved from the past entomb'd;
When from leaves which are scatter'd, an odor she flings,
More sweet than the flower exhaled when it bloom'd.

II.

How delicious to linger on joys which are gone,
On the friends we have loved, and the hours which have fled;
And to feel that in life we have known at least one,
Whose memory never can sleep with the dead!

III.

Oh! what were this world, if the love we have felt
In our earlier years, could never return,
To give rapture again to the heart where it dwelt,
And dry up the tears it receives in its urn?

IV.

Thus is it in life, when the frowns on the brow,
And despair at the heart has silver'd the head,
That we love to look back to our earliest vow,
And murmur its spell to the name of the dead!

V.

Though Hope with her dreams may bewilder the eye
Of those to whom pleasure has been but a vision;
Though her heaven she steep in those varying dyes,
Which create for the dreamer a world all Elysian:

VI.

Yet dearer to me is memory far,
Though faded her brightness, though sadder her dreams;
To the lover 'tis sweeter to worship one star,
Than kneel to a heaven of numberless beams.

STANZAS.

Of what is the old man thinking,
As he leans on his oaken staff?
From the May-day pastime shrinking,
He shares not the merry laugh.
But the tears of the old man flow,
As he looks on the young and gay;
And his gray head moving slow,
Keeps time to the air they play.
The elders around are drinking,
But not one cup will he quaff;
Oh of what is the old man thinking,
As he leans on his oaken staff!

'Tis not with a vain repining
That the old man sheds a tear,
'Tis not for his strength declining—
He sighs not to linger here.
There's a spell in the air they play,
And the old man's eyes are dim,
For it calls up a past May-day,
And the dear friends lost to him.
From the scene before him shrinking,
From the dance and the merry laugh,
Of their calm repose he is thinking,
As he leans on his oaken staff

I saw her on the vessel's deck,
A young and blooming bride;
Her heart's first love, her wedded lord,
Was standing at her side:
And gazing on the friends of youth,
Perchance her eyes were dim;
But, smiling through her tears she said,
I give up all for him."

Oh! long had those two beings loved,
Exchanging vows of truth;
How sad is it when sorrow stains
The happy page of youth!
When fortunes smiled, her promised store
Lay in a foreign land;
But danger had no fears for them,
Encountered hand in hand.

Again she sought her native shore,
Ere two brief years were gone;
Her hand no gentle pressure felt,
She paced the deck alone!
To weep upon a mother's breast,
Again she cross'd the wave;
And, self-reproved, in secret mourns
Desertion of his grave.

ABSENT FRIENDS.

The night has flown wi' songs and glee,
The minutes hae like moments been—
There's friendship's spark in ilka ee,
And peace has bless'd the happy scene,
But while we sit sae social here,
And think sic friends we never saw,
Let's not forget, for them that's near,
The mony mae that's far awa.

Oh far beyond th' Atlantic's roar,
Far, far beyond th' Australian main,
How many fortune's ways explore,
That we may never meet again!
How many ance sat by our side,
Or danced beside us in the ha'.
Wha wander now the world sae wide—
Let's think on them that's far awa.

There's no a mother but has seen,
Through tears, her manly laddies gae;
There's no lass but thinks o'ane,
Whas absence makes her aften wae;
The ingle sides o'er a' the land,
They now are dowie and dowie a',
For some ane o' the social band
Has left them, and is far awa.

They've left us—but, where'er they be,
They ne'er forget their native shore;
Auld Scotland, mountain, glen, and lea,
They have it pictured at the core;
E'en now, when we remember them,

Our memery they pehaps reca',
And while we fondly breath their name,
They whisper ours, though far awa.

R. C.

ON SEEING A DECEASED INFANT.

[By W. O. B. Peabody.]

And this is death! how cold and still,
And yet how lovely it appears;
'Tis cold to let the gazer smile,
But far too beautiful for tears.
The sparkling eye no more is bright,
The cheek hath lost its rose-like red;
And yet it is with strange delight
I stand and gaze upon the dead.

But when I see the fair wide brow,
Half shaded by the silken hair,
That look'd so fair as now,
When life and health were laughing there,
I wonder not that grief should swell
So wildly upward in the breast,
And that strong passion once rebel
That need not, cannot be suppress'd.

I wonder not that parent's eyes,
In gazing thus grow cold and dim,
That burning tears and aching sighs
Are blended with the funeral hymn;
The spirit hath an earthly part,
That weeps when earthly pleasure flies,
And heaven would scorn the frozen heart,
That melts not when the infant dies.

And yet why mourn? that deep repose
Shall never more be broke by pain;
Those lips no more in sighs unclose,
Those shall never weep again.
Think not that the blushing flower
Shall wither in the church-yard sod.
'Twas made to gild an angel's bower
Within the paradise of God.

Once more I gaze—and swift and far
The clouds of death in sorrow fly,
I see thee like a new born star
Move up the pathway in the sky,
The star hath rays serene and bright,
But cold and pale compared with thine;
For thy orb shines with heavenly light,
With beams unfailing and divine.

Then let the burthen'd heart be free,
The tears of sorrow all be shed,
And parents calmly bend to see
The mournful beauty of the dead;
Thrice happy—that their infant bears
To heaven no darkning strains of sin;
And only breathed life's morning airs,
Before its evening storms begin.

Farewell! I shall not soon forget!
Although thy heart hath ceased to beat,
My memory warmly treasures yet
Thy features calm and mildly sweet;
But no, that look is not the last,
We yet may meet where seraphs dwell,
Where love no more deplores the past,
Nor breathes that withering word—farewell.

MASONIC.

For the American Masonic Register and Literary Companion.

FREEMASONRY.

Comprehends within its circle every branch of useful knowledge and learning, and stamps an indelible mark of pre-eminence on its genuine professors, which neither chance, power, nor fortune can bestow. When its rules are strictly observed, it is a sure foundation of tranquility, amidst the various disappointments of life; a friend that will not deceive, but will comfort and assist, in prosperity and adversity; a blessing that will remain with all times, circumstances, and places, and to which recourse may be had when other earthly comforts, sink into disgrace.

Freemasonry gives real and intrinsic excellency to man, and renders him fit for the duties of society. It strengthens the mind against the storms of life, paves the way to peace, and promotes domestic happiness. It meliorates the temper and improves the understanding. It is company in solitude, and gives vivacity, variety, and energy to social conversation. In youth, it governs the passions, and employs, usefully, our most active faculties; and in age, when sickness, imbecility and disease have benumbed the corporeal frame and have rendered the union of soul and body almost intolerable, it yields a fund of comfort and satisfaction.

These are its general advantages; to enumerate them separately would be an endless labor: It may be sufficient to observe, that he who cultivates this mystic science, and acts agreeably to the character of a freemason, has within himself the spring and support of every social virtue; a subject of contemplation, that enlarges the mind, and expands all its powers; a theme that is inexhaustible, ever new, and always interesting.

Abstracting from the pure pleasures which arise from friendship, so wisely constituted as that which subsists among masons, and which it is scarcely possible that any circumstance or occurrence can erase, masonry is a science confined to no particular country, and extends over the whole terrestrial globe. Wherever arts flourish, there it flourishes too. Add to this, that by secret and inviolable signs carefully preserved among the fraternity, it becomes an universal language. Hence many advantages are gained: The distant Chinese, the wild Arab, and the American savage, will embrace a brother Briton; and will know, that beside the common ties of humanity, there is still a stronger obligation to induce him to kind and friendly offices. The spirit of the fulminating priest will be tamed; and a brother, though of a different persuasion engage his esteem: for mutual toleration in religious opinions is one of the most distinguishing and valuable characteristics of the craft. As all religions teach morality, if a brother be found to act the part of a truly honest man, his private speculative opinions are left to God and himself. Thus through the influence of masonry, which is reconcilable to the best policy, all those disputes which imbitter life, and sour the tempers of men, are avoided; while the common good, the general object is zealously pursued.

From this view of our system, its utility must be sufficiently obvious. The universal principles of the art unite, in one indissoluble bond of affection, men of the most opposite tenets, of the most distant countries, and of the most contradictory opinions; so that in every nation a mason will find a friend, and in every clime a home.

Such is the nature of our Institution, that in the lodge, union is cemented by sincere attachments, and pleasure is reciprocally communicated in the cheerful observance of every obliging office. Virtue, the grand object in view, luminous as the meridian sun, shines refulgent on the mind, enlivens the heart, and heightens cool approbation into warm sympathy and cordial affection.

REASONS FOR MASONIC SECRECY.

If the secrets of masonry are replete with such advantage to mankind, it may be asked, why are they not divulged for the general good of society? To this it may be answered, were the privileges of masonry to be indiscriminately dispensed, the purposes of the institution would be subverted; and our secrets being familiar, like other important matters, would lose their value, and sink into disregard.

It is a weakness in human nature, that men are generally more charmed with novelty, than with the intrinsic value of things. Innumerable testimonies might be adduced to confirm this truth. The most wonderful operations of the Divine Artificer, however magnificent, and useful, are overlooked, because common and familiar.—The sun rises and sets, the sea flows and reflows, rivers glide along their channels, trees and plants vegetate, men and beasts act, yet these being perpetually open to view pass unnoticed. The most astonishing productions of nature on the same account escape observation, and excite no emotion, either in admiration of the great cause, or of gratitude for the blessing conferred. Even virtue herself is not exempted from this unhappy bias in the human frame. Novelty influences all our actions and determinations. What is new, or difficult in the acquisition, however trifling or insignificant, readily captivates the imagination, and insures a temporary admiration; while what is familiar, or easily attained, however noble or eminent, is sure to be disregarded by the giddy and the unthinking.

Did the essence of masonry consist in the knowledge of particular secrets or peculiar forms, it might be alleged that our amusements were trifling and superficial. But this is not the case. These are only keys to our treasure, and having their use, are preserved; while, from the recollection of the lessons which they inculcate, the well informed mason derives instruction, draws to a near inspection, views them through a proper medium, adverts to the circumstances which gave them rise, and dwells upon the tenets they convey. Finding them replete with useful information, he prizes them as sacred; and convinced of their propriety, estimates their value from their utility.

USEFUL HINTS.

The first business of masons in ancient times was to divide the members of the order into distinct classes, rising in grades one above another, according to their respective degrees of merit.

It was the duty of masters and officers to dispense instruction, to provide employment, and to secure to the laborer his wages, as they became due. It was their business also to examine persons, and recommend them to such employments as were adapted to their capacities and qualifications, to the end that business of importance might never be intrusted to unskilful or faithless hands.

All persons belonging to the lodge, and in particular, candidates for masonic honors, were obliged to be industrious and frugal, that they might not only support themselves, but lay up something for charitable purposes. Great care was taken to encourage the lower grades to make proficiency in labor, learning and morality. Such as excelled were promoted; and as often as promoted, entitled to higher wages, and more desirable employments.

A plan so happily concerted, and so ably executed, could not fail of producing the most beneficial effects. Lodges at once became schools of science, and nurseries of virtue. None but honest, industrious and skilful workmen, or those who discovered a disposition of becoming so, could be encouraged; but all such persons under the protection of the fraternity were sure to find employment, and reward according to their rank.

But, in process of time, when the mechanic arts were carried to a degree of perfection, and were generally known in all civilized countries, and of course needed no extraordinary patronage, the mechanical branch of this institution gradually yielded to the moral. So that freemasonry in modern times may properly be called a moral science: and the meetings of lodges may with the same propriety be called "feasts of charity," it being their great business and object to teach and enforce the observance of piety and benevolence. Veneration for God and love to the human kind are among their fundamental principles. And means of an universal language, and a member of salutary rites and regulations peculiar to the order, they are able to maintain mutual harmony and friendship, and to carry on a free and general commerce of virtuous principles and benevolent offices throughout the world.

Hence we see the importance of the institution under its present form and the propriety of entering into that respectable fraternity for the purpose of correcting vice, and diffusing knowledge and philanthropy.

But if this institution according to its original plan and design be really good, if it be calculated to render mankind social and harmonious; to make them honest and upright, true to God and their country, and to cement them together in the bonds of a virtuous affection; then it will evidently follow that much care should be taken to prevent so good an institution from being corrupted. Feasts of charity should never be turned into licentious revels; nor temples of friendship into theatres of treachery. And to prevent these and other evils, to which lodges may be exposed, I beg leave to suggest to the fraternity three things. First, Caution, Secondly, Instruction. And thirdly, Discipline.

First. In regard to the admission of members, much caution will be necessary, that you may not be imposed upon by improper characters. As it is the design of freemasonry to create friendship; to make provision for the relief of poor and distressed brethren; to inculcate a filial reverence for Almighty God; and to encourage those personal and social virtues, which adorn and dignify human nature, and render mankind peaceful and happy; the doors of the lodge must, therefore, be forever barred against manevolent, the profane, the idle, the seditious, and unruly of every description. For all such persons would prove but spots in your feasts of charity. While feasting with you, and feeding without fear, they would spy out your liberty, interrupt your peaceful intercourse, trifle with your moral lectures, sow discord among brethren, and thereby bring up an evil report upon the society, so as to counteract the benevolent purposes for which it was instituted.

Secondly, To preserve the purity of the order, instruction is necessary. Masters and officers therefore should make it their business to pay particular attention in lecturing. The mysteries of the craft are to be unfolded, and the moral duties inculcated. Masons are not to be trained up in ignorance and vice. Their minds are to be enlarged, and improved. They are to be frequently reminded of their obligations to love and worship Almighty God, to acknowledge him as their sovereign lord and master; to keep his name sacred; and to govern their lives by the unerring precepts of his word. They must be taught to be good men and true; to be sober, industrious and charitable, upright in their dealings, and peaceable and benevolent in all their social intercourse. They are to be taught to walk in wisdom toward them that are without, making a diligent improvement of their time and talents; and having their speech always with grace, seasoned with salt, that they may know how they ought to answer every man. They are to be admonished to avoid political and religious disputes, together with all domestic broils and contentions, that they may live in love and peace, having conscience void of offence, and characters unspotted from the world.

Thirdly, That there may be no spots in your feasts of charity, it will be necessary to attend to discipline.

It is to be expected that unworthy members will sometimes creep into the lodge, notwithstanding all your caution, instruction and exertion to prevent them. And not only so, but persons, who were once regular may grow careless, and so yield to sinful indulgences, as greatly to affect the reputation of the order. These things will require discipline. Unruly members must be reduced to order. Superfluities must be lopped off. The first rising of vice must be suppressed. Otherwise the lodge will resemble the field of the slothful, or the vineyard of a man void of understanding, where the stone wall is broken down, and the face thereof is overgrown with thorns and nettles.

But in the exercise of discipline much prudence will be requisite. Some will be corrected by a gentle rebuke while others may require severity. A proper discrimination therefore must be made. Such as have been guilty of a mere indiscretion must not be dealt with like wilful and notorious offenders, but must be approached in all kind and compassionate offices of friendship; and if they possess a masonic temper, their sensibility will be affected by such an admonition, and their penitence manifested by a speedy amendment.

Others again, who have grown more hardened in wickedness, and have repeatedly rejected your affectionate remonstrances, you must approach with earnestness, trembling for the reputation of the craft, and snatching them as brands from the burning. But if they will not suffer themselves to be reclaimed either by your gentle, or more zealous exertion, after having exhausted upon them in vain every expedient of reformation, you must remove them, as so many spots and nuisances, from the society.

MISCELLANY.

THE AGE OF WONDERS.

BY TIMOTHY TITTERWELL ESQ.

I am afraid this great lubber, the world, will "prove a cockney."

My neighbor over the way, Colonel Swallowmore, thinks himself born in the age of wonders:—and no wonder he thinks so, for he reads the newspapers and believes them! It is astonishing how gravely the Col. gulps down every crude lump of monstrous fudge the papers contain. Sea-serpents, crook-necked squashes consumption cured, talking pigs, and three-legged cats, are nothing to an appetite like his. He believes electioneering speeches and predictions of political quidnucs. All is fish that comes to his net. "These are times! Mr. Titterwell, these are times indeed!" says he to me, with a most rueful visage, as he lays down the newspaper—"What are we coming to! People have got to such a pass! Something is certainly going to happen before long. I'm really, really frightened to think of it. There never were such doings in my day. Positively I've got so now that I an't surprised at any thing at all."—And so he shakes his head, hitches up his breeches, sticks his spectacles higher up on his nose, and reads the wonders of the day over again.

Twenty-eight several times has this country been irretrievably ruined since I knew the Colonel. Seven times has the world come quite to an end. Nineteen times have we had the hardest winter ever known within the memory of the oldest inhabitant. Twenty-one times there never was seen such a backward spring. Forty-seven times the approaching session of Congress has been one of uncommon interest; and thirteen thousand nine hundred and sixty-six times has death snatched away the best man upon earth, leaving mortals inconsolable and society with an immense void. The mental agitations he has undergone in pondering upon the "wonderful wonders" that spring up as plenty as grasshoppers in this wonderful age, are not to be described; for the Colonel takes an immense interest in public affairs, and cannot see the universe go to ruin about his ears without pangs of sympathy. Whatever mole-hill he stumbles upon, he makes a mountain of it. He thought the Salem Mill-dam absolutely necessary to the balance of power, and was certain the bridge over Peg's Run was the only means of saving the nation.

He went to bed in a great fright on reading in the paper that Emerson's Spelling-book would overthrow the liberties of the country; and he was struck with the deepest alarm when he heard of the feud that had broken out between the Houses of Correction and Reformation about a cart-load of chips. I shall never forget the anxiety that beset him last summer when the City council could not come to a choice about the Superintendent of Drains. The newspapers were full of the affair, and the Colonel, I verily believe, would have worried himself into a nervous fever had this alarming schism between the two branches of the city government been carried much farther.

"A strange affair, Mr. Titterwell, a very mysterious affair," said he. "There are some dark, under-ground manoeuvres going on in this matter, depend upon it: and really the Mayor and Aldermen"—here he turned up the whites of his eyes and shook his head. Heaven only knows what he thought of those great dignitaries. However the affair of the drains got through without any great catastrophe to folks above ground, that ever I, could learn, and the Colonel's consternation subsided for that short time.

All the world were going mad the other day about white mustard seed. "Pray Colonel," said I, "what is white mustard seed to you or me? Can't we eat our bread and butter, and sleep till six in the morning, without troubling our heads about white mustard seed? Didn't we fight the battles of the revolution without white mustard seed? Did n't Samson carry off the gates of Gaza without white mustard seed? Didn't your blessed old grandmother knit stockings and live to the age of ninety without white mustard seed? Then what's the use of minding the dols in the newspapers who tell you that white mustard seed is better than meat, drink and sunshine, and that we shall all die untimely deaths, unless we take white mustard seed?"

The Colonel could not understand it:—it was a great mystery indeed,—but the newspapers were full of it, and he was convinced white mustard seed had something in it, that would come out in due time. White mustard seed, however, has had its day; and the Colonel has probably taken to saw-dust, as I heard him talk of Dr. Graham last week. But of all mortals the Colonel is the most prone to sympathise with the unfortunate public upon the loss of great men. I popped in upon him the day before yesterday, and found him lamenting a huge public calamity. Three great men had fallen in Israel:—an eminent clergyman, an eminent country representative, and an eminent dealer in salt fish on Long Wharf. The Colonel was triply dolorous upon the matter; society, business, politics, had suffered an immense loss,—a loss incurable, irreparable, and so forth. I assured the Col. there was no great cause for apprehension, for the world was pretty sure to turn round once in twenty-four hours, whether great men died or lived. "The fact is, Colonel," said I, "great men may die as far as they please for aught I care. I have not been frightened by the death of one of them since an adventure happened to me in my ninth year, when I lived in that country."

"What is that?" asked the Colonel.

"I'll tell you," said I.

"On a certain day,—now never to be forgotten by me, news arrived in town that the Governor was dead. No sovereign prince, pontiff or potentate on the face of the earth, ever appeared so gigantic and formidable to my childish eyes, as that harmless gentleman the Governor of Massachusetts. Imagine the shock occasioned by this announcement! Straightway the bells began tolling, people collected in groups, quidnucs scoured from place to place, gossips chattered, children gaped in dumb astonishment, and old women with dismal faces ran about croaking 'the Governor is dead!' To me these things seemed to betoken the general wreck of nature, for how the order of the universe could subsist after the death of the Governor, was beyond my comprehension. I expected the sun and moon to fall, the stars to shoot from their spheres, and my grandfather's mill-pond to upset. The horrible forebodings under which I lay down to sleep that night, are not to be imagined, and it was a long time ere I could close my eyes. In the morning I was awakened by a dreadful rumbling noise. 'The Governor is dead!' I exclaimed, starting up in a terrible fright. The noise continued: I listened, and discovered it to be nothing more than my old grandmother grinding coffee!

"The effect of this prodigious anticlimax can hardly be imagined; never in my life was I so puzzled and confounded as at the first moment of this discovery. 'What!' said I to myself, 'is the Governor dead and yet people grind coffee?—Then it seems we are to eat our breakfast just as if nothing had happened. Is a great man of no more consequence than this?' A new ray of light broke in upon me; I fell to pondering upon the occurrence, and five minutes' pondering completely demolished the power supreme with which many a pompeous owl had stalked through my imagination. From that moment, governors, town clerks, selectmen, representatives justices of peace, and great people of every degree, lost nine tenths of their importance in my eyes, for I plainly saw the world could do without them.

"How often in after life have I applied the moral of this incident. How much moving eloquence and dire denunciation have I passed by with the remark—'That is a great affair, no doubt, but it won't stop a coffee-mill.'"

From the Note Book of a Colonist.

CAPTAIN JACK.

In the year 1823, I was employed as overseer on a sugar plantation on the east coast of the river Demerary, in South America. Early in that year an insurrection broke out amongst the negroes, and the white servants on the estates were assembled at Stabroek the capital of the colony, embodied into a corps of riflemen, and brigaded in different parts of the country with the regular troops.

It so happened that I was stationed with a party of the—th regiment, commanded by Colonel —, close to the property on which I had resided. I was thereby enabled to be of considerable use to the military authorities on several occasions, from my intimate knowledge of the localities of the neighbourhood and of the character of the people by whom we were surrounded.

The communication between the plantations on the coast and the town of Stabroek, is kept up by means of small schooners, which carry weekly thither the produce ready for shipping on board the merchantmen in the river, and return laden with coals, provisions, and other necessary supplies. These droghers, as they are called, are manned and commanded by negroes: to be a boat captain is a situation of great trust and emolument, which is always filled by the best man on each estate. These boat-captains contrive to pick up a good deal of money by carrying letters and passengers. The profits arising from which is their perquisite.

Whenever I had occasion to go to town, I generally gave the preference to a schooner belonging to Plantation Eugenia; she was the fastest boat on the coast, and her commander, Captain Jack, was a smart, active, well-behaved fellow, whose popularity with white and black stood him in good stead; for whenever it was known that the Eugenia schooner was to sail the other droghers had but a small chance of passengers.

On one unlucky evening, soon after the insurrection broke out Captain Jack returned from Stabroek, with his boat full of strange negroes, who were cordially welcomed in the negro-yard of the Eugenia. That very night the dwelling house of Mr. Forester, the proprietor of the estate, was attacked, and burnt to the ground, and he himself only escaped at the time, to die shortly afterwards of a fever brought on by the hardships he had been forced to undergo in concealing himself from his quick-sighted enemies. For two days he lay without food or shelter in the cane-pieces, exposed to the scorching sun and heavy dews of a tropical climate, and at night waded along the sea-shore, up to his neck in mud and water, until he reached the house of a friend near town, where he expired in a few days. Colonel—— wished to send notice of this outrage to the officer commanding at Stabroek; and, as Captain Jack's character was above suspicion, he selected him to convey the express to town, and sent a serjeant on horseback to direct him to prepare to weigh immediately.

The man rode to the Eugenia, and went on board the schooner, which was lying high and dry on the sand. There was nobody to take charge of her; her sails and rigging were cut to pieces, her rudder burnt, her anchor and chain gone. Captain Jack was no where to be found. The serjeant returned to Mahaica post, and made his report. Colonel—— sent for me. He told me that he was aware I was well acquainted with Jack; and that he was informed a sort of friendship existed between us,—it, indeed, in those days, a friendship could be said to exist between a negro and a white man; that I knew his haunts and connections; and that, if anybody could find him, I could. He said that he was now convinced that Jack was implicated in the crime committed on Plantation Eugenia, and that he would give me fifty joes to secure him, dead or alive before night.

At this period the very existence of the colony was in a most critical position; the numerical odds against the whites was as a hundred to one; the negroes equalled us in courage, and surpassed us in animal strength and indurance; on the other hand we were armed, and possessed that confidence in each other, so essential in the hour of danger. We had also in the colony the regiment Colonel—— commanded, and a small detachment of artillery.

From circumstances which had occurred during my residence on the east coast, I had acquired such a regard for friend Jack, that I declare I would sooner have been instrumental in arresting any white man in the colony, with the conviction which I had in this case, that his death would be the inevitable consequence of his apprehension. Still this was no time for a man to swerve from his duty, however painful it might be; horrible atrocities had been committed by the insurgent negroes, and signal must be the punishment inflicted on the perpetrators, whenever they could be discovered. I therefore shouldered my rifle, and sallied forth, determined to do my best to apprehend Jack; not without a hope, however, that his well known sagacity and activity might render my exertions fruitless.

I had hardly walked half a mile when, at an angle of the road, I came full on the very man of whom I had been sent in quest. I at once sprang forward, and sized him by the throat. His astonishment at this unfriendly greeting from me was so great, that he made no resistance whatever. My uniform showed that I was on duty, and his conscience probably apprised him of the cause of this hostile proceeding on my part.

Colonel—— has sent for you, Jack," said I. "I trust you will be able to account for the state in which your boat was found, when he wished you to take his despatches to town."

Jack made no reply, but shook his head mournfully. I mentioned to him to walk on before me towards the military post. He did so. Presently he stopped and turned round. Seeing that I unslung and cocked my rifle, he said.

"Massa Edward, suppose Jack run away, you no shoot him?"

"That I most certainly will, Jack. I have been ordered to convey you dead or alive to Mahaica, you shall go thither. I am sorry for you from the bottom of my heart, for I am sure you have been unwillingly compelled to join in the destruction of Mr. Forster's property."

We soon reached the post, where I delivered over my prisoner to the guard. He was instantly taken before Colonel—— and several other officers, and I lingered in the guard room, ostensibly for the purpose of reposing myself, but really to see how my poor friend Jack would fare. After some time had elapsed, I grew tired of waiting, and shouldering my rifle, was walking out of the gate, when Colonel—— advanced at the front of the gallery before the officers' apartments, and exclaimed in an angry tone,

"Where the hell are you going to, sir? How dare you leave your prisoner without orders?"

"I thought, colonel, that my duty had been ended when I delivered my prisoner to the guard."

"Did you, by——, sir, remain where you are, and I'll soon convince you of the contrary."

He then returned into the house for a moment, and reappeared followed by the other officers, and by Jack, who walked slowly down the steps towards me, while the colonel and his friends remained leaning over the front of the gallery.

"Now, Sergeant," continued Colonel——, "place your prisoner on his knees, with his face towards you."

Jack knelt down—not a muscle of his countenance quivered—he was entirely naked, and was remarkably muscular and well-made man. He looked like a fine bronze statue. Both he and I knew perfectly well that his life was forfeited, and that he was about to die; but neither of us was prepared for what followed.

"Fall back ten paces," roared Colonel——.

I obeyed.

"Now shoot your prisoner through the heart."

I was horror-stricken. Well aware that poor Jack's hours were numbered, I had never contemplated the possibility of being compelled myself to become his executioner in cold blood. I knew, moreover that Colonel—— had no right to make me carry the sentence of the drum-head court-martial into effect. I was a civilian, a volunteer, and a non-commissioned officer; and, from the various services which my local knowledge had enabled me to render him, I had no reason to expect such brutal treatment at his hands.

As soon as I could recover from my astonishment and horror, I advanced towards the gallery in order to remonstrate with the colonel. He turned away from me, and called to the officer of the guard to send two men forward. The men stepped out, and at his command cocked their pieces and levelled them at me. Colonel—— then said to them,

"I am going to give my orders to that damned mutineer. If he does not obey them instantly, shoot him. Now, Sergeant, make ready—present—fire!"

Jack sprang to his feet, and fell dead on his face.—My bullet had pierced his brain.

Colonel—— tossed the purse containing the reward offered for Jack's apprehension on the ground, close by his dead body, and walked coolly into the house, observing, that until the Volunteers and Bucks formed some idea of military discipline from experience, they would give more trouble than assistance to the regulars.

He lived to see the day when he gladly would have exchanged his whole regiment for a score of good rifles; yet he lived not long,—for three days after the tragedy which I have here related, he attempted, against our advice to pursue a body of negroes into the bush, with the whole force at Mahaica, unaccompanied either by volunteers or Indians. His men, encumbered by their heavy clothing and accoutrements, exhausted by the heat, and bewildered by the tremendous torrents of rain which flooded the savannahs, fell an easy prey to their naked enemies. Not more than a dozen escaped to tell the tale of their defeat. Colonel K—— received a musket shot which broke his thigh. He fell alive into the hands of his enemies. They had been Captain Jack's comrades and friends, and horribly they avenged his death.

RIVAL TO THE DAGUERRETYPE.

If we believe the German papers, Leipmann, of Berlin, has invented a machine for obtaining correct copies of oil colored pictures, which is no less ingenious than the Daguerreotype. For some years a little slender man, whose attire denoted poverty, was observed in the Museum of Berlin, where he was to be seen every week. Instead of walking through the galleries and examining the various paintings, he was always in the Flemish room, stationed before the same picture, a portrait of Rembrandt. He would remain there for hours together, his hands behind his back, and his eyes fixed upon the picture.

This was ascribed to eccentricity, whilst it was a serious and singular study, leading to a discovery which will form an era in the history of painting. M. Leipmann was meditating upon the invention of a machine for reproducing oil paintings; and after ten years of persevering labor, he has succeeded beyond all expectation.—At his residence are to be seen a hundred copies of that very head of Rembrandt, all of them of scrupulous resemblance to another. How he has achieved this is his own secret.—When one considers what privations he must have suffered in realizing his idea, one cannot help wishing that his efforts may be rewarded. With the assistance of a trust-worthy maid servant, he has labored for many years, night and day, making sealing was at night to procure a livelihood.—The most surprising circumstance is, that he did not previously make a complete copy of the picture but conveyed it home by parts, as he had it in his mind after visiting the Museum.

Thus, on one day was an eye, on another the nose, on the third a lock of hair that he took home, which must have required whole years for the completion of his task. He has produced with his machine in one of the rooms of the Royal Museum, and in presence of the directors, 110 copies of Rembrandt's portrait, painted by himself—a picture the copying of which in the usual way presents the utmost difficulties, according to the opinion of all painters. Leipmann's copies are said to be perfect, and to give the most delicate shades of the color. He asks but a louis d'or for a copy. His invention excites universal admiration.

A distressing scene, we learn from the Brockville Recorder, recently occurred at a trial at Perth, Upper Canada. The prisoner was indicted for the murder of his son-in-law. The scene is thus described:

"During the investigation, the widow of the deceased, who was at the same time the daughter of the prisoner, was on the part of the defence, brought into court to be sworn. She appeared in mourning—pale, thin, and greasy discomposed; and it was only with exertions on her part, that she could keep composed enough to speak; however, nothing very material was elicited from her. Her feelings frequently overcame her, and she burst out into loud sobs, at one of which times she cast her eyes upon the prisoner, and screamed 'father, father.' The court of course ordered her removal; she had to pass her father, to whom she extended her hand, in the midst of her sobs and shrieks of 'father, father!' The old man, in tears, reached out his hand to his widowed daughter; the hand which at the instigation of his heart, had been the means alike of her misery and his own—she received it, and was taken away. The scene was tragical, and though between these humble individuals, bro't the tears to many an eye."

A MISTAKE.

A doctor, on calling upon a gentleman who had been some time ailing, put a fee into the patient's hand, and took the medicine himself which he had prepared for the sick man; he was not sensible of his error till he found himself getting ill, and the patient getting better.

LEGAL ELOQUENCE.

A young backwoods lawyer lately concluded his argument in a case of quare clausum frigit, with the following sublime burst:—"If, gentlemen of the jury, the defendant's hogs are permitted to roam at large over the fair fields of my client, with impunity and without pokes—then—yes, then, indeed, have our forefathers fought, and bled, and died, in vain!"

Gigantic Umbrella.—An umbrella of the extraordinary dimensions of 64 feet in circumference, gaily fringed, and standing 12 feet high, has been exhibited at Bristol, England. It was made for one of the African Kings, and is to be sent out by the first ship. It is said that this monster umbrella is for the purpose of screening the King from the sun, when in consultation with his Minister.

A Ducking.—Mr. Paulin and the lady who accompanied him in his balloon excursion, landed in the middle of the Delaware—the queerest place to land on that we ever heard of.

POPULAR TALES.

For the American Masonic Register and Literary Companion.

FRANK LYTTLETON.

Frank was wandering home from the house of Gerry after the relation of these particulars, which gave him a new subject to muse on. It was a fine moonlit evening, and he had set himself down on a slight eminence among some trees, at some distance from the sight of the house. He had been here an hour, his mind conning o'er the various things he had just heard, which opened to him a new era in the life of his beloved, and picturing to himself many delightful dreams of future happiness, when he was startled by the crackling of a limb, and just as he turned to see the cause of the noise, a tomahawk whistled past his head and stuck in the tree against which he had been leaning; and looking up at the same time, he saw a tall savage in all the accoutrements peculiar to them when on a hostile expedition, approaching him with speed, having a glistening knife in his hand which appeared at that time his only weapon. Frank was totally unarmed, and as this was a new and certainly an unexpected situation to be placed in, he knew not what to do, and consequently for the moment did nothing; but bethinking himself, he wrenched the tomahawk from the tree, and stood with it raised prepared for the combat. The Indian was within twenty feet of him, but contrary to Frank's expectation he dodged behind the nearest tree, seeming to decline the combat. Frank was in no mood to wait for him, and little heeding the manner of his withdrawal, sprung into the open moonlight and rushed down the hill, soon reached the house breathless with haste; relating his adventure and displaying the proof of it which he had still retained. When he arrived at the house, he was surprised to behold a great bustle—all the laborers, seven or eight in number, being gathered into the house and evidently preparing it for defence. It seems Gerry, while looking for his cows, had caught a glimpse of a crouching savage beneath a bush in the edge of the forest, and hastened immediately to the mansion to give the alarm. Rumors had a day or two before reached them of straggling parties of Indians lower down the river, who had committed their depredations, killing and burning wherever their small numbers made it possible. Discovering then in this manner, the presence of these prowlers, they knew they had no time to lose, as they were certain of an attack before day break. They were too well acquainted with the nature of their enemy, not to make the most active and energetic exertions to save their lives and families, as well as their property if possible. Most of the men had been often engaged with the same foe, and went to work with alacrity, though not without trepidation. They gathered all the families into the mansion, collected their cattle and then set to work to fortify the house. They scoured up four rusty fowling pieces that they had brought from the garret. The women were busy running bullets, and the men barricading all entrances, making conveniences for firing out of the chamber windows if necessary. The whole scene presented to the eye of Frank as he bustled round among the rest, was full of pleasurable excitement, though there was one cause of fear—for the precious jewel within the walls. He could not suffer himself to think that perhaps before morning light, her curling locks might be dangling from the belt, of a savage warrior, or she herself led into ruthless captivity, still he could not deny that there was a possibility, nay for aught he knew a probability, that such might be the case. As these thoughts intruded themselves, he felt that he would have faced a whole tribe in her defence, and think her safety cheaply bought with the poor sacrifice of his life.

Although the men suspected that the band which were lurking for their destruction could be but small, they knew that the danger was imminent, and that the greatest exertion and firmness was necessary. Mr. D. was continually among his men, consulting and co-operating with them. It was considerably past midnight when they had completed the necessary preparations, and they now waited in anxious suspense for the attack which they were sure would be made before morning. Frank now retired to an inner room to have one more interview with her towards whom, since the appearance of this unexpected danger, all his meditations had been directed. He found her in tears, though he soon ascertained that it was no selfish emotion. Seating himself by her side, Frank took her hand gently in his, and drawing her closer to him, imprinted a kiss upon her pale cheek, while he parted the dishevelled locks from her forehead. Do not fear, Mary, he said, the Being who has brought us to enjoy so many bright hours together, and who has protected us thus far, he will protect us from these savages, trusting my fate to Him, I will do all in your defence which mortal can do. Mary looked into his face with tearful eyes—you will not, you cannot expose yourself to the merciless attack of these monsters? oh, do not go, remain here with me, our men are sufficient to protect the house. That is impossible, Frank replied, I cannot remain inactive while the house of my benefactor and most of all while you are in danger. Only say that your prayers shall accompany me and I will trust in God to escape unhurt. But should it please him that my life should be given up and you preserved, say that sometimes you will reflect with sorrow upon the fate of the young stranger who would have lived to bless, but died to save you. In all their previous intimacy there scarcely a day had passed without betraying by looks and token the mutual feelings which neither attempted to conceal, yet hitherto as if by a tacit agreement that had never talked about or confessed in words their attachments. But now when a few hours might separate them forever, Frank felt that such a declaration from her own lips would nerve him to the combat and prepare him for any change. When he thus addressed her, pressing her hand warmly in his, she looked at him with glistening eyes not knowing what she said could only reply "I will, I will." At this moment all further conversation was cut short by a yell that arose on every side of the mansion at once, the startling demoniac howl of the savages. He elapsed her in his arms, and after a lingering embrace and a long and clinging pressure of the lips, he burst away and joined the men. The band of prowlers that now rushed upon the house numbered a little less than a dozen. They had laid their scheme so as to attack the house at every entrance at the same time. What was then their disappointment and rage to find every entrance fortified, and their intended victims in preparation for their attack. To the main entrance where the men had principally stationed themselves, there came four or five savages rushing on with shouts and yells directly towards the door; the fiend like expression of the countenance plainly visible in the moonlight. Among them was one who seemed to be their chief, who was conspicuous for his height and boldness, as well as by a large white sash around his waist. Having in a moment gained the door, they were thrown into confusion and indecision by the unexpected bar to their progress and while they were huddling together to make a united effort to force an entrance; four or five shots were discharged into their midst. They ran off, yelling with rage, and dragging the bodies of two of their comrades after them. By this time those who had attempted the attack on other sides of the house had retreated and joined the rest. For half an hour no more noise was heard by those within the house, and nothing stirring in sight, but they watched the more guardedly as they were confident, the Indians would employ next some cunning stratagem. Accordingly after a time several dark bodies were discovered crawling along towards the place of their first attack, but extremely slowly and keeping behind fences or any thing in their way to protect them from the fire of the men, the bitter effects of which they had once felt.—At another wing of the house was an entrance over which was raised a small roof forming a little room which joined upon the house, though not so firmly but that it might be easily separated. By climbing upon this little roof access to the windows above might be easily gained. This was too tempting advantage for the Indians to overlook or despise. Accordingly Frank happening to be near this station with Gerry at his side, they kept a sharp lookout and were soon aware of 4 or 5 savages carefully approaching in the shadow of the building towards this very place. They saw at once that their design would be probably to force themselves into the house above having been so signally disappointed in doing so below. Occasionally shots were now fired by the men from the place where the main body often had stationed themselves, and returned by the savages. Frank and his companion were now at no loss to conceive that the attack of the Indians on that side where the firing then was, was a mere feint to draw away the attention of the besieged from those who were approaching the other side. Gerry was for calling the men immediately to this place but Frank had a plan of his own in view, which he imparted to his companion, by which they could if they succeeded accomplish their purpose of defence better alone and in silence.—This was to strew a large quantity of powder upon the floor of the little outer room and as their situation enabled them to work unseen while at the same time they could notice every movement of the assailants, nothing was easier than to wait till the roof was covered with their enemies and blow the whole room to atoms. You are right, Frank, exclaimed Gerry and in a few moments the necessary preparations were made. In this state of things they waited in silence looking anxiously for the opportunity to bring on this catastrophe which was not long wanting, for soon a lifted head peered over the edge of the roof and then the body of a savage was drawn carefully up and successively another and a third till there were five dark forms crouching as they undoubtedly supposed unseen upon the roof. At this moment they all gave an instantaneous shout and rushed for the window. But it was their death-song, for in a moment they were all flying in the air and dropping mangled and dismembered and a heap of ruin. The explosion was so violent that it jarred the whole house, as if it were all going, but did no real injury. Frank was momentarily stunned and thrown upon the ground.—Here let us revert to our heroine. Impelled by her anxiety on account of her father and Frank, she was just passing from the door where we left her, and opened the door in time to see Frank fall, as she supposed dead to the floor. Unconscious of danger at such a moment, she rushed up to him and Frank a minute or two after awoke from the stunning effect of the explosion to see the tall chief, yet conspicuous by his sash, in the act of seizing Mary in his grasp, while another was already coping with Gerry. In a moment Frank was on his feet as lively as ever, besides his pistols, he had no arms except a large old sword which had been found in the house and which he had buckled on almost in sport. He rushed upon the savage who kept him off with his knife and kept retreating his object, appearing to carry off his prey at all hazard.—Frank could not use his pistols fearing to wound the captive instead of the enemy and his sword he could hardly use and every attempt to grapple with his savage opponent was defeated by the brandishing of his knife. But he was not inclined to act only on the defensive, he drew a tomahawk from his belt, and hurling it at our hero, he saw the movement just in time to spring aside, as it went whistling by his ear and clashing through the window beyond. Still Frank pressed him closely and as the savage made a desperate lunge at him with his knife, he returned the complement if not with equal skill at least with equal effect, by fetching a quick sweep of his hanger upon the outstretched arm of the savage. The arm fell dangling at his side and the knife dropping to the ground. Frank snatched the knife and seized the savage by the throat. A tremendous oath was uttered by the seeming Indian in plain English, as he felt his arm disabled, and relinquishing his prey he grasped Frank also by the throat and with his other hand attempted to throw him to the ground. In a twinkling, the knife was in his breast, to the hilt, and as he staggered back, Frank repeated the blow, which proved a settler, and his enemy lay upon the ground at the side of her who was a minute before his captive. All this passed much quicker than I have related it, and as it had all been done under the shade of the house, and in comparative silence, and moreover as each one was busy with his own enemy, Frank had as we have seen been obliged to fight it out unassisted. But at this moment Gerry came up to him, pointing at the body of the Indian with whom he had been engaged, on the ground, though by the blood that trickled down his face, it seemed that he had been less fortunate than Frank in escaping un wounded.—"The Indian dog," says he. "We had a tough one, but my old Barlowe settled the job for him at last."—They both now carried the insensible Mary into the house, as several more savages were already rushing to the scene of the explosion. The men within were drawn by the same circumstance to the place where Frank and Gerry, had been placed and comprehended the whole at a glance. They made short work of the rest. The savages had all collected on this side of the house, not more than four or five in the whole, and were decisive whether to flee or make another attack, when the men rushed out without ceremony, discharging a volley that swept off half their number, and the rest fled without so much as remaining to return the fire. They had now no more fears, and gathering up several bodies of their foes that were lying stretched around, they returned within the house happy and thankful for their great deliverance. The Indian chief was still alive though bleeding profusely and in a faint voice, and much to their astonishment, and in good English, requested to be laid upon a bed, and requesting the presence of Mr. D—alone, the old gentleman went in wondering at all this, but still more at what followed. 'You see before you, he said, though in the guise and the company of savages, one whom you have known in former times, and who is now paying the penalty of wrongs committed upon you and yours. You cannot have forgotten Serle,'—and as if the name recalled even to his own mind, anguish that was overpowering, he sank back for a while exhausted, but soon regaining strength he recalled the whole history of his former plots and his subsequent joining with the Indians. He was passing through this place with his company of Indians on a predatory excursion, when he by chance saw Mr. D—, and at once knew him. He had induced his Indian followers to attack the house, intending to avenge himself fully for all former slights, by destroying the house and getting possession of the daughter, which was his chief object. But he was now a dying man and had only time to ask forgiveness of Mr. D—, and go to a higher tribunal. We have no more to relate except to say that Frank spent all his vacations till he graduated at the house of Mr. D—, and having acquired his profession, he became himself master of the house which retained the same fair mistress it had previously possessed.

CHARACTER.

For the American Masonic Register and Literary Companion,
YOUTH.

Youth is the time for improvement, for strict mental discipline—and for the acquisition of nameless other requisites, which tend directly to form the character, and lay a solid permanent foundation for future eminence either in the religious or literary world. The importance of its being accomplished in the spring time of life when the youthful mind is susceptible of the least impression, every intelligent person is fully aware. Every day experience teaches us that the age of manhood, amid troubles, anxieties, and perplexing cares, is not a proper time for the cultivation of those talents which have been assigned us; but for the application of them to whatever profession or business we may pursue. I would not be understood to say, that improvement cannot be made by those advanced in age; but that this should in a great measure be done before he launches upon the tempestuous sea of life—before he knows what it is to depend upon himself for support. If the youth neglects this, there is great probability he will fall a prey to the fascination of glittering toys, and pomp of the world, when he shall have arrived at a more mature age, and its length be swallowed up in the vortex with scarcely time to take a farewell conscience smiting look at his spent hours.

It is evident the young will never advance one step towards mental cultivation unless they rightly value time, unless they feel the importance of improving it as it should be. The youth whose mind is bent on pleasure, whose whole time is spent in the pursuit of it, thinks not his wasted hours will cause a pang when old age shall come upon him. He does not reflect that the wheel of time is swiftly rolling him onward to the grave, that resting place of all mortals. If he did, what a change would there be in his conduct—what a change would there be in the conduct of all our youths. The evanescent toys and pleasures which so much engaged their attention would be totally abolished. The fascinating charms that are so strongly wound around their hearts, and are as dear to them as their life-blood, would be snapped and scattered to the four winds of heaven. Who does not at once perceive the happy change that would be wrought to the community at large—who does not see that this world would be very nearly allied to that paradise above? Instead of groping in ignorance, the blazing light of truth would fling its radiance into every corner of the earth. Error and superstition would vanish like shadows beneath a vertical sun. But how different is the case. This heavenly picture is but a representation of what may be, if promptitude of action becomes our most distinguishing characteristic. Go visit him who well nigh numbers four score and ten,

Who never had a dozen thoughts
In all his life. And never changed their course;
But told them o'er, each in its customary place,
From morn till night, from youth to hoary age,
Little above the ox that grazed the field,
His reason rose; so weak his memory,
The name his mother called him by, he scarce
Remembered;——Pollok.

I say, visit such an one, and he will present to you a picture of age without youthful improvement—a dreary barren life devoid of all those fine feelings which elevate the soul and draw out the affections of the heart in their greatest intenseness towards a Supreme Being. This is the deplorable condition of an innumerable number even in this our enlightened land. Who will pretend to deny but that these ignorant men, if they had etched in the buoyant part of life, this inestimable sentence upon their hearts—time is precious—might have superceded Franklin or Newton in disclosing to the world the beauties of natural philosophy. They did as many are now doing, amassing their wealth, devoting themselves to pleasure, and I may even add, intoxication—all of which are strong barriers to the entrance of knowledge, and more particularly the true gospel religion.

The difficulties which may plead why they do not adorn their minds and advance in intellectual education are more imaginary than real. Among the excuses, poverty stands at the head, though it is indeed the last and least apology that should be made. This objection will vanish it seems to me by a mere cursory glance at those who have risen from this state to places of eminence and trust. Jonas King the great traveller, and divine, whose name is known to a great extent throughout the United States and very extensively in the Eastern continent, was the son of poverty. His parents were severely burdened with indigence, yet they were destined to send forth a son penniless and destitute of all the necessities of life to become a shining ornament in the world. Poverty was no obstruction to him—no hindrance to the cultivation of his mental powers—he went forward with an impetus, every young man should, and is now promulgating the glad tidings of salvation to the benighted heathen. In the early part of his life we see him travelling miles to obtain an education without one friend to aid him, and relying solely upon the charity of the teacher to whom he had introduced himself. This is the manner in which that noble man first commenced his career, and similar to this have many of our most distinguished personages. Horace was born in an obscure little cottage in Venusia now called Venosa, near Rome. Poverty attended him for a long time, and after struggling through innumerable difficulties he became a prominent character at the court of the king. He found time to compose his admirable odes, even with the multitude of duties at court attending upon him. Shakespeare carried this mark of genius. He was the son of a butcher, and in his youth scene-shifter to a theatre; but soon after he swayed the stage with his inimitable productions.

Milton, through want, was compelled to sell his Paradise Lost for the paltry sum of five pounds. Franklin rose from a printer's boy to the immortal philosopher.

Sufficient have been mentioned to establish the point, that poverty is no hindrance to mental cultivation. I will now proceed to show that poverty is generally, indeed I may say always, an advantage. The youth who is placed in affluent circumstances and rolls in wealth, does not value time—does not see the importance of an education to that extent, he would if the reverse was his lot. He places his dependence upon pedigree and money, while the other relies upon his own exertion. If you wish to spoil a child, to unfit him for all usefulness in the world, place before him the prospect of an immense fortune. Then mark with what rapidity his soul will begin to contract, what a niggardly disposition he will have. It is more than probable he will turn out a wretched spendthrift, a beggar, or something infinitely worse. In the case of Jonas King, I believe if he had not been born comparatively in a hovel, his name would never have shone with that brilliancy it now does. Wealth with her train of joys was not made for him, the gay living of a court was not for him, the flattery and applauses of the mob did not meet his ear, nor did they impede his onward march to fame. His labors were not confined to this nation; but he attempted to plant the standard of the king under whom he fought upon the very spot where he was rejected and despised when upon earth. He sat down by the cold streams of Babylon where the harp of the captive Jew was hung upon the willow, and wept like a child. The trembling hand of the afflicted Israelite could not sweep from its strings the heavenly melody of better, happier days. 'He could not sing one of Zion's songs, for the effort woke within him affecting remembrances of home, and native land. He wept when he remembered Zion.' He visited that once magnificent city, Jerusalem, in its ruins; and preached where Paul the apostle raised his voice. This is the same man that relied upon the charity and kindness of others for support. This is the same man that was born in yonder dwelling of poverty. Would that many such habitations might send forth a Jonas King. If we look the world through, we shall see that nearly all who have woven a wealth of fame for their brows, have arisen from very low circumstances.

THE GATHERER.

EFFECTS OF LAUGHTER ON THE CIRCULATION OF THE BLOOD.

The deep inspirations and the short and frequent expirations made in the act of laughing, have a direct influence on the heart, increasing the quantity of blood within its cavities in the same manner as the quantity within these is increased by muscular contractions. This condition of the heart, as might be anticipated, will vary in proportion to the violence and duration of the paroxysms of laughter. When these are moderate, the mind is only exhilarated, or, to use a common expression, 'the heart becomes joyful;' but if laughing be increased or prolonged beyond certain limits, a series of effects, more or less injurious, frequently supervene. Pain in the cardiac region and headache then come on, and if the paroxysms be immoderate, the quantity of blood propelled into the brain is such, that the intellectual powers become greatly excited, and sometimes to such a degree as to cause their temporary aberration. Even convulsions follow immoderate fits of laughter, and I have known death take place from excessive laughter caused by titillation. A disturbed action of the heart is usually observed in those affected with hysteria, which may account for the paroxysm of laughter, the risus sardonius, the hiccup, and all the more remarkable phenomena which are characteristic of that disease. Laughter, indeed, greatly disturbs a heart already irritable. This was strikingly exemplified in a person who had a disease of the heart, and who could not indulge in laughing without the increased action of the heart by which it was accompanied, always causing violent headache.—Wardrop on Diseases of the Heart.

ROB ROY MAC GREGOR.

When this chieftain was on his death-bed a gentleman whom he had reason to consider as an enemy came to see him. On being requested to admit him to his bed-side, he said, 'No enemy shall see Rob Roy in the posture of defeat. Raise me up; put on my clothes, buckle on my arms, then admit him.' He was obeyed: the guest was received with cold civility by the dying man, and in a short time departed. 'Now' said Rob Roy—'now help me to bed and call in the piper.' The piper appeared, Rob Roy shook hands with him, and desired him to play 'Cha tuile mi tuileadh,' and not cease while he continued to breathe. He soon expired, with the voice of war pealing around him.

MISCONCEPTION.

As a canal boat was passing under a bridge, the captain gave the usual warning, 'Look out!' when a little Frenchman, who, was in the cabin obeyed the order by popping his head out of the window, which received a severe thump by coming in contact with a pillar of the bridge. He drew it back in a great pet, and exclaimed, 'Dese Americans say lookout when dey means look in.'

CRITICISM.

[The following biting criticism, is from the Southern Literary Messenger. The editor handles Willis without mittens. Willis may be said to be fairly on the road to the temple of—Brummelism.]

N. P. WILLIS.

Literary readers are, for the most part, apprised, that the gentleman whose name heads this article, (who, as a writer of both prose and poetry, has acquired no inconsiderable distinction,) has recently united with Dr. Porter in the establishment of a new periodical in New York with the title of the "Corsair." As was to be expected in that great emporium of fashion and novelty as well as of commerce, this paper, aided by the reputation of its editors, has suddenly sprung into the full maturity of patronage, and promises to hold a high rank in the well contested field of competition. In order, we presume, to render its pages more attractive, Mr. Willis embarked early in the summer for England, on a voyage of literary picarooning; and since his arrival there, has regularly supplied the "Corsair" with contributions under the somewhat untasteful title of "Jottings down in London." These consist, for the most part, of scraps and gleanings, picked up by the writer from his old familiar haunts in the English metropolis, are, many of them, strikingly descriptive of the manners, fashions, and follies of that "Great Babel." We have read them as far as No. IV., and whilst it is admitted they contain much of the force, piquancy and originality which distinguish the author's prose compositions, they are by no means free from the affectation, puerility, an egotism, that have likewise marred especially his latter writings. That we do not point out these faults and blemishes without reasonable cause, we instance, in proof of the writer's affectation, the everlasting straining after epigrammatic smartness and point, the profuse sprinkling of French and Italian quotations, and the constant introduction of phrases peculiar to particular classes and professions, which are any thing but pure English; and we certainly do not regard it as otherwise than puerile in Mr. Willis gravely to inform his readers through the pages of the "Corsair," that Count D'Orsay had formed an alliance to introduce the white cravat into fashion—that the latter's "beauty is in high preservation—his life altogether reformed—his diet milk, and is hour of retiring to bed ten o'clock, P. M." That "Lady Blessington's different carriages, are each, in their style the most beautiful turn-outs in England"—that the "Crack-men ride without martingals, and the best turn-outs are driven without a click rein"—that the queen's riding hat is not becoming, owing to the shape of her nose, and that her majesty, when in full gallop, is apt to hold her mouth open. These are but few of the very important similar items of information with which the republicans of New York are amused and enlightened. It is possible that the exquisites and "crack-men" of old Gotham may relish such diet, but for ourselves we confess that our appetites would incline us to prefer more simple and solid food.

The sin of egotism is too glaring throughout these London jottings, to escape the most careless observer. Without a superabundance of charity, a person might well suppose that the end and aim of the author was to celebrate his own achievements and illustrate his own importance in the circles of high life. Indeed Mr. Willis's personal vanity so constantly throws him into the foreground of his own pictures, that it is often unpleasant, if not painful, to contemplate them. In representing the great difficulty of procuring admission to "Almack's,"—the sanctum sanctorum of London fashion—he fails not to inform us that the Lady Patronesses (who we shrewdly suspect are a silly set of beldames,) had favored him with a ticket; nor does he conceal the boast, that in that mysterious inner temple of exclusivism, he, Mr. N. P. Willis, felt quite at home in familiar tele-a-tete with dowagers of rank and maids of honor, conversing about the busts of English and French Venuses—and the pretty ankles of American women. He is quite familiar with the highest political dignitaries—with the most renowned in art, science and literature—with most splendid in title and wealth, and the most beautiful in the empire of fashion. He sits in the opera box and chats familiarly with Lord Brougham—rides out with the beautiful count D'Orsay, (very bad company we should think)—perambulates with Bulwer—is invited to Lady Stepney's and Lady Morgan's, along with the Persian Ambassador. and his royal highness the duke of Cambridge—sits by 'Boz,' at the dinner to Macready, which is presided over by another royal duke—dines with a whig baronet and the next day with three tory lords—and, in fine, neither eats nor drinks, rides nor walks, without coming in close contact with some of the "Corinthian pillars of polished society." But one of the best of good jokes remains to be told. Our countryman, Webster, it is known, is now on a visit to London, and his great reputation has won for him, there, independently of the usual attentions paid to distinguish strangers, the particular courtesy and kindness of such men as Brougham, Hallam, Milman, &c.—and yet he, we are told, is indebted to Mr. Willis for the great favor of satisfying the higher circles that the American statesman, orator, lawyer Webster, is not Mr. Noah Webster, who wrote the Dictionary. This most interesting fact is communicated by Mr. Willis himself in No. II. of the "Jottings down in London," and the natural inference will be, let who will imagine the contrary, that Mr. Willis is a much greater man in London, than Mr. Webster is, or can ever possibly be. We confess, when we first read this self sootering paragraph from the author of "First impression in Europe." "Letters from under a bridge," &c., we could not suppress something like a smile of derision, and it was difficult to avoid the conclusion, either that Mr. Willis's last impressions were entirely erroneous, or that his associates in London high life, were a much more egregious set of nineties than we had supposed them to be. Can it be that the statesman who has so long shared the supremacy of the American Senate, from time of the war of 1812, to the present moment, should not be distinguished by intelligent Englishmen and English women from the highly respectable lexicographer of the same name?—We own, if the fact be true, it is most marvellous.

After informing us, in Jottings, No. 11, that "there are great numbers of American ladies in London, and that they seem to be good deal the fashion"—that Mrs. Van Buren's quiet and high bred manners were "run h talked of,"—and that Major Van Buren himself, like his brother, has been received quite as a prince royal—admitted to the House of Lords,"—&c. Mr. Willis makes the following unchivalrous remark: "Miss Sedgwick is here, but she seems to require a trumpet." Now we ask, in the name of charity, why did not Willis step forward and become the trumpeter of this neglected lady herself? No one better knew her distinguished claims to respect and attention; and he who could familarise with lords, and flirt with duchesses, who could even place the character and qualifications of Daniel Webster himself in their true light before London society, could have had no difficulty in trumpeting Miss Sedgwick. Cruel, unkind "Corsair!" Not only to turn your back upon your gifted countrywoman, but absolutely to wound the feelings of herself and friends by publishing a sarcasm upon her friendless condition!—Verily, Mr. Willis must suppose that no misfortune can befall man or woman, so great, as to be out of the fashion. That the elevated mind of the authoress of "Redwood" and "Hope Leslie," could sustain itself, even against the affliction of London neglect, we do not doubt; and that she would be more likely to be contaminated than improved by intimate contact with its heartless society we doubt still less. Of what materials that society is composed how frivolous, insincere, stupid and unprincipled—is abundantly shown by Mr. Willis himself in almost every page of his "Jottings."

We have now to prefer a charge against Mr. Willis of very grave import—one which we should gladly have passed over, but that our agency, humble as it is in the moral and literary censorship exercised by the American press, imposes upon us a strong obligation to notice it. It is, that in one gross instance at least, he has manifested a reckless disregard of his own reputation, by wantonly betraying to the world conversations of a private, delicate and confidential nature. That we do not venture this accusation rashly, we transcribe from Mr. Willis's own account of his sayings and doings at "Almack's."

"In the course of the evening I found myself vis-a-vis in the quadrille to the queen's most beautiful maid of honor. She is daughter of Lord Rivers, rather tall, and combining a most majestic enbonpoint of figure, with a slowness of limb, and a tenderness and stateliness of neck, seldom seen in such graceful proportion. To the three hundred pounds a year, which the maids of honor receive for dress, the queen, my partner informed me, has added another hundred, thinking the sum insufficient. You know, probably, that on their marriage they receive a dowry of one thousand pounds. Then there are the ladies in waiting, who are of the highest rank of nobility, and the bed-chamber women, who receive also three hundred pounds a year, and are generally ladies of good birth in reduced circumstances. These all take their turns of service for two months together. My pretty and noble informant gave me these household statistics, very good naturally, but between pastorale and dos-a-dos; and as she was closely connected with those who had the best chance of knowing I asked her a question or two touching the personal qualities of her majesty. She thought Victoria fancied herself very beautiful, 'which she was not decidedly,'—and that she was very impatient of a difference of opinion when in private with her ladies. She admitted, however, that she was generous, forgiving and cleverer than most girls of her age." When alone with two or three of her maids, she said the queen was 'no more like a queen than anybody else,'—and was very fond of a little fun or a bit of scandal—or any thing that would not have done if other people were present." As far as it went, I think this might be relied on as the impression her majesty makes upon those who daily associate with her."

Now, we hold it to be clear, that whether the beautiful and confiding daughter of Lord Rivers should ever be informed or not, that these revelations of palace secrets had been published to the world, Mr. Willis stands wholly unjustified in the part he has acted. Whether the young lady loses or retains her place near the queen's person for her indiscreet candor in representing majesty what it really is—a jest—the odium will nevertheless cling to Mr. Willis for having wound himself into the confidence of a credulous young girl with the deliberate design of betraying her. This is indeed a species of piracy, or plundering by the way," which however it may suit the taste or accord with the designs of a "Corsair," will merit the reproof of every honorable man, and every honorable woman too.

Before we conclude our notice of Mr. Willis and his new periodical, we will state that in No. IV of his "Jottings," he announces, that he had engaged, as "a regular correspondent of the Corsair," a Mr. Thackeray, who is styled the "cleverest and most gifted of the magazine writers of London." He is also stated to be the author of the "Yellow Flash Papers," and the "Reminiscences of Major Ghagagan"—"a writer for Frazer, and Blackwood, and the principal critic of the Times." In fact, the editor of the "Corsair" represents him as "one of the cleverest and most brilliant of periodical writers"—and when they parted, Thackeray was to pass over to Paris the day after, and forthwith commence his weekly contribution to the Corsair. Now it so happens, that the first letter of this cleverest and most brilliant of periodical writers has appeared, and we have read it through with great eagerness and vivid anticipation. How sadly are our hopes sometimes destined to be crushed! We do not find in it that evidence of superlative merit which the author of "Pencillings by the Way" would discern at a single glance. On the contrary, we think that Mr. Thackeray has much of the dandyism, affectation, and puerility of Mr. Willis himself. Let us take, for example, one or two of the concluding paragraphs in the first letter from Paris:

"What feelings we may have in finding good friends and listeners among strangers, far away—in receiving, from beyond seas kind crumbs of comfort for our hungry vanities, which at home, God, wot get little of this delightful food—in gaining fresh courage and hope, for pursuing a calling of which the future is dreary, and the present but hard. All these things, O "Corsair," had better be meditated by the author in private, than as the fashion is now-a-days, poured over yards of papers, in fluent streams of ink. With which, farewell. I hear the dinner bell ringing, and lo! white aproned scullions bear smoking soups across the court."

We doubt very much whether Mr. Thackeray will elevate the literary tone of this country, which is now low enough, Heavens knows. He belongs to that school, we apprehend, whose sole ambition it is to minister to the frivolous tastes and appetites of the most frivolous and fantastic class among us—the literature as well as in dress and manners. Strong sense and classical refinement he may have; and doubtless has. But we are afraid, like a great many others, he looks upon literature as a trade, and speculates far more upon the amount of pleasure he is to give, than the good he is to do. Let us not, however, prejudice this "regular correspondent of the 'Corsair.'" Some of his subsequent efforts may justify the high sounding notes of praise with which his first appearance before the American public has been heralded.

We have thus indulged in free, but we hope impartial commentary upon Mr. Willis's metropolitan gossip. We have no expectation, however, that any arrow which we can speed, will even ruffle his plumage. Like the peacock in his stately strut, the gentleman is evidently so much in love with himself that even keener reproached than ours would fail to disturb his composure. We leave him, therefore, to his destiny, consoling ourself with the reflection, that our remarks may possibly benefit others if not the author of "Joltings Down in London."

AMERICAN MASONIC REGISTER.

ALBANY, SATURDAY, NOV. 2, 1839.

ULTRAISM.—We Yankees may truly be said, to abound in notions. We are ultra in politics, ultra in religion, ultra in temperance, and in fact we are ultra in almost every thing under the sun. It is this ultraism which destroys us. If any kind or philanthropic object is started, no matter what be its public utility, ultraism immediately rears its hydra head, and clogs its operations, until those who really entered into its measures with clean hands and pure hearts, are often compelled to abandon it in disgust. Temperance commenced in the reformation of the drunkard, but its usefulness became nearly paralyzed by the overzealous destruction of orchards, and the quixotic crusade against sacramental wine. Then, again, the reformation of epicureans was followed by Graham's saw dust bread and bran puddings—and the female ultraists, determined not to be out done, about this time commenced an uncompromising war against confections and cakes at their social parties. All these things have had their day, and like other worn out rattles have been thrown aside for new ones. These remarks have suggested themselves, from reading certain resolutions and proceedings of the "Non-Resistance Society" of Boston. This society convened last month, and was in session for three days. Members were present from all the New England states; as likewise many from New York, Pennsylvania and Ohio. The Troy Mail, in speaking of the society, facetiously observes, that the mixture of genders among the members in attendance seemed to be the most remarkable event recorded.—Mr. L. Capron, was appointed President, and Maria W. Chapman, Recording Secretary, for the year.

The meeting resolved, that all penal codes are a nullification of the precepts of Christ—that man was never made to govern man—that every man who takes part, by voting or otherwise, in the civil government of this country, does a very naughty thing—that navies and armies ought to be done away with, and the militia system abolished—(in the last of which opinions we entirely concur)—all of which are duly recommended to the adoption of man and woman kind at large. Such are the sentiments and conclusions of another branch of the family of Ultraists.

Posting.—"Whereas, my wife Mary, has left me and my house, &c. This is to forbid all persons, &c."

"Whereas, my husband has published that I Mary have left his house, &c. I told the woman he has living with him, that I should not stay, &c."

The above is the substance of two advertisements published in an exchange paper. We have always thought that the editors of newspapers were criminally culpable in publishing advertisements of this kind without a strict examination into the merits of the case. Nine tenths of the cases, will turn out, that some poor broken hearted wife is obliged as her last resort, to leave the bed and board of her husband, driven away by the concubinage or something else of him who has sworn to "love, protect and cherish her," as appears to be in the present instance. It is true, there are cases, where it may necessary for a man to post his wife, for his safety—but such cases are rare. There are nine worthless husbands to one bad wife, and if the press would make it a rule never to add injury to outrage until the truth was known, it would add to their credit, and be the means of affixing the brand to the right forehead.

The Woodstock (N. B.) Times of the 12th inst. informs us that Colonel Mudge and Mr. Featherstonough, have concluded their exploration through the disputed territory, and have proceeded to Quebec.—The party attached to the expedition have returned. Nothing has transpired, says the Times, that can be fully depended on, as to the result of their investigation; but adds, as the rumor that no highlands corresponding to the terms of the treaty have been discovered except at the source of the Penobscot, where they are said to be "decidedly visible."—No doubt!

To Correspondents.—The "Impromptu" of a subscriber, shall have a place.

The Christian Harp—is a neat little work which has been sent to us, containing Hymns and Spiritual Songs—with appropriate music, adapted to the use of families and praying circles, and to the various meetings of religious worship, recognized by the different denominations of christians; the music arranged for two and three voices. It is published by Charles Dingley, of New-York, once a month, at 12½ cents per number, or $1 per annum.

Installation.—The Rev. Thomas E Vermilye, D. D. late of this city, was installed into office, as one of the pastors of the Collegiate church, of the city of New York, on Sabbath evening 20th.

A Philadelphia paper states that a child was recently frightened to death, by the foolery of its inconsiderate parents. The father and mother were committed to prison for murder.

The Washington Globe says, that orders have been given to prepare a sloop of war, and a schooner, with all possible dispatch, for cruising on the coast of Africa, in execution of the laws of the United States against the disgraceful traffic in slaves, and for the protection of our lawful commerce in that quarter.

The Pickwick papers have been translated into the Russian language.

☞ We have complied with the request of Scrope.

There was subscribed in New Orleans, up to the 13th inst. the sum of $2,811 75, for the relief of the Mobile sufferers.

Mr. COOPER has a new work in the press, to be called the Path Finder, or our Inland Seas. Natty Bumppo, says the U. S. Gazette, will be introduced in all the vigor of youth, and touched by the tender passion.

The health of New Orleans is not considered sufficiently re-established to invite the unacclimated to come back; nor will it be till really cold weather sits in. It Natchez it continued severe. In Augusta there is some abatement.

MARRIED.

By the Rev. Jacob Leonard, jr., in this city, on the 22d inst. Charles B. Gay, of this city, to Lucretia Johnson, daughter of the late Jacob Johnson, of Schodack.

THE HINDOO MOTHER.

Where a soft stream ran murmuring by
A Hindoo mother stood,
She gazed with deep and steadfast eye
Into the silvery flood.

She looked upon the lovely babe
That slumber'd in her arms,
And could she throw it in the stream
And part with all its charms?

But to appease the gods she must,
Her own dear child destroy;
But see! the babe smiles—'tis a dream,
His face lit up with joy.

And could she gaze on him so fair,
Those eyes of placid blue;
Yes—but 'twas with an idiot stare,
For now she nothing knew.

Thus here the unhappy mother stood,
With madness in her eye,
The stream seem'd to know her destiny,
As it gently passed her by.

Ere she one thought gave to the babe,
She dashed it from the shore,
Then gave one loud and maniac laugh,
And sank to rise no more.

FLORA.

TO THE AUTUMN FOREST.

BY WILLIAM J. PEABODY.

Resplendent hues are thine!
Triumphant beauty—glorious as brief!
Burdening with holy love the heart's pure shrine,
Till tears afford relief.

What tho' the depths be hushed!
More eloquent in breathless silence thou,
Than when the music of glad songsters gushed
From every green-robed bough.

Gone from thy walks the flowers!
Thou askest not their forms thy paths to flock;
The dazzling radiance of these sunlit bowers
Their hues could not bedeck.

I love thee in the spring,
Earth crowning forest! when amid the shades
The gentle South first waves her odorous wing,
And joy fills all the glades.

In the hot summer time,
With deep delight thy sombre aisles I roam
Or, soothed by some cool brook's melodious chime,
Rest on thy verdent loam.

But O, when Autumn's hand
Hath marked thy beauteous foliage for the grave,
How doth thy splendor, as entranced I stand,
My willing heart enslave!

I linger then with thee,
Like some fond lover o'er his stricken bride;
Whose bright, unearthly beauty tell that she
Here may not long abide.

When my last hours are come,
Great God! ere yet life's span shall all be filled,
And these warm lips in death be over dumb,
This beating heart be stilled,—

Bathe thou in hues as blest—
Let gleams of Heaven about my spirit play!
So shall my soul to its eternal rest,
In glory pass away!

WHAT IS SOLITUDE?

BY C. F. HOFFMAN.

Not in the shadowy wood,
Not in the rock-ribbed glen,
Not where the sleeping echoes brood

In caves untried by men;
Not by the sea-swept shore
Where loitering surges break,
Not on the mountain hoar,
Not by the breathless lake,
Not on the desert plain
Where man hath never stood,
Whether on isle or main—
Not there is Solitude.

There are birds in the woodland bowers,
Voices in lonely dells,
And streams that to the list'ning hours
In earth's most secret cells;
There is life on the foam-decked sand,
By the ocean's curling lip,
And life on the still lake's strand
Mid the flowers that o'er it dip;
There is life in the rocking pines,
That sigh on the mountain's crest,
And life in the courser's mane that shines
As he cours the desert's breast.

But go to the crowded mart,
Mid the busy haunts of men;
Go there and ask thy heart—
What answer makes it then?
Ay, go where wealth is flinging
Her golden lures around—
Where the trump of Fame is ringing—
Where Pleasure's wiles abound:
Go, if thou wouldst be lonely,
Where the phantom, Love, is wooed,
And own there, there only,
Midst crowds is Solitude.

JOY.

Joy is a bird!
Catch it as it springs;
It will return no more
When once it spreads its wings.
Its song is gay but brief
The voice of sunny weather;
But, ah! the bird and leaf
Vanish both together.

Joy is a flower!
Pluck it in its bloom;
'Twill close its petals up
If darker skies should gloom.
It is a lovely thing,
And formed for sunny weather;
But, ah! the flower and spring
Vanish both together,

Joy is a child!
Seize it in its mirth;
For soon its lip will know
The withering taint of earth.
The eye is bright as truth,
A type of sunny weather;
But, ah! the smile and youth
Vanish both together!

THE HISTORY OF LIFE.

I saw an infant in its mother's arms,
And left it sleeping:
Years passed, I saw a girl with woman's charms,
In sorrow weeping.
Years passed—I saw a mother with her child,
And o'er it languish:
Years bro't me back, yet thro' her tears she smiled
In deeper anguish.
I left her—years had vanished—I returned.
And stood before her;
A lamp beside the childless widow burned—
Grief's mantle o'er her.
In tears I found her whom I left in tears,
On God relying;
And I returned again in after years,
And found her dying—
An infant first, and then a maiden fair—
A wife—a mother—
And then, a childless widow, in despair!—
Thus met a brother.

GEORGE BRUCE & CO.

New York, Sept. 1839.

SHERIFF'S OFFICE.—City and county of Albany, August 7, 1839.

ELECTION NOTICE.—A general election is to be held in the county of Albany on the 4th, 5th, and 6th, days of November next at which will be chosen the officers mentioned in the notice from the Secretary of State, of which a copy is annexed.

MICHAEL ARTCHER, Sheriff,
State of New York, Secretary's Office,
Albany, Aug. 15, 1839.

Sir—Notice is hereby given that the term of service of James Powers, a Senator of the Third Senate District of this state will expire on the last day of December next, and that a senator is to be chosen in that district, to which the county of which you are sheriff belongs, at the general election to be held on the fourth, fifth and sixth days of November next.

You will also take notice, that a vacancy has been caused in the representation of the Third Senate District, by the death of Noadiah Johnson, a senator from that district, whose term of office would have expired on the last day of December, 1840; and that a senator to supply the said vacancy is to be chosen at the said next general election.

You will also take notice, that a proposed amendment to the constitution is to be submitted to the people at the said election, at which the electors are to vote. "For the election of Mayors by the People," or "Against the election of Mayors by the People." At the same election the following officers are to be chosen, viz: Three members of Assembly.

JOHN C. SPENCER, Secretary of State.

N.B. You are to give notice of the aforesaid election, in writing to one of the inspectors of each town and ward in your county, and annex thereto a copy of this notice. You are also to publish the said notice and copy in all the public newspapers printed in your county.

ELECTION NOTICE.—Sheriff's Office, City and County of Albany, October 11, 1839. Notice is hereby given that at the next general election to be held in the county of Albany on the 4th, 5th, & 6th days of November next, a Senator is to be chosen to represent the Third Senate District in the Senate of this State in the place of Edward P. Livingston, resigned; and that three Senators are to be chosen at the said election to represent the said Third Senate District, according to a notice from the Secretary of State, of which a copy is annexed.

MICHAEL ARTCHER, Sheriff.

STATE OF NEW-YORK.

SECRETARY'S OFFICE, Albany, Oct. 11, 1839.
To the Sheriff of the County of Albany—

Sir: Notice is hereby given you that since the general notice of election was issued from this office, on the 15th day of August last, a vacancy has happened in the representation of the Third District, by the resignation of Edward P. Livingston, a Senator from that district, whose term of office would have expired on the last day of December 1841; and that a Senator to supply the said vacancy is to be chosen at the next general election, to be held on the 4th, 5th, and 6th days November next.

There are therefore three Senators to be chosen in the Third Senate District, (comprising among others the county of which you are Sheriff,) at the next general election, viz: one in the place of James Powers, whose term of service will expire on the last day of December next; one in the place of Noadiah Johnson, deceased; and one in the place of Edward P. Livingston, resigned.

JOHN C. SPENCER, Secretary of State.

N. B. You are to give notice of the above-mentioned election in writing to one of the inspectors of each town and ward in your county, and to annex thereto a copy of his notice. You are also to publish such notice and copy in all public newspapers printed in your county.

EXTRACTS.

From an address delivered before the Grand Lodge of South Carolina, fifty five years ago.

Freemasonry is an institution of very remote antiquity: it is the growth of no clime; it has flourished in all parts of the globe; it is understood in every language; indeed it may emphatically be called the language of human nature. While governments founded in fraud; deception, or injustice, have been swept away by the revolutionary hand of time; while whole nations have either disappeared, or have so changed by great natural or political convulsions, as not now to be traced; freemasonry, like a venerable fabric founded on the strong and unshakable pillars of piety, charity and benevolence, has stood the test of time, resisted the shock of ages. Such have been the benefits to mankind from this admirable institution, that while all others have in their turns experienced the wrath of arbitrary governments, freemasonry, upheld by conscious innocence and the universal reputation of its merit, has ever escaped the ruffian fangs of tyranny and the lawless gripe of anarchy. When ruthless despots, aware that masonic principles opposed a barrier to their fierce ambition, and eager to establish their tyranny on the ruins of virtue and philanthropy, have attempted to abolish freemasonry within their dominions, they have soon found it so deep rooted in the affections of the people, as to be compelled to forego their detestable designs.

This preservation of our Order for so many ages, through so many dangers and revolutions, and so great a portion of the world: while it must inspire us with the liveliest gratitude to the great Architect of the universe, cannot fail to warm our breasts with the purest sentiments of attachment to it, and to prompt us to the exercise of all those virtues which have constituted its basis and conducted to its permanency.

Charity is the brightest jewel in the masonic temple: it is a virtue which more than any other must assimilate man to his beneficent Creator: it opens the heart to the divine effusions of unlimited sympathy and benevolence, and rubs off that rust which would gather around it and corrode every exquisite sensation. But it is a virtue of reflection as well as of feelings; in the due exercise of it, reason, no less than impulse, has its duty to perform; these should be properly tempered and balanced, for while, on the one hand, cold reflection ought not at all times to bemb the generous exertions of an amiable impulse, so, on the other, ought not an ardent sensibility to stimulate to an improper lavishment of that which might be wanted for more fit occasion. Happy is it for us, my brethren, that the bountiful hand of nature has been so prodigal of its blessings to this country; that the calls on human commiseration are, perhaps, less frequent here than in any part of the world. In this young and flourishing nation, industry can scarcely fail to be rewarded with a decent competency; and idleness ought ever to meet a freemason's frowns. Still, even in this fruitful land, poverty and distress will sometimes await the aged and the infirm: there will also be some, who, in spite of the utmost exertions of a laudable industry, will be overtaken by unavoidable misfortune: these, with the unfortunate brethren of other climes, who seek among us a shelter from transatlantic miseries, will claim and will always receive the benevolent aid of our society.

Before I quit this subject, I will mention one species of charity, which though not of the passive kind, though not a positive but a negative virtue, is notwithstanding, attended with great social benefits: I mean that kind of charity, which restrains us from thinking too unfavorably of each other, the neglect of this virtue has often been the source of great disorder: mankind are but too prone to indulge an uncharitable disposition, to ascribe the worst views and motives to those who differ from them in the occurrences of life: this imputation of sinister designs produces an acrimonious state of society, and begets divisions, productive of social misery and public unhappiness. In the organization of the human mind, and in the structure of civil society, was it not intended that there should exist a variety of opinion? And when these neither disturb the public order nor endanger the public welfare, should not candor give credit to others for the same purity of views which we are conscious of possessing ourselves?

A scrupulous adherence to our engagement is a high masonic virtue; a strict observance of good faith between man and man enlivens the toilsome path of business and makes our duties easy and pleasant; whereas captious and evasive practices add fresh burthens to our labors, and obstruct us with difficulties, far greater than those naturally incident to ordinary operations of trades and professions. As there is no being more despicable than a tricky character, one who is always on the watch to overreach his neighbor and take advantage of his credulity, and indulgence, so is there none more respectable than an honest and industrious mechanic, who maintains and educates his family, benefits mankind by his work and his example, and honorably fulfils his engagements. Such a citizen is indeed far more useful to society, than many of a different description, frequently and improperly called gentlemen.

From the contemplation of these domestic and neighborly virtues, allow me to lead your minds to the sublime contemplation of a virtue, which acts on a more enlarged theatre, and swells the bosom to a more comprehensive scope of reflection.

You will readily perceive that love of our country is the noble sentiment alluded to. A good freemason must be a good patriot; but patriotism, like many other virtues, has been so often prostituted by the ridiculous mummeries and wicked artifices of impostors, that it is necessary to discriminate between genuine and spurious patriotism.

When I speak therefore of this virtue, I mean not that mock patriotism, which in all ages, and in all free countries, has been seized on by the ambitions as a cloak to cover base and insidious designs; which bedecked with the alluring grab of tinsel jargon, has been assumed to conceal the foulest purposes; which under the mask of hypocrisy, and with the parade of pompous language, has ever found subservient to the most despicable and selfish views; which, at one time, has been employed as a stepladder to power, and at another, as an engine of destruction to rival popular and obnoxious competitors: I mean not that mock patriotism, which has been the siren song of seduction of the knaves to cajole and ensnare the fools: I mean not that satire on patriotism, which blazons its own merits in ranting declamation and frothy professions, which draws from time out of none existence little ephemeral insects, which glitter for a moment in the glare of their own creation, and then dissolve into their original nothingness. I mean not that profanation of patriotism, which, while it utters from the lips the most precious and pious eja-culations for the public weal, impiously bears in the heart the most atrocious designs against public tranquility, and national independence. But I mean that heavenborn patriotism, which announces itself in deeds of public utility; which delights in the maintenance of law, in the support of order, in respect for the magistracy, enforcing, by precept and by example, every moral and religious practice; which displays itself in habits of industry and frugality, in virtuous education of one's family, and in the faithful performance of all the relative duties of a man and citizen.

Enlarging still further his views, every good freemason should embrace, in his system of philanthropy, the whole human race; universal benevolence should share in his breast a place with those social affections, which are of a more local complexion.

This expansive and magnanimous philanthropy will of course excite him, while he delights in his own domestic prospect to invoke the divine protection for those unhappy nations, which are now desolated by the scourge of war, and public calamity; and to implore the Almighty Ruler of the universe, to stay the avenging sword, and to restore peace, liberty and happiness, to so many millions of our miserable fellow creatures.

Finally, my brethren, let me exhort your proper attention to your religious duties. Religion, were it not even inculcated by our Divine Master, would recommend itself to all enlightened men and civilized societies by the purity of its precepts and the excellence of its practices. Religion, by softening the manners and subduing the unruly passions, unites mankind in the bond of brotherly love, and, like freemasonry, constitutes a most salutary and durable cement to society. Do we not learn from history, that in proportion as nations have receded from the principles and practice of religion, they have advanced to ferociousness or relapsed into barbarism? And in our own country, it is not undeniable that in proportion as religion sheds its benign influence over society, do justice, order, and felicity prevail?

I have now rapidly passed over some of the most prominent features in this beautiful system of moral freemasonry. To have enumerated them all, or to have dwelt more minutely on those that have been selected, would have exhausted your patience. You will have observed, my brethren, that to accomplish the views of the Great Artificer of the world, and to be approved as true and perfect freemasons, you have many important duties to perform; you will likewise have observed, that beginning within a circle of the more domestic and social duties, your bosoms must dilate to the more enlarged circle of the public duties you owe to your country; and that, not confining your affections even there, the heart must afterwards expand to the spacious circle of human nature and, swell with emotions of universal love and benevolence. A due cultivation of these virtues will invigorate the cementing principle of brotherly love, which is the grand basis of freemasonry; for nothing is more true, "that the better men are, the more they love one another." The practice of these virtues, will also smooth away those asperities, which are found in the vale of life, and make us glide more gently down it, to that future state of bliss, which a life so spent will insure us.

Thus having fulfilled the purposes of your creation, and done honor to the inestimable principles of this institution, you will, by approving yourselves good freemasons, at the same time approve yourselves good men, good citizens, and good christians.

CHARACTER.

For the American Masonic Register and Literary Companion,
YOUTH.

There are indeed many other things beside penury which exert an unhappy influence, and which it would be inexpedient to mention here. Every one who has come to the fixed determination to have a liberal education must make up his mind to meet with many opposing obstacles, and disappointments. To every one disappointments will occur. They will meet man in every condition of life, whether in the parlor or at the plough, whether in high or low circumstances. They are as necessary as our very existence. The man who ploughs through the surges of disappointment that are continually rolling upon him, and rides triumphant like the ship that obeys her helm in a storm deserves far more credit than he who repines and murmurs at the dispensations of Providence. There is no least shadow of doubt, but that intellectual advancement is far more rapid under their influence. They may properly be compared to the hand of the polisher which rubs the gold that it may become brighter and shine with more lustre. In these conflicts a man must have some goal, some point upon which to fix his eye, or he will fall a prey to them. At sea the inexperienced mariner dares not look down from the main-top upon the turbid swelling waves, lest his giddy brain plunge him into them; but he looks look and holds fast—so with the youth: he must not aloft at the difficulties and trials around him and beneath him, but look aloft and cling to. Many are apt to think when they are visited in this manner that it is their lot to be miserable in the world, and they lie down like the lamb before the wolf and are devoured; whereas if they would put on a peaceful mind and a calm resignation all things would redound to their benefit and pass by leaving a rich blessing. The above remarks are of peculiar importance to the young, especially if they desire to obtain a liberal education. It is true, it is a decision of character, and it is the duty of every one to be possessed of this; if they are, all the mountains that are made of petty troubles would diminish into mole-hills. The world would be one smooth surface like the untroubled sea where every bark might glide peacefully and calmly into the haven of rest. I have thus far enumerated the impediments attending a course of instruction. I shall in conclusion confine myself to the course to be taken in acquiring it.

The youth's object, like the patriots of old, should be the welfare of all. He should grasp the whole world, and aim at its prosperity in all he does and says for it is the world for which he lives, it is the world for which he was made. He is not placed here to live for himself, to be wrapt wholly up in self, but for something more ennobling and soul elevating. The youth who has enlarged views is a happy man, because his object is large happiness is in proportion to the object. Take a man that "lives where his father lived," and never let his thoughts run farther than over the spot of ground he occupies—who almost believes the "sun no broader than his father's shield"—and his happiness is comparatively nothing. Besides, he is a dead weight to the prosperity of a nation, because his influence is exceedingly bad—he is a stumbling block over which many stumble and sink down into a self-consoling state. We cannot expect to reach the height our mother country has, unless we take large and lofty views of things, and a youth is as capable of doing it as any one. Some are indeed awake, but the paucity of their number can effect nothing discernible. If learning consisted in the low and grovelling ideas which characterize so great a portion of the human family, we should long ere this have challenged competition with the world.

Writing foolish compositions, is the legitimate offspring of this contractedness, this microcosm of man. Herein perhaps is as insuperable a barrier to education as any that can be found. It binds the soul of man down to earth—it throws a chain around him that must be broken if he wishes to rise above the common level of mankind. It is strange, (the more this is made the subject of reflection, the more puerile will it appear,) that young men who have had so much light—who have been brought up to feel the importance of composing that which is solid and will conduce to their benefit—will so disgrace themselves by writing and even publishing foolish unwitty pieces, which they would fain have esteemed as marks of genius. It is in this manner, many a youth who might have made the world shake by his eloquence, who might have made kings tremble upon their thrones, and even the angels acknowledge his equality with others, has totally destroyed his relish for every thing but the low and vulgar compositions of the day which may be found in too many of our periodicals. Why cannot the young aspirant for honor and fame, raise his mind a little higher than the intellectual emetics that we are obliged to see in almost every paper that comes from the press? It is just as easy to write that which will reflect honor upon a person, which will enable him to fill stations of trust, as it is to write that which will degrade him in the estimation of his fellow men.—In fine, it is just as easy to write sense as nonsense.—It is not because they know no better, because they have no motives—for they have all that earth can pressen, their future prosperity and welfare.

As another means of promoting education, I would mention, the frequent use of extemporaneous speaking. This has not been sufficiently attended to in most of our institutions of learning; but the importance of it is beginning to be felt, and a corresponding action is somewhat perceptible. It would be useless to enter minutely into the advantages of this practice, as they are evident to all but a mere glance will accomplish the end proposed. It gives a fluency of speech which nothing else can possibly give, and which is of most essential service to the young. A young man may visit and converse; but after all, it is not like rising up before a mixed multitude and depending upon his own resources to rivet their attention. To favor this object, I would recommend the debating societies that are at present flourishing in almost every village and city. It is in those societies the mind is developed and brought into action. There the bonds of bashfulness and fear are broken, that fear to declaim in public which has enchaind the talents and genius of so many. Many a flower has withered, drooped, and died, unseen—many a one has sunk into the grave of obscurity merely for the want of confidence or boldness. Go ask all our orators and statesmen, where first they received an impulse to cheer them on in a course of usefulness, and in the road to fame?—and they will answer, in an infantile forum where youth met together for intellectual improvement. When the united testimony of such men as these are in favor of them, who can deny that they are beneficial? And not only is their testimony good, but they themselves stand as examples.

To be continued.

JOHN FITCH.

The following account of a new candidate for the honour of discovering steam navigation, is given in Hall's Notes on the Western States of America, lately published:—

"In 1785, John Fitch, a watchmaker in Philadelphia, conceived the design of propelling a boat by steam. He was both poor and illiterate, and many difficulties occurred to frustrate every attempt which he made to try the practicability of the invention. He applied to Congress for assistance, but was refused; and then offered his invention to the Spanish government, to be used in the navigation of the Mississippi, but without success. At length a company was formed, and funds subscribed, for the building of a steam boat, and in the year 1788 his vessel was launched on the Delaware. Many crowded to see and ridicule the novel, and, as they supposed, the chimerical experiment. It seemed that the idea of wheels had not occurred to Mr. Fitch; but instead of them, oars were used, which worked in frames. He was confident of success; and when the boat was ready for the trial, she started off in good style for Burlington. Those who had sneered began to stare, and they who had smiled in derision, looked grave. Away went the boat, and the scepticism of an unbelieving public. The boat performed her trip to Burlington, a distance of twenty miles; but unfortunately, burst her boiler in rounding to the wharf at that place, and the next tide floated her back to the city. Fitch persevered, and with great difficulty procured another boiler. After some time, the boat performed another trip to Burlington and Trenton and returned in the same day. She is said to move at the rate of eight miles an hour; but something was continually breaking, and the unhappy projector only conquered one difficulty to encounter another. Perhaps this was not owing to any defect in his plans, but to the low state of the arts at that time, and the difficulty of getting such complex machinery made with proper exactness.

He became embarrassed with debt, and was obliged to abandon the invention, after having satisfied himself of its practicability. This ingenious man, who was probably the first inventor of a steam boat, wrote three volumes, which he deposited in manuscript, sealed up, in the Philadelphia Library to be opened thirty years after his death. When, or why, he came to the west, we have not learned; but it is recorded of him that he died and was buried near the Ohio. His three volumes were opened about five years ago, and were found to contain his speculations on mechanics. He details his embarrassments and disappointments, with a feeling which shows how ardently he desired success, and which wins for him the sympathy of those who have heart enough to mourn over the blighted prospects of genius. He confidently predicts the future success of the plan, which in his hands, failed only for the want of pecuniary means. His prophecies that in less than a century we shall see our western rivers swarming with steam-boats; and expressed a wish to be buried on the shores of the Ohio, where the song of the boatmen may enliven the stillness of his resting place, and the music of the steam-engine soothe his spirit. What an idea! Yet how natural to the mind of an ardent projector, whose whole life had been devoted to one darling object, which it was not his destiny to accomplish! And how touching is the sentiment found in one of his journals: 'the day will come when some powerful man will get fame and riches from my invention; but nobody will believe that poor John Fitch can do any thing worthy of attention.'

THRILLING SKETCH.

A portal of the arena opened, and the combatant, with a mantle thrown over his face and figure, was let in the surrondery. The lion roared and ramped against the bars of his den, at the sight. The guard put a sword and buckler into the hands of the Christian, and he was left alone. He drew the mantle from his face, and bent a slow and firm look around the amphitheatre. His fine countenance and lofty bearing raised a universal shout of admiration. He might have been an Apollo encountering the Python. His eyes at last turned on mine. Could I believe my senses? Constantius was before me.

"All my rancour vanished. An hour past I could have struck the betrayer to the heart; I could have called on the severest vengeance of man and heaven to smite the destroyer of my child. But to see him hopelessly doomed, the man whom I had honored for his noble qualities, whom I had even loved, whose crime was at the worst but the crime of giving way to the strongest temptation that can bewilder the heart of man; to see this noble creature flung to the savage beast, dying in tortures, torn piecemeal before my eyes and his misery wrought by me, I would have obtested earth and heaven to save him. But my tongue cleaved to the roof of my mouth. My limbs refuse to stir. I would have thrown myself at the feet of Nero; but I saw like a man of stone—pale—paralyzed, the beating of my pulses stopt—my eyes alone alive.

The gate of the den was thrown back, and the lion rushed in with a roar and a bound that bore him half across the arena. I saw the sword glitter in the air, when it waved again it was covered with blood. A howl told that the blow had been driven home. The lion, one of the largest from Numidia, and made furious by thirst and hunger; an animal of prodigious power, crouched for an instant, as if to make sure of his prey, crept a few paces onward, and sprung at the victim's throat. He was met by a second wound, but his impulse was irresistible. A cry of natural horror rang round the amphitheatre. The struggle was now for an instant life or death. They rolled over each other; the lion reared upon his hind feet, and with gnashing teeth and distended talons, plunged on the man; again they rose together. Anxiety was now at its wildest height. The sword now swung round the champion's head in bloody circles. They fell again covered with blood and dust. The hand of Constantius had grasped the lion's mane, and the furious bounds of the monster could not loose the hold; but his strength was evidently giving way; he still struck terrible blows, but each was weaker than the one before; till collecting his whole force for a last effort, he darted one mighty blow into the lion's throat, and sunk. The savage yelled, and pouring out blood, fled howling round the arena. But the hand still grasped the mane, and his conqueror was dragged whirling through the dust at his heels. A universal outcry now arose to save him, if he were not already dead. But the lion, though bleeding from every vein, was still too terrible, and all shrunk from the hazard. At last the grasp gave way, and the body lay motionless upon the ground.

"What happened for some moments after I know not. There was a struggle at the portal; a female forced her way through the guards, rushed in alone, and flung herself upon the victim. The sight of a new prey roused the lion: he tore the ground with his talons; he lashed his streaming side with his tail; he lifted up his mane, and bared his fangs. But his approaching was no longer with a bound; he dreaded the sword, and came snuffing the blood on the sand, and stealing round the body in circuits still diminishing.

"The confusion in the vast assemblage was now extreme. Voices innumerable called for aid. Women screamed and fainted, men burst into indignant clamours at this prolonged cruelty. Even the hard hearts of the populace, accustomed as they were to the sacrifices of life, were roused to honest curses. The guards grasped their arms, and waited but for a sign from the emperor. But Nero gave no sign.

"I looked upon the woman's face; it was Salome!—I sprang upon my feet. I called on her name; called on her by every feeling of nature to fly from that place of death, to come to my arms, to think of the agonies of all that loved her.

"She had raised the head of Constantius on her knee, and was wiping the pale visage with her hair. At the sound of my voice she looked up, and calmly casting back the locks from her forehead, fixed her eyes upon me. She still knelt; one hand supported the head, with the other she pointed to it, as her only answer. I again adjured her. There was the silence of death among the thousands around me. A fire flashed into her eye—her cheek burned—she waived her hand with an air of superb sorrow.

"I am come to die," she uttered in a lofty tone.—This bleeding body was my husband. I have no father. The world contains to me but this clay in my arms. Yet, and she kissed the ashy lips before her, 'yet, my Constantius it was to save that father, that your generous heart defied the peril of this hour.—It was to redeem him from the hand of evil, that you abandoned your quiet home!—yes, cruel father, here lies the noble being that threw open your dungeon, that led you safe through the conflagration, that to the last moment of his liberty, only thought how he might preserve and protect you.' Tears at length fell in floods from her eyes. 'But,' said she, in a tone of wild-power, 'he was betrayed, and may the power whose thunders avenge the cause of his people, pour down just retribution upon the head that dared!—'

"I heard my own condemnation about to be pronounced by the lips of my own child. Wound up to the last degree of suffering, I tore my hair, leaped upon the bars before me, and plunged into the arena by her side. The height stunned me, I tottered a few paces and fell. The lion gave a roar and sprang upon me. I lay helpless under him: I felt his fiery breath—I saw his lurid eye glaring—I heard the gnashing of his white fangs above me.

"An exulting shout arose. I saw him rear as if struck, gore filled his jaws. Another mighty blow was driven to his heart. He sprang high in the air with a howl. He dropped; he was dead. The amphitheatre thundered with acclamations.

"With Salome clinging to my bosom, Constantius raised me from the ground. The roar of the lion had roused him from his swoon, and two blows saved me. The falchion had broken in the heart of the monster. The whole multitude stood up, supplicating for our lives in the name of filial piety and heroism. Nero, devil as he was, dared not resist the strength of popular feeling. He waved a signal to the guards; the portal was opened, and my children, sustaining my feeble steps, showered with garlands and ornaments from innumerable hands, slowly led me from the arena."

OLIVER CROMWELL.

There is a circumstance related of Cromwell, which is the refinement of policy as well as in malevolence, is scarcely, perhaps, to be paralleled in history. When Cardenas was ambassador in England from the court of Spain, though he was treated with marks of uncommon attention by Cromwell, he could never be prevailed upon to betray any state secret, or to enter into any measures whatever in favor of the Protector's views or feelings, yet still the latter was too cunning for him, for while he was making great naval preparations for a war against Spain, he had the address to make its minister believe the fleet was destined for another purpose, and in this manner he amused him, till the burning of the galleons by Blake, opened his eyes.—Cardenas resented this so much, that when he was recalled, he traversed every proposal of Cromwell's at the court of Madrid so that while he remained there in office, the Protector found he was not likely to carry any point. He therefore determined on the destruction of this minister, though it was no easy matter to effect it, as his credit was great, not only with the king his master, but with the whole Spanish court. Cromwell, however, conceived a way, which he thought would effectually accomplish his ruin: and to put it in execution, he sent for the keeper of Newgate, and asked him many questions concerning the qualifications of his different prisoners, and among the rest, wished to know whether he had in custody any remarkable for house-breaking. The jailer told him, there was a fellow under sentence of death, that he believed could get in or out of any house in the world, if his hands were at liberty. The Protector ordered this man to be brought privately to him; but the fellow was such a miserable, wretched wretch, that Cromwell stood astonished at the sight of him, and more so at the specimens of his art, which he practised at the instance of the keeper, on locks of the most curious contrivance; these, though of different forms, he readily opened, and said, there was never a lock made that he would not undertake to open in the same manner. The keeper was then ordered to withdraw, and the Protector, after some private discourse with the thief, remanded him to Newgate under the same guard which brought him. But at the dead of night, he sent a trusty person to Newgate, with a warrant to the keeper for the criminal's release, and orders to bring him again into his presence to receive some instructions. When the fellow came the second time, the Protector showed him the plan of a garden and pavilion, into which he was to make his way by opening a certain number of locks, each of which had three keys; and then he asked him, if he thought he could effect it, promising him not only a free pardon, but a considerable reward for his pains. The man said he would. The Protector told him, that he should be conducted to the place where the service was to be performed, and then he would have a letter given him, which he was to drop under a table that he would find in the middle of the pavilion, as there represented in the plan. This was all the fellow was intrusted with, and care was taken to provide him with suitable apparel, and every thing necessary for his journey, and the service he was about to perform: so that he no sooner received his instructions than he was hurried off immediately, and put on board the vessel that was to carry him to Spain. The person to whose care he was intrusted, had his instructions likewise; but as the other did not know where he was to be carried, so the other was not acquainted with the business of his companion, when he had brought him to the appointed place and given him the letter, but was instantly to leave him to himself, and repair to Venice with another letter, which he was to deliver to the English envoy there. Each of these performed his service punctually. The letter which the felon carried, was addressed to Don Cardenas Secretary of State to the King of Spain, and was written in England with Cromwell's own hand, thanking him for the care he had taken to perform his engagements, acquainting him that the twenty thousand pounds sterling, which had been stipulated, was lodged in the bank of Venice for his use, and that he might draw it whenever he pleased. The letter, as Cromwell had foreseen, was picked up by the King, whose custom was to repair to that pavilion every morning, to deliberate on the affairs of the nation, and to read despatches as well as to receive the assistance of his council.—The King knowing the hand, but not understanding the contents, was greatly alarmed, and sent immediately for the English agent, who read the letter to his majesty, but protested his ignorance as to any secret intelligence between Cardenas and his master, who, he said, was of such a temper, as never to intrust a second person with things of that nature. This increased his majesty's apprehensions; and when the council assembled, Cardenas was ordered to withdraw, and the letter was produced by the King, with an account of its contents, and manner of finding it; adding, that Cardenas was, indeed, the last man that sat there except his majesty, the evening before it was found. All unanimously pronounced him traitor; and his whole conduct while at the English court was recalled to mind, and urged as a proof of it; but his majesty, whose affection for him was sincere, was unwilling to judge so rashly of him without further evidence; and knowing the artifices of courtiers to disgrace or supplant one another in the prince's favour, and that it might not be impossible but that some other of the council might counterfeit such a letter and drop it with the design of ruining Cardenas, proposed to trace the affair to the bottom before passing sentence, by sending to Venice to know if such a precise sum was lodged in the bank there, by whom lodged, and for whose use. His majesty's proposal was thought reasonable, and a messenger was immediately despatched to the Spanish minister at Venice, to make strict inquiry into the above particulars. The messenger returned, and brought with him the original order, dated the same day with the letter to Cardenas, written with the same hand, and, to move all suspicion, sealed with the Protector's own seal. There now remained no further doubt: Cardenas was infamously degraded, and his estate confiscated; but his majesty, on account of his great age and long services, thought fit to spare his life.

CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE.

The Boston Mercantile Journal gives the following remarkable case of murder, and conviction of an innocent person, as illustrating the uncertainty of circumstantial evidence. The journal also employs it as an argument against capital punishment:—"A negro who had run away from his master in South Carolina, arrived in London in an American ship. Soon after he had landed, he got acquainted with a poor honest laundress in Wapping, who washed his linen. This poor woman usually wore two gold rings on one of her fingers; and it was said that she had saved a little money, which induced this wretch to conceive the design of murdering her and taking her property. She was a widow, and lived in humble dwelling with her nephew. One night her nephew came home much intoxicated, and was put to bed. The negro, who was aware of the circumstance, thought this would be a favourable opportunity for executing his bloody design. Accordingly, he climbed to the apartment of the laundress, whom he murdered—not until after a severe struggle, the noise which awoke her drunken nephew in the adjoining room, who got up and hastened to the rescue of his aunt. In the meantime, the villain had cut off the finger with the rings; but before he could escape, he was grappled by the nephew, who, being a very powerful man, though much intoxicated, very nearly overpowered him—when, by the light of the moon, which shone through the window, he discovered the complexion of the villain, whom, having seldom seen a negro, he took for the devil. The murderer then disengaged himself from the grasp of the nephew, and succeeded in making his escape through the chimney. But the nephew believed, and ever afterwards declared, that it was the devil with whom he had struggled, and who had suddenly flown into the air and disappeared. The negro, in the course of the struggle, had besmeared the young man's shirt in many places with the blood of his victim; and this, joined with other circumstances, induced his neighbours to consider the nephew as the murderer of his aunt. He was arrested, examined, and committed to prison, though he persisted in asserting his innocence, and told his story of the midnight visitor, which appeared not only improbable, but ridiculous in the extreme. He was tried, convicted, and executed—protesting to the last his total ignorance of the murder, and throwing it wholly on his black antagonist, whom he believed to be no other than Satan. The real murderer was not suspected, and returned to America with his little booty; but after a wretched existence of ten years, on his death-bed confessed the murder, and related the particulars attending it."

POPULAR TALES.

THE ADALANTADO OF THE SEVEN CITIES.

A LEGEND OF ST BRANDAN.

In the early part of the fifteenth century, when Prince Henry of Portugal, worthy memory, was pushing discovery along the western coast of Africa, and the world was resounding with reports of golden regions on the main land, and new-found islands in the ocean, there arrived at Lisbon an old bewildered pilot of the seas, who had been driven by tempests, he knew not whither, and who raved about an island far in the deep, on which he had landed, and which he had found peopled with Christians, and adorned with noble cities.

The inhabitants, he said, gathered round, and regarded him with surprise, having never before been visited by a ship. They told him they were descendants of a band of Christians, who fled from Spain when that country was conquered by the Moslems. They were curious about the state of their fatherland, and grieved to hear that the Moslems still held possession of the kingdom of Grenada. They would have taken the old navigator to church, to convince him of their orthodoxy; but, either through lack of devotion, or lack of faith in their words, he declined their invitation, and preferred to return on board of his ship. He was properly punished. A furious storm arose, drove him from his anchorage, hurried him out to sea, and he saw no more of the unknown island.

This strange story caused great marvel in Lisbon and elsewhere. Those versed in history, remembered to have read, in an ancient chronicle, that, at the time of the conquest of Spain, in the eighth century, when the blessed cross was cast down, and the crescent erected in its place, and when Christian churches were turned into Moslem mosques, seven bishops at the head of seven bands of pious exiles, had fled from the peninsula, and embarked in quest of some island, or distant land, where they might found seven Christian cities, and enjoy their faith unmolested.

The fate of these pious saints—errant had hitherto remained a mystery, and their story had faded from Memory; the report of the old tempest-tossed pilot however, revived this long-forgotten theme; and it was determined by the pious and enthusiastic, that the island thus accidentally discovered, was the identical place of refuge, whither the wandering bishops had been guided by a protecting Providence and where they had folded their flocks.

This most excitable of worlds has always some darling object of chimerical enterprise: 'Island of the Seven Cities' now awakened as much interest and longing among zealous Christians, as has the renowned city of Timbuctoo among adventurous travellers, or the North-east Passage among hardy navigators, and it was a frequent prayer of the devout, that these scattered and lost portions of the Christian family might be discovered, and reunited to the great body of Christendom.

No one, however, entered into the matter with half the zeal of Don Fernando de Ulmo, a young cavalier, of high standing in the Portuguese court, and of most sanguine and romantic temperament. He had recently come to his estate, and had the round of all kinds of pleasures and excitements, when this new theme of popular talk and wonder presented itself. The Island of the Seven Cities became now the constant subject of his thoughts by day, and his dreams by night; it even rivalled his passion for a beautiful girl, one of the greatest belles of Lisbon, to whom he was betrothed. At length, his imagination became so inflamed on the subject, that he determined to fit out an expedition, at his own expense, and set sail in quest of this sainted island. It could not be a cruise of any great extent; for, according to the calculations of the tempest-tossed pilot, it must be somewhere in the latitude of the Canaries; which at that time, when the new world was as yet undiscovered, formed the frontier of ocean enterprise. Don Fernando applied to the crown for countenance and protection. As he was a favorite at court, the usual patronage was readily extended to him: that is to say, he received a commission from the king, Don Ioam II., constituting him Adalantado, or military governor, of any country he might discover, with the single proviso, that he should bear all the expenses of the discovery, and pay a tenth of the profits to the crown.

Don Fernando now set to work in the true spirit of a projector. He sold acre after acre of solid land, and invested the proceeds in ships, guns, ammunition, and sea-stores. Even his old family mansion, in Lisbon, was mortgaged without scruple, for he looked forward to a palace in one of the Seven Cities, of which he was to be Adalantado. This was the age of nautical romance, when the thoughts of Don Fernando, therefore drew adventurers of every kind. The merchant promised himself new marts of opulent traffic; the soldier hoped to sack and plunder some one or other of those Seven Cities; even the fat monk shook off the sleep and sloth of the cloister, to join in a crusade which promised such increase to the possessions of the church.

One person alone regarded the whole project with sovereign contempt and growling hostility. This was Don Ramiro Alvarez, the father of the beautiful Serafina, to whom Don Fernando was betrothed. He was one of those perverse, matter-of-fact old men, who are prone to oppose every thing speculative and romantic. He had no faith in the Island of the Seven Cities; regarded the projected cruise as a crack-brained freak; looked with angry eye and internal heart-burning on the conduct of his intended son-in-law, chaffering away solid lands for lands in the moon, and scoffingly dubbed him Adalantado of Lubberland. In fact, he had never really relished the intended match, to which his consent had been slowly extorted, by the tears and entreaties of his daughter. It is true he could have no reasonable objections to the youth, for Don Fernando was the very flower of Portuguese chivalry. No one could excel him at the tilting match, or the riding at the ring; none was more bold and dexterous in the bull fight; none composed more madrigals in praise of his lady's charms, or sang them with sweeter tones to the accompaniment of her guitar; nor could any one handle the castanets and dance the bolero with more captivating grace. All these admirable qualities and endowments, however, though they had been sufficient to win the heart of Serafina, were nothing in the eyes of her unreasonable father. Oh Cupid, god of Love! why will fathers always be so unreasonable!

The engagement to Serafina had threatened at first to throw an obstacle in the way of the expedition of Don Fernando, and for a time perplexed him in the extreme. He was passionately attached to the young lady; but he was also passionately bent on this romantic enterprise. How should he reconcile the passionate inclinations? A simple and obvious arrangement at length presented itself; marry Serafina, enjoy a portion of the honeymoon at once, and defer the rest until his great return from the discovery of the Seven Cities!

He hastened to make known this most excellent arrangement to Don Ramiro, when the long-smothered wrath of the old cavalier burst forth in a storm about his ears. He reproached him with being the dupe of wandering vagabonds and wild schemers, and of squandering all his real possessions, in pursuit of empty bubbles. Don Fernando was too sanguine a projector, and too young a man, to listen tamely to such language. He acted with what is technically called 'coming spirit.' A high quarrel ensued; Don Ramiro pronounced him a mad man, and forbade all farther intercourse with his daughter, until he should give proof of returning sanity, 'by abandoning this madcap enterprise; while Don Fernando flung out of the house, more bent than ever on an expedition, from the idea of triumphing over the incredulity of the gray-beard, when he should return successful.

Don Ramiro repaired to his daughter's chamber; the moment the youth had departed. He represented to her the sanguine, unsteady character of her lover, and the chimerical nature of his schemes; showed her the propriety of suspending all intercourse with him, until he should recover from his present hallucination; folded her to his bosom with parental fondness, kissed the tear that stole down her cheek, and, as he left the chamber, gently locked the door; for although he was a fond father, and had an opinion of the submissive temper of his child, he had a still higher opinion of the conservative virtues of lock and key. Whether the damsel had been in any wise shaken in her faith, as to the schemes of her lover, and the existence of the Island of the Seven Cities, by the sage representations of her father, tradition does not say: but it is certain, that she became a firm believer, the moment she heard him turn the key in the lock.

Notwithstanding the interdict of Don Ramiro, therefore, and his shrewd precautions, the intercourse of the lovers continued, although clandestinely. Don Fernando toiled all day, hurrying forward his nautical enterprise, while at night he would repair, beneath the grated balcony of his mistress, to carry on, at equal pace, the no less interesting enterprise of his heart. At length, the preparations for the expedition were completed. Two gallant caravels lay anchored in the Tagus, ready to sail with the morning dawn; while late at night, by the pale light of a waning moon, Don Fernando sought the stately mansion of Alvarez, to take a last farewell of Serafina. The customary signal, of a few low notes of a guitar, brought her to the balcony. She was sad at heart, and full of gloomy forebodings; but her lover strove to impart to her his own buoyant hope and youthful confidence. 'A few short months,' said he, 'and I shall return in triumph. Thy father will blush at his incredulity, and will once more welcome me to his house, when I cross its threshold a wealthy suitor, and Adalantado of the Seven Cities.'

The beautiful Serafina shook her head mournfully. It was not on those points that she felt doubt or dismay. She believed most implicitly in the Island of the Seven Cities, and trusted devoutly in the success of the enterprise; but she had heard of the inconstancy of the seas, and the inconstancy of those who roam them. Now, let the truth be spoken, Don Fernando, if he had any fault in the world, it was, that he was a little inflammable; that is to say, a little too subject to take fire from the sparkle of every bright eye: he had been somewhat of a rover among the sex on shore, what might he not be on sea? Might he not meet with other loves in foreign ports? Might he not behold some peerless beauty in one or other of those seven cities, who might efface the image of Serafina from his thoughts?

At length she ventured to hint her doubts; but Don Fernando spurned at the very idea. Never could his heart be false to Serafina! Never could another be captivating in his eyes!—never—never! Repeatedly did he bend his knee, and smite his breast, and call upon the silver moon to witness the sincerity of his vows. But might not Serafina, herself, be forgetful of her plighted faith? Might not some wealthier rival present, while he was tossing on the sea, and backed by the authority of her father win the treasure of her hand?

Alas, how little did he know Serafina's heart! The more her father should oppose, the more would she be fixed in her faith. Though years should pass before his return, he would find her true to her vows.—Even should the salt seas swallow him up, (and her eyes steamed with salt tears at the very thought,) never would she be the wife of another—never! She raised her beautiful white arms between the iron bars of the balcony, and invoked the moon as a testimonial of her faith.

Thus, according to immemorial usage, the lovers parted, with many a vow of eternal constancy. But will they keep these vows? Perish the doubt?—Have they not called the constant moon, to witness?

With the morning dawn, the caravels dropped down the Tagus, and put to sea. They steered for the Canaries, in those days the regions of nautical romance. Scarcely had they reached those latitudes, when a violent tempest arose. Don Fernando soon lost sight of the accompanying caravel, and was driven out of reckoning by the fury of the storm. For several weary days and nights he was to and fro, at the mercy of the elements, expecting each moment to be swallowed up. At length, one day, towards evening, the storm subsided: the clouds cleared up, as though a veil had suddenly been withdrawn from the face of heaven, and the setting sun shone gloriously upon a fair and mountainous island, that seemed close at hand. The tempest-tossed mariners, rubbed their eyes, and gazed almost incredulously upon this land, that had emerged so suddenly from the murky gloom; yet there it lay, spread out in lovely landscapes; enlivened by villages, and towers, and spires, while the late stormy sea rolled in peaceful billows to its shores. About a league, from the sea, on the banks of a river, stood a noble city, with lofty walls and towers, and a protecting castle. Don Fernando anchored off the mouth of the river, which appeared to form a spacious harbor. In a little while, a barge was seen issuing from the river. It was evidently a barge of ceremony, for it was richly though quaintly carved and gilt, and decorated with a silken awning, and fluttering streamers, while a banner, bearing the sacred emblem of the cross, floated to the breeze. The barge advanced slowly, impelled by sixteen oars, painted a bright crimson. The oarsmen, were uncouth, or rather antique, in their garb, and kept stroke to the regular cadence of an old Spanish ditty. Beneath the awning sat a cavalier, in a rich though old-fashioned doublet, with an enormous sombrero and feather.

When the barge reached the caravel, the cavalier stepped on board. He was tall and gaunt, with a long Spanish visage, and lack-lustre eyes, and an air of lofty and somewhat pompous gravity. His mustaches were curled up to his ears, his beard was forked and precise; he wore gauntlets that reached to his elbows, and a Toledo blade, that strutted out behind, while in front, its huge basket hilt might have served for a porringer.

Thrusting out a long spindle leg, and taking off his sombrero with a grave and stately sweep, he saluted Don Fernando by name, and welcomed him, in old Castilian language, and in the style of old Castilian courtesy.

Don Fernando was startled at hearing himself, accosted by name, by an utter stranger, in a strange land. As soon as he could recover from his surprise, he inquired what land it was, at which he had arrived.

'The Isian I of the Seven Cities!'

Could this be true? Had he indeed thus been tempest-driven upon the very land of which he was in quest? It was even so. The other caravel, from which he had been separated in the storm, had made a neighboring port of the island and announced the tidings of the expedition, which came to restore the country to the great community of christendom. The whole island; he was told was given up to rejoicings on the happy event; and they only awaited his arrival, to acknowledge allegiance to the crown of Portugal, and hail him as Adalantado of the Seven Cities. A grand fete was to be solemnized that very night, in the palace of the Alcayde or governor of the city; who, on beholding the most opportune arrival of the caravel, had dispatched his grand chamberlain, in his barge of state, to conduct the future Adalantado to the ceremony.

To be continued.

MISCELLANY.

From the Edinburgh Journal.

HYSLOP OF GLENMANNOW.

At the head of a romantic glen in the parish of Penpont, Dumfriesshire, there resided, in the early part of the last century, an individual of the name of John Hyslop, otherwise called Glenmannow, which was the designation of a sheep-farm rented by him from the Duke of Queensberry. His almost superhuman strength of body made Glenmannow a subject of constant wonder and discourse throughout his native district, and to this hour his feats are remembered and recounted there with pride and astonishment. His appearance indicated his great physical powers, his person being of an uncommonly massive build, and of about six feet in height. He was very averse to making displays of his strength, particularly where these might be injurious to others. His modesty and good nature were proverbial, and it was only when repeated provocations had overcome his patience, that his strength became a source of terror to those around.—The Duke (James) of Queensberry used sometimes to put the prowess of his tenant to the proof. On one occasion he sent a party of six stout grenadiers to billet on Glenmannow, giving them a hint to behave roughly. Confident in the belief that a single man would never venture to board them, the grenadiers used their licence freely, but narrowly escaped with their lives in consequence, being pursued to the very gates of Drumlanrig Castle by the excited Glenmannow, with the pole or tram of a cart upon his shoulder.

Another feat of Glenmannow is recorded in the Dumfries Magazine, from the pages of which we extract these particulars respecting this athletic countryman. "Duke James of Queensberry, like others of our nobility and gentry, resided during a part of the year in London; and on one of his visits to the metropolis, he and a party of friends happened to have a match at discus, or as it is more commonly called, 'putting the stone.' Several adepts happened to be of the party, who boasted much of their superior strength and adroitness, and after making one of their best throws, offered to stake a large sum that not one of their companions knew of, or could find, a person to match it. 'The throw is certainly a good one,' said the Duke of Queensberry 'yet I think it were easy to find many champions of sufficient nerve to show us a much better. I myself have a homely unpractised herdsman in Scotland, on whose head I will stake the sum you mention, that he throws the quoit fully two yards over the best of you. 'Done! produce your man,' was the reply of all; and the Duke accordingly lost no time in dispatching a letter to one of his servants at Drumlanrig, ordering him to set out immediately on its receipt for Glenmannow, and to come with honest John Hyslop to London without delay. The Duke's letter with Glenmannow was not less absolute than the rescript of an emperor, he wondered but never thought of demurring, and without any further preparation than clothing himself in his Sunday's suit and giving his wife a few charges about looking to the hill in his absence, he assumed his large staff, and departed with the servant for 'Lunnun.'

On his arrival, the duke informed him of the purpose for which he had been sent, and desired that on the day and at the hour appointed, he should make his appearance along with one of his servants, who knew perfectly the back-streets and bye-lanes of London, and who, after he should have decided the bet, would conduct him immediately in safety from the ground, as it was not improbable that his appearance and performance might attract a crowd, and lead to unpleasant consequences. When the day arrived, the party assembled, and proceeded to the ground, where, to the duke's surprise, though not to his terror, his crafty opponents chose a spot directly in front of a high wall, and at such a distance that the best of their party should pitch the quoit exactly to the foot of it; so that their antagonist, to make good the duke's boast of 'two yards over them,' should be obliged to exceed them these two yards in height, instead of straight-forward distance. This implied such an effort as amounted in their minds to a physical impossibility; and as the duke, from having neglected to specify the particular nature of the ground, could not legally object to this advantage, they looked upon the victory as already their own. The quoit chosen was a large ball of lead, and already had the champion of the party tossed it to the wall, and demanded of the duke to produce the man appointed to take it up. His grace's servant, who fully comprehended the instructions given him, entered at this crisis with the "hairdily," and, to them, uncouth Glenmannow. His appearance attracted no small notice, and even merriment, but the imperturbable object of it regarded the whole scene with the indifference peculiar to his character, and, with his mind fixed only upon the great end for which he was there, demanded to be shown the quoit, and the spots from which and to where it had been thrown. The demand was soon complied with; and while he assumed his station, with the quoit in his hand, the duke whispered in his ear the deception which had been practised, and urged him to exert his whole force in order to render it unavailing. 'Will you throw off your coat? It will give you more freedom,' said his grace in conclusion. 'My coat! Na, nae coats aff wi' me for this silly affair,' replied he. 'I thoct it had been some terrible throw orither that thae chaps had made, when I was ca'd for a' the way to Lunnun to see to gang ayont them; but if this be't a, I wadna hae mean'd ye to hae dune't ye'rsel.' Then poising the ball for a little in his hand, and viewing it with an air of contempt, 'There!' said he, tossing it carelessly from him into the air, 'he that likes may gang an' fetch it back. The ball, as if shot from the mouth of a cannon, flew on in a straight line completely over the wall, and alighted on the roof of a house at some distance beyond it.—Its weight and velocity forced it through the tiles; and with a crash which immediately caused the house to be evacuated by its inmates, it penetrated also the garret floor, and rolled upon that of the next story. A great hubbub ensued; but the servant knew his duty, and in a twinkling Glenmannow was no longer amongst them.

His grace, after paying for the damage done to the house, conducted the whole party to his residence, there to discharge their forfeit, and to gaze upon the prodigy by whom they were vanquished. Glenmannow was well rewarded for his trouble and loss of time in journeying to London, and, over and above the immediate bounty of his grace, he returned to his honest wife Mally with a discharge for one year's rent of the farm in his pocket."

EARLY AMERICAN HEROISM.

During one of the former wars between France and England, in which the then colonies bore an active part, a respectable individual, a member of the society of friends, of the name of—commanded a fine ship which sailed from an eastern port in England. The vessel had a strong and effective crew, but was totally unarmed. When near her destined port, she was chased, and ultimately overhauled, by a French vessel of war. Her commander used every endeavour to escape, but seeing from the superior sailing of the French man that his capture was inevitable, he quietly retired below. He was followed into the cabin by the cabin-boy, a youth of activity and enterprise, named Charles Wager, he asked his commander if nothing more could be done to save the ship. His commander replied that it was impossible; that every thing had been done that was practicable; there was no escape for them, and they must submit to be captured. Charles then returned upon deck, and summoned the crew around him. He stated in a few words what was their captain's conclusion—then, with an elevation of mind, dictated by a soul formed for enterprise and noble daring, he observed, "If you will place yourselves under my command and stand by me, I have conceived a plan by which the ship may be rescued, and we in turn become the conquerors." The sailors, no doubt, feeling the ardour, and inspired by the courage, of their youthful and gallant leader, agreed to place themselves under his command. His plan was communicated to them, and they awaited with firmness the moment to carry their enterprise into effect. The suspense was of short duration, for the Frenchman was quickly alongside, and as the weather was fine, immediately grappled fast to the unoffending merchant-ship. As Charles had anticipated, the exulted conquerors, elated beyond measures with the acquisition of so fine a prize, poured into his vessel in crowds, cheering and huzzaing; and not foreseeing any danger, they left but few men on board their ship. Now was the moment for Charles, who giving his men the signal, sprang at their head on board the opposing vessel, while some seized the arms which had been left in profusion on her deck, and with which they soon overpowered the few men left on board; the others, by a simultaneous movement, relieved her from the grapplings which united the two vessels. Our hero now having the command of the French vessel, seized the helm, and placing her out of boarding distance, hailed with the voice of a conqueror, the discomfited crowd of Frenchman who were left on board of the peaceful bark he had just quitted, and summoned them to follow close in his wake, or he would blow them out of the water, a threat they well knew he was very capable of executing as their guns were loaded during the chase. They sorrowfully acquiesced with his commands, while gallant Charles steered into port, followed by his prize. The exploit excited universal applause. The former master of the merchant-vessel was examined by the Admiralty, when he stated the whole of the enterprise as it occurred, and declared that Charles Wager had planned and effected the gallant exploit, and that to him alone belonged the honour and credit of the achievement. Charles was immediately transferred to the British navy, appointed a midshipman, and his education carefully superintended. He soon after distinguished himself in action, and underwent a rapid promotion until at length he was created an admiral and known as Sir Charles Wager. It is said that he always held in veneration and esteem that respectable and conscientious Friend, whose cabin-boy he had been, and transmitted yearly to his old master, as he termed him, a handsome present of Maderia, to cheer his declining days.—Mariner's Library.

BILLARD'S ADVENTURE IN A WELL.

The story of the unfortunate Dufavel, who was buried accidentally in a well, and remained in it for a long period, is not without a parallel in the history of mining transactions in France. In the department of the Indre, and parish of Fleure-la-Quiviere, March 27, 1837, about half-past eight in the morning, Etienne Billard, a working mason, descended a well one hundred and twenty feet deep, for the purpose of examining it preparatory to some repairs. When he had reached the bottom, or nearly so, an extensive portion of the sides fell in upon him, and shut him out from the light of day; but, by a remarkable piece of good fortune, the materials, in falling, formed a small arch of about three feet in diameter around his head. Had it not been for this he would have been either fatally hurt by the heavy stones of the masonry, or would have been suffocated immediately. Every other part of the well around his body was filled compactly with the fallen materials. The noise of the irruption was heard by some workmen near the spot, who immediately ran up to it. On listening intently, they heard the cries of Billard, and the certainty that he was yet alive inspired the hope of delivering him. Sending off one of their number to alarm the neighbouring inhabitants and authorities, these workmen then lowered a lighted candle down the well, the danger of a further fall of the sides deterring themselves from going down. The candle went down one hundred feet, thus showing that above twenty feet of the mass, or a considerable portion thereof lay above the unfortunate Billard. In reply to their call he was heard distinctly to say that he could not see any thing of the light. "I am assured," he moreover said, "that I am a lost man. But I suffer no pain, and I breathe freely."

No ordinary difficulty, it was obvious, stood in the way of relief in this case. For workmen to descend into the narrow deep well, and attempt to clear away the ruins, without some security against a further fall of the sides, was a dangerous task. The authorities of the district, as soon as they arrived, and saw the nature of the accident, sent off an express for the district superintendent of roads and bridges, Monsieur Certain. He was at some distance, and did not arrive till next day. In the meantime one man a slater, ventured to descend to the top of the fallen mass of stones and earth which proved, as had been shown by the candle, to be about one hundred feet below the orifice. Urged by the indistinct cries for help which they heard from poor Billard, the men on the spot began to lift the stones forming the sides of the well. When Monsieur Certain arrived, he descended without hesitation into the well, and put several questions respecting his situation. M. Certain judged it proper to continue the raising of the sides of the well, as the displacement of the lower part would render it most imprudent to go on otherwise. No side-boring could be executed with such speed as the whole well could be cleared. The soil, fortunately was clayey and firm. While this labour was going on day and night, with the utmost rapidity compatible with a proper degree of caution, friends and fellow workmen of Billard descended occasionally to animate him with the cheering sound of kindly voices, and with the assurance that help was near.

On the morning of the 29th the governor and head engineer of the department of the Indre arrived. M. Ferrand, inspector of works was with them, and descended into the well. He gave his assent to the continuation of the operations going on, which some of the anxious friends of the prisoner were beginning to exclaim against, from their seeming slowness. In presence of the gentlemen mentioned, the labours were continued, and on the evening of the 29th the well was clear to the upper part of the fallen mass. Without delay, the process of lifting them was begun; but from the size of the stones the work went on very tardily, through the difficulty of hoisting them to such a distance above. After they had advanced a certain way, a new difficulty met them full in the face. It was impossible to tell the exact state of the arch formed so miraculously over the head of the unfortunate man, or its degree of stability. It was necessary, therefore, to go on with the elevation of the stones with extreme care and delicacy, otherwise the unsettlement of any portion of the heavy masses above him might have caused his instantaneous death either from a crush or suffocation.

At ten o'clock in the evening of the 29th, the workmen were calculated to be about six feet above the captive, who had now been shut out from the light since the morning of the 27th. It was impossible to send him food by a bore as in the case of Dufavel, and he had therefore the pressure of hunger added to his misery. His voice was heard more clearly as the workmen went on, and they could now even tell the exact point where he was confined. But during the night of the 29th his voice became a source of fear and alarm to the labourers above. Billard's motionless condition, his want of food and air for so long a time, began to overthrow his moral courage. His reason gave place to delirium, his hope to despair. The workmen heard him at one moment lamenting his fate and piteously crying for food, and at the next moment they heard him abandoning himself to the most extravagant gaiety. Laughter heard in such a situation was a thing almost too deplorable and shocking for human ears to listen to. When consulted on the meaning of these symptoms on the part of Billard, M. Nabert, a surgeon, had never quitted the spot since the time of the accident, recommended the workmen to hurry on their labours, as the man could probably survive but a few hours in this state.

In consequence of this advice, a new direction was given to the work, and in place of passing down by the side of the spot where the poor man was supposed to be, the excavation was carried slopingly down to his head. In five, after three days and three nights of incessant toil, the head of Billard was reached, and cleared of all surrounding matter. The instant that this took place, it was notified to those above by a cry, and the deafening shouts that were immediately raised showed what an assemblage had gathered around the place to learn the issue of the case. The deliverance took place exactly a quarter of an hour before eleven o'clock in the morning of the 30th. When raised once more, caution was used to prevent any bad effects from a change so sudden. He was carried to a neighbouring house, with his body and head well wrapped up, and there he was laid in an apartment, from which the light was in great measure excluded. After some spoonfuls of light broth and a little wine had been administered to him, he fell immediately asleep never having tasted that blessing during his confinement. Before sleeping, he had spoken in such a way as to show that his mind had recovered its tone. His pulse weak but quick, beating 126 times in a minute; his skin was cold, his thirst burning, and his tongue stuck almost to the roof of his mouth. While confined he had eaten a portion of the leather front of his cap or bonnet, and he had even, he said, endeavored to grind with his teeth a stone that lay before his mouth.

Etienne Billard soon recovered. His imprisonment had not been so protracted as to render the vital heat difficult of restoration. His body, however, though not mangled or bruised, as it might have been expected to be retained for a long time a feeling of dull pain, from the pressure that had been exerted upon it.

CLOTH MAKING WITHOUT SPINNING OR WEAVING.

Among the many extraordinary and truly wonderful inventions of the present times, is a machine for the making of broad or narrow woollen cloths without spinning or weaving, and, from our acquaintance with the staple manufacture of this district, after an inspection of patterns of this cloth, we should say there is every probability of this fabric superseding the usual mode of making cloth by spinning or weaving. The machines are patented in this and every other manufacturing nation. The inventor is an American, and appears to have a certain prospect of realizing an ample fortune by the sale of his patent right. We understand patterns of this cloth, as well as a drawing of the machinery, have been shown to many of our principal merchants and manufacturers, none of whom have expressed a doubt but that the machinery appears capable of making low cloths which require a good substance. Should it succeed to any thing near the expectations of the patentees, its abridgement of labour, as well manual as by machinery, will be very great. We find that means are already taken to introduce this machine among our continental rivals; a company of eleven gentlemen in London have deposited five thousand pounds with the patentees, who have ordered a machine for them; when finished, they are to try it for one month, and if at the end of that time they think it will succeed, they are to pay twenty thousand pounds for the patent right in the kingdom of Belgium, and it will of course be worked there. We are therefore bound in duty to our country, and her manufacturing interests, to adopt such facilities as will prevent us falling into a position below our rivals in other countries. We are informed, the necessary machinery for the production of this patent woollen cloth will be tried here in a week or two, under the superintendence of the inventor, by a cloth merchant who has an exclusive license, but is about to associate with him twenty other respectable business men, for the purpose of sharing the expense of giving the invention a fair trial. It is calculated that one set of machinery, not costing more than six hundred pounds, will be capable of producing six hundred yards of woollen cloth, thirty-six inches in width, per day of twelve hours.—Lords Mercury.

ODDS AND ENDS.

Sterne, who used his wife very ill, was one day talking to Garrick in a fine sentimental manner, in praise of conjugal love and fidelity. "The husband," said Sterne, "who behaves unkindly to his wife, deserves to have his house burnt over his head." "If you think so," said Garrick, "I hope your house is insured."

A lady, after performing, with the most brilliant execution, a sonata on the pianoforte, in the presence of Dr. Johnson, turning to the philosopher, took the liberty of asking him if he was fond of music? "No, madam, replied the doctor, "but of all noises I think music is the least disagreeable."

The Abbe Maury, who had rendered himself obnoxious to the Democrats, during the French revolution, was one night seized by the mob, who looked around for a lamp-post to suspend him on. "Pray, my good friends," said the Abbe, "were you to hang me to that lamp-post, do you think that you would see any the clearer for it?" This well-timed wit softened the rabble and saved his life.

Saluzzo de Pedrado praising an old lady for her beauty, she answered that beauty was incompatible with her age. To which he replied, "We say, as beautiful as an angel; and yet the angels are, of all creatures, the most ancient."

A French officer quarreling with a Swiss, reproached him with his country's vice of fighting on either side for money. While we Frenchmen, said he, fight for honour, "Yes, sir," replied the Swiss, "every one fights for that which he most wants."

SCIENTIFIC.

Reasons for supposing that the great lakes of North America were originally composed of salt water.

The remains of marine animals throughout the continents of the earth have long been called as proofs that the ocean formerly covered them, lithophytous and testaceous substances are so numerous, and distinguishable, that in the present case the mind is easily led to this conclusion. They abound the greater part of the way from Cayuga to Buffalo and Erie through the counties of Seneca, Ontario, Genesee and Niagara, a distance of more than one hundred miles. They are found also in Montgomery, Madison, St. Lawrence, Oneida, and other counties. At the remarkable sulphurous spring in the town of Phelps, eleven miles north-west of Geneva, they appear like corallines and madreporas. On both sides of the Genesee and Tonawanta rivers, they resemble marine shells, while on the East and West banks of Niagara river, they assume, in addition to the already enumerated forms, those that have erroneously been called petrified wasp-nests and honey-combs. In some cases these calcareous petrifications are blended with pyrites and in others they are impregnated with a petroleum or bituminous matter called Seneca oil. On viewing these appearances, the mind recurs to the unascertained time when oceanic water of the primitive globe rolled over this land, and afterwards on the emigration of the latter, withdrew to valleys and lower receptacles. The saline waters were thus collected in the places they have since occupied, while the upland became bare and dry, on the subsidence of the deluge.

It may therefore be reasonably concluded, that the inferior seas, now mis-called lakes, were originally filled with salt water. Their present freshness, on this supposition, is the consequence of the dilution they have undergone, changing them from briny seas to fresh lakes. To understand the subject, let Ontario, Erie and the Upper lakes of North America, be compared with the collections of salt water, in the other parts of the world.

The Caspian is naturally salt, and retains that quality because there is no outlet, the waters it receives by the rivers and rains are so nearly balanced by that which goes off by evaporation, that this reservoir has never burst its boundary. The like observation applies to the Dead Sea in Syria. The exhalation from its surface seems to be supplied from the influx of the Jordan. And there has been no sufficient accumulation to force a passage out. The Mediterranean has a communication with the Atlantic, and its saltiness is preserved by the great supplies it receives through the Herculean Straits near Gibraltar. The same remark may be made concerning the Euxine: though the large and numerous fresh rivers which empty into it, co-operating with its more northern and cold situation, impel the saline part of it through the Teraecian Bosphorus and Straits of the Dardanelles into the Archipelago. Should the supply through the Danube, the Dniester, the Don and other tributary rivers, be more considerable than the quantity carried off in vapour, the Black Sea must find a discharge into the Egean and a diminution of its saltiness by dilution with river water, be the consequence. It is accordingly well understood that the Euxine is undergoing the freshening process, which has long ago been completed in the great American lakes.

The Mexican presents a case, which strongly corroborates this doctrine. Of the two lakes which in part health and convenience to the city of Mexico, the upper one is fresh and the lower salt. The salt is not a muriate, but a carbonate of soda, like that of the Nitrian pools of Egypt; the argument loses none of its force on that account. Two streams which enter the upper lake have washed out the alkali, and carried it down to the lower basin. From this latter, in dry seasons, more water goes off by exhalation than comes in by the current. Extensive shoals are left bare and incrustated with alkaline crystals which the natives gather and sell, when from copious rains this lower lake rises above a certain height, it overflows, as some other ponds are known to do, and finds an occasional outlet.

The inland seas of North America differ from all those cases, except that of the upper lake of Mexico. They are unlike the Caspian and Julian seas, because these latter have no outlets. They vary from the Mediterranean and Euxine, inasmuch as their supplies are abundant, and the outlets of the American lakes pass along such declivities, and are so rapid and precipitous, that the current always sets vehemently one way, and wholly prevents a reflux, and they can scarcely receive a more apt and happy illustration than the Mexican lakes afford. Their original saltiness may therefore be conceived as having been subjected to incessant dilution, and the freshened waters as having left their reservoir, never to flow back.

Under such circumstances where the salt water was constantly going forth, and the fresh water running in it must necessarily have happened, that the former would gradually be exhausted, and in its place occupied by the latter. Thus it may be conceived, that the ancient saltiness of our lakes was lost. When however we survey the marine exuviae on their shores we can with difficulty refuse full credit to these evidences of the former state of things.

When also we reflect that Erie abounds with sturgeons who never visit the ocean, we must conclude that fish, which used to migrate from sea to river, and from salt to fresh, has gradually been weaned from his marine habits, and become a perfect fresh water animal.

The salmon of Ontario is believed by some to be a witness of the same fact. Since the transition, it is said he has acquired the faculty of living without brine and become contented with the unsalted water of his native lake.

The Gazette de Picardie states that a woman of Barwhein, in Belgium, who had contracted habits of intoxication, perished lately by spontaneous combustion. Persons who were present, says this journal, declare that the fire commenced in the mouth, and then extended to the breast and arms.

AMERICAN MASONIC REGISTER.

ALBANY, SATURDAY, NOV. 9, 1839.

WANTED.—A competent person, to act during this winter, as travelling Agent. The applicant must have attained the degree of Master Masons; to such a person we can offer liberal inducements.

The call upon our time, in other branches of the business, for the last two or three weeks, has prevented that attention to the paper, which we intend to give it. We will try and do better for the future.

The Hon. Joseph M. White died at St. Louis, a few days since.

The St. Louis Republican, under the head of "Bank Suspensions," says that the Sheriff, under the direction of the Court, will publicly burn six Roulette tables, two Pino Banks and a lot of other gambling utensils, taken on the race ground, contrary to the laws in such cases made and provided.

Dr. Peck, of Washington, Ky., died in a fit of mental excitement, during the great race over the Oakland course at Louisville, between Wagner and Grey Eagle. It is said that he had $10,000 bet upon the race.

Suicide from mental derangement.—The Easton Whig states that Mr. Unanget, of William township, committed suicide on Saturday last by hanging himself to an apple tree in his orchard.

Distressing Accident.—A little girl, 11 years of age, the family of Mr. Miller in New Township, Ct., while studying her school lesson on Sunday night last, fell asleep, when the light by which she was studying came in contact with her clothes, and she was so severely burned as to cause her death in a few hours.

A correspondent of the N. Y. Courier says:

I have little to say on the subject of Eastern affairs important though the subject be. No step has been taken since my last that can throw any light upon it. The much boasted union of the Five Powers is now discredited, and with reason. The interests of France, England and Russia are conflicting.

Six thousand bushels of wheat arrived at Sandusky last Wednesday week, which were sold for 75 cts. a bushel.

The French and British fleets, (about ten sail of the line each) are still at the mouth of the Dardanelles. The Turkish and most part of the Egyptian fleets are in the harbor of Alexandria.

I should observe that a letter from Constantinople dated 23d Sept. announces that the harvest has failed generally in Turkey, and that the prices of grain in the markets of the Black Sea was hourly rising.

Unprecedented Destruction of Property by Fires.—There have been in this country, since the beginning of this month, no less than twenty-four fires that we have account of, and the following is a list of them:

Fires. Buildings.		Loss.
In New York	7	$1,000,000
Mobile	6	1,600,000
Philadelphia	2	1,000,000
Alton, Ill.	1	20,000
Newark, N. J.	2	25,000
New Orleans	1	20,000
Norfolk	1	10,600
Aiken, S. C.	1	100,000
York, Pa.	1	5,000
Louisville, Ky.	1	10,000
W. Boylston	1	50,000
24	600	$4,040,000

Suspected Murder—Horrid Details.—The New York Evening Star says, that the dead body of a female white child, shockingly mutilated and bruised, with a long string tied tight round her neck the skull smashed in, and one of the legs nearly eaten off by the pigs, was found early this morning, in the middle of the street, partially covered by a pile of dirt, in Barclay street, near College Place. The body was perfectly naked, and the child of robust size, and about six months old. The workmen were labouring there till six last evening, and it is presumed that the infant was murdered and thrown into the street last night, or before day-break this morning, by some inhuman monster of a mother.

A Distressing death.—Says the same paper, an account of which we have not seen in any of the papers, occurred a few days since near Fort Neck, in Queens co. An Englishman, on a shooting excursion in that quarter, with his fowling piece in his hand heavily charged, was listening to the instructions of a young blacksmith where to find game, when the gun went off passed through the blacksmith's thigh, above the knee, shattering the bone to pieces, and severing the large arteries. After bleeding profusely he was put into a wagon, where convulsive spasms ensued from extreme agony, and in a few moments after reaching a house was dead—having doubtless died partly from exhaustion and partly from extreme irritation on the nervous system by the splintered extremities of the bone.

Fire at Charleston, Knawha.—The stables of Belen and Walker, stage proprietors, at Charleston, (K) were destroyed last week, with sixteen horses and several carriages, besides a large amount of other valuable property.

The Count Mailly Latour Landry, a French nobleman, lately deceased, has left to trustees the sum of 30,000 francs, to be distributed annually to poor young artists of talent, who have not the means of prosecuting their studies.

Mrs. Charles Matthews has published volumes three and four of her memoirs of her husband, the celebrated comedian. The London papers make copious extracts, and speak of the volumes as abounding with interesting matter.

Death of Theodore Sedgwick.—The Argus of this morning announces the death of Theodore Sedgwick, Esq. at Pittsfield, Mass. He died of Apoplexy, soon after addressing a public meeting. Mr. S. was formerly a Law Partner of Harmanus Bleecker, Esq.

The friends and acquaintances of Mary J. Worth, deceased, and of the family, are invited to attend her funeral from the residence of her brother Col. Worth, No. 77 Pearl street, this afternoon at half past three o'clock.

THE LEBANON SHAKER GIRL.

Where was thy heart, thou dark ey'd maid;
Was it not roaming far away,
When to the crowd thy glances strayed,
Among the gaudy and the gay?

Was it not then thy bosom burned
For that great world of glare and show;
From which thy youthful steps had turned
The wants of inward peace to know?

Thy simple dress, thy look demure,
But illy hide the thoughts within;
Which thro' a mind serene and pure,
Long other joys than these to win.

Thou art with those that round the throng,
With them in dance, with them in prayer,
But o'er thee comes a feeling strong
That tells thy heart no longer there.

Why shouldst thou shade thy sunny eye?
Why shouldst thou hide thy raven hair?
When other scenes before thee lie,
Which such as thou were formed to share

I throw aside thy garb again,
And light with smiles thy sadden'd face,
Pure as thou art so pure remain,
But find a fitter, cheerier place.

IMPROMTU.

THE SHAKER GIRL'S REPLY.

Unmeaning were those rites to thee,
Seemless, and void the path I trod,
But in my soul, my spirit free,
The essence of true piety glowed.

Thou ask'st me now, where was my heart,
As thus devotedly I prayed,
Thou say'st that when I feigned this part,
My soul would gladly far have strayed.

"Among the gaudy and the gay,"
With them their trifling joys to share,
With them t' enjoy the short liv'd day,
That waits attendance on the fair.

And proud one, dost thou vainly think
I would exchange the bliss I feel,
For toys like these, found on the brink
Of life, whose end their own must seal?

And dost thou tell me, wander far
From this my loved, my chosen place,
And 'neath another, brighter star,
Light up with smiles my sadden'd face?

Go, vain one, take the tender rose,
That blooms in arbour pure and fair,
Where the soft breeze upon it blows,
And spicy fragrance fills the air;

Transplant it on the dusty road
Where business rolls its wheels along,
Without a safe guard high and broad,
To screen it from the careless throng.

Then, as it droops its lovely head,
Then, as its petals fade and fall,
Then, as thou mourn'st the rose that's dead
Thou hast't an answer to thy call.

No foolish one, full well I know
That this drear world is cold and vain;
Deceitful, gaudy, empty show;
Has ever, ever been its bane.

Let those who will its mandates heed,
Let those who will its flag unfurl,
Mine by the place, mine be the creed
Of Lebanon's low Shaker Girl.

THE HOUR OF DEATH.

BY MRS. HEKMAN.

Leaves have their time to fall,
And flowers to wither at the north wind's breath
And stars to set—but all,
Thou hast all seasons for thine own, Oh, Death!

Day is for mortal care,
Eve for glad meetings round the joyous hearth,
Night for the dreams of sleep, the voice of prayer,
But all for thee, thou mightiest of the earth!

The banquet hath its hour,
Its feverish hour of mirth, and song, and wine;
There comes a day for grief's overwhelming power,
A time for soft tears—but all are thine!

Youth and the opening rose
May look like things too glorious for decay,
And smile at thee! but thou art not of those
That wait the ripened bloom to seize their prey!

Leaves have their time to fall,
And flowers to wither at the north wind's breath,
And stars to set—but all,
Thou hast all seasons for thine own, Oh, Death!

We know when moons shall wane,
When summer birds from far shall cross the sea,
When autumn's hue shall tinge the golden grain—
But who shall teach us when to look for thee?

Is it when spring's first gale
Comes forth to whisper where the violets lie?
Is it when roses in our paths grow pale?
They have one season—all are ours to die!

Thou art where billows foam—
Thou art where music melts upon the air—
Thou art around us in our peaceful home,
And the world calls forth—and thou art there!

Thou art where friend meets friend
Beneath the shadow of the elm to rest:
Thou art where foe meets foe and trumpets rend
The skies, and swords beat down the princely crest!

Leaves have their time to fall,
And flowers to wither at the north wind's breath,
And stars to set—but all,
Thou hast all seasons for thine own, Oh, death!

WHO IS MY NEIGHBOUR?

BY WILLIAM CUTTER.

Thy neighbour? It is he whom thou
Hast power to aid and bless—
Whose aching heart, and burning brow,
Thy soothing hand may press.

Thy neighbour? 'tis the the fainting poor,
Whose eye with want is dim,
Whom hunger sends from door to door—
Go thou, and succour him.

Thy neighbour? 'tis that weary man,
Whose years are at their brim,
Bent low with sickness, care and pain—
Go thou, and comfort him.

Thy neighbour? 'tis the heart bereft
Of every earthly gem—
Widow and orphan, helpless left—
Go thou, and shelter them.

Thy neighbour? yonder slave,
Fettered in thought and limb,
Whose hopes are all beyond the grave—
Go thou, and ransom him.

Whene'er thou meet'st a human form
Less favoured than thine own,
Remember, 'tis thy neighbour worn,
Thy brother, or thy son.

Oh! pass not, pass not heedless by—
Perhaps thou can'st redeem
One breaking heart from misery—
Go, share thy lot with him.

THE SLANDERER.

O, may the wretch to scandal given,
Be still the most accursed of Heaven,
From ev'ry social circle driven,
With stern disdain;
His envious rotten bosom riven,
With keenest pain.
The fiend, who could in spiteful jest
The honest fame of friend molest,
And fill with grief the virtuous breast,
Where'er he goes,
But still considered friendship's pest,
The worst of foes.

SHERIFF'S OFFICE.—City and county of Albany, August 7, 1839.

ELECTION NOTICE.—A general election is to be held in the county of Albany on the 4th, 5th, and 6th, days of November next at which will be chosen the officers mentioned in the notice from the Secretary of State, of which a copy is annexed.

MICHAEL ARTHUR, Sheriff,
State of New York, Secretary's Office,
Albany, Aug. 15, 1839.

Sir—Notice is hereby given you that the term of service of James Powers, a Senator of the Third Senate District of this state will expire on the last day of December next, and that a senator is to be chosen in that district, to which the county of which you are sheriff belongs, at the general election to be held on the fourth, fifth and sixth days of November next.

You will also take notice, that a vacancy has been caused in the representation of the Third Senate District, by the death of Noadiah Johnson, a senator from that district, whose term of office would have expired on the last day of December, 1840; and that a senator to supply the said vacancy is to be chosen at the said next general election.

You will also take notice, that a proposed amendment to the constitution is to be submitted to the people at the said election, at which the electors are to vote, "For the election of Mayors by the People," or "Against the election of Mayors by the People." At the same election the following officers are to be chosen, viz: Three members of Assembly.

JOHN C. SPENCER, Secretary of State.

N.B. You are to give notice of the aforesaid election, in writing to one of the inspectors of each town and ward in your county, and annex thereto a copy of this notice. You are also to publish the said notice and copy in all the public newspapers printed in your county.

Tranquilla per virtutem patet unica vita.—Juv. Sat.

THE HISTORY OF FREEMASONRY,

DRAWN FROM AUTHENTIC SOURCES OF INFORMATION.

When men are in a state of barbarity and are scattered over the surface of a country in small and independent tribes, their wants are as small in magnitude as they are few in number. It is in the power, therefore, of every individual, to perform, for himself and his family, every work of labor which necessity or comfort requires; and while, at one time, he equips himself for the chase or the combat, at another, he is rearing a habitation for his offspring, or hollowing his canoe to surmount the dangers of the sea. But as soon as these tribes associate together, for the purposes of mutual protection and comfort, civilization advances apace; and, in the same proportion, the wants and desires of the community increase. In order to gratify these, the ingenuity of individuals is called forth; and those, who, from inability or indolence, cannot satisfy their own wants, will immediately resort to the superior skill of their neighbours. Those members of the community, who can execute their work with the greatest elegance and celerity, will be most frequently employed; and, from this circumstance, combined with the principle of emulation, and other causes, that distinction of profession will arise, which is found only among nations considerably advanced in civilization and refinement.

One of the first objects of man, in a rude state, is to screen himself and his family from the heat of the tropic sun, from the inclemency of the polar regions, or from the sudden changes of more temperate climates. If he has arrived at such a degree of improvements, as to live under the dominion of a superior, and under the influence of religious belief, the palace of his King, and the temple of his Gods, will be reared in the most magnificent style, which his skill can devise, and his industry accomplish*, and decked with those false ornaments, which naturally catch the eye of unpolished men. From that principle, which impels the lower orders to imitate the magnificence and splendor of their superiors, a foundation will be laid for improvement in the art of building; and it is extremely probable, from the circumstances, which have been mentioned, as well as from others, which the slightest reflection will suggest, that architecture will be the first profession, to which men will exclusively devote their attention; and for which they will be trained by an established course of preparatory education.

Nor is it from this ground only, that masonry derives its superiority as a separate profession. While many other arts administer to our luxury and pride, and gratify only those temporary wants and unnatural desires which refinement has rendered necessary, the art of building can lay claim to a higher object. The undertaking of the architect, not only furnishes us with elegant and comfortable accommodation from the inclemency of the seasons, from the rapacity of wild beasts, and the still more dangerous rapacity of man; they contribute also to the ornament and glory of nations, and it is to them that we are indebted for those fortresses of strength, which defend us from the roads of surrounding enemies. Nor can the works of the architect be ranked among those objects which furnish amusement and accommodation for a few years or at most during the short term of human life; they descend unimpaired to generations; they acquire additional grandeur and value from an increase of age; and are the only specimens of human labor which in some measure, survive the revolutions of kingdoms and the waste of time. The splendid remains of Egyptian, Grecian and Roman architecture, which, in every age, have attracted the attention of the learned, and excited the astonishment of the vulgar, are standing monuments of the ingenuity and power of man; and, in ages yet to come, they will reflect a dignity on the art of building, to which no other profession can arrogate the slightest claim.

But still there is another consideration, which entitles architecture to a decided pre-eminence among the other arts. It is itself the parent of many separate professions; and requires a combination of talents, and an extent of knowledge, for which other professions have not the smallest occasion. An acquaintance with the sciences of geometry, and mechanical philosophy, with the arts of sculpture and design, and other abstruse and elegant branches of knowledge are indispensable requisites in the education of an architect; and raise his art to a vast height above those professions, which practice alone can render familiar, and which consist in the mere exertion of muscular force. It appears, then, from these considerations, that there is some foundation, in the very nature of architecture, for those extraordinary privileges, to which Masons have always laid claim, and which they have almost always possessed—privileges, which no other artist could have confidence to ask, or liberty to enjoy; and there appears to be some foundation for that ancient and respectable order of Freemasons whose origin we are now to investigate, and whose progress we are soon to detail.

But, that we may be enabled to discover Freemasonry under those various forms, which it has assumed in different countries, and at different times, before it received the name which it now bears, it will be necessary to give a short description of the nature of this institution, without developing those mysteries, or revealing those ceremonial observances which are known only to the brethren of the order.

Freemasonry is an ancient and respectable institution, embracing individuals of every nation, and of every condition in life. Wealth, power, and talents are not necessary to the person of a Freemason. An unblemished character and a virtuous conduct, are the only qualifications which are requisite for admission into the Order. In order to confirm this institution, and attain the ends, for which it was formed, every candidate must come under a solemn engagement never to divulge the mysteries and ceremonies of the Order, nor communicate to the uninitiated, those important precepts, with which he may be intrusted; and those proceedings and plans, in which the Fraternity may be engaged. After the candidate has undergone the necessary ceremonies and received the usual instructions, appropriate words, and significant signs are imparted to him, that he may be enabled to distinguish his Brethren of the Order from the uninitiated public; and convince others that he is entitled to the privileges of a Brother, should he be visited by distress or want, in a distant land. If the newly admitted member be found qualified for a higher degree, he is promoted, after due intervals of probation, till he has received that Masonic knowledge, which enables him to hold the highest offices of trust, to which the Fraternity can raise its members. In all ages, it has been the object of Freemasonry, not only to inform the minds of its members by instructing them in the sciences and useful arts, but to better their hearts by enforcing the precepts of religion and morality. In the course of the ceremonies of initiation, brotherly love, loyalty, and other virtues, are inculcated in hieroglyphic symbols; and the candidate is often reminded, that there is an eye above which observeth the workings of his heart, and is ever fixed upon the thoughts and the actions of men. At regular and appointed seasons, convivial meetings of the Fraternity are held in lodges constructed for this purpose: Temperance, harmony, and joy, characterise these mixed assemblies. All distinctions of rank seem to be laid aside, all difference in religious and political sentiments are forgotten; and those petty quarrels which disturbed the quiet of private life, cease to agitate the mind. Every one strives to give happiness to his brother; and men seem to recollect, for once, that they are sprung from the same origin, that they are possessed of the same nature and are destined for the same end.

Such are the general features of an institution, which has of late produced so great division in the sentiments of the learned, respecting its origin and tendency. While a certain class of men,* a little over-anxious for the dignity of their Order, have represented it as coeval with the world; others, influenced by an opposite motive, have maintained it to be an invention of English Jesuits, to promote the views of that intriguing and dangerous association.† Some philosophers, among whom we may reckon the celebrated Chevalier Ramsay, have laboured to prove, that Freemasonry arose during the Crusades; that it was a secondary order of chivalry; that its forms originated from that warlike institution; and were adapted to the peaceful habits of scientific men.‡ Mr. Clinch|| has attempted, with considerable ingenuity and learning, to deduce its origin from the institution of Pythagoras. M. Barruel§ supposed, that it is a continuation of the Temples; while others, with a great degree of audacity and malice, rarely to be found in the character of ingenious men, have imputed the origin of Freemasonry to secret associations, averse to the interests of true government and pursuing the villainous and chimerical project of leveling the distinctions of society, and freeing the human mind from the sacred obligations of morality and religion.

Without adopting any of these untenable opinions, or attempting to discover the precise period when Freemasonry arose, it may be sufficient to show, that it can justly lay claim to an early origin, and that it has existed from that period to the present day, under different forms, and different appellations¶. In the ex-

¶ M. Mounier observes, that if the Order of Freemasons existed among the ancients, it would have been mentioned by contemporary authors. This argument; cution of this task, the candid enquirer will be satisfied with strong and numerous resemblances, as the nature of the subject excludes the possibility of rigid demonstration. Every human institution is subject to great and numerous variations; the different aspects under which they appear, and the principles by which they are regulated, depend upon the progress of civilization upon the nature of the government by which they are protected, and on the peculiar opinions and habits of their members. If, therefore, in comparing Freemasonry with other ancient associations, we should find it coincide with them in every circumstance, there would be strong reasons for suspecting, that the imagination of the writer had counterfeited resemblances when destitute of authentic information; or that the order had adopted the rites and ceremonies of antiquity, to cloak the recency of their origin, to command the veneration and excite the notice of the public. Against Freemasonry, however, this charge cannot be preferred: We shall have occasion to consider it when connected with the idolatry of the heathens, when devoted to the church of Rome, and when flourishing under the milder influence of the reformed religion.

however, for the recency of their origin, is far from being conclusive. A secret association, unconnected with national affairs, would seldom come under the consideration of cotemporary writers, who could only tell their readers that such an association existed. They who believe that the Eleusinian mysteries were those of Freemasonry, under a different appellation, will deny the premises from which Mounier's conclusion is drawn. These mysteries existed in the eighth century of the Christian era and have been mentioned by cotemporary authors on account of their connection with the history of the times and the religion of their country. From the eighth century, to the revival of learning in Europe, Freemasonry must have been in a very languishing condition, and could not engage the attention of writers, when but few lodges, and still fewer authors existed. The minds of men were then bent upon less noble pursuits. Science and common sense could not be found; and those amiable propensities of the heart upon which Freemasonry is founded, were smothered; under that debasing superstition, which characterised those ages of ignorance and iniquity.

CHARACTER.

For the American Masonic Register and Literary Companion,
YOUTH.

As another mean of promoting education among the young, I would mention the readings of dramas. This however may be dispensed with easier and with much less disadvantage than the preceding one, or the two I shall hereafter advance. Of dramas I have little or nothing to say. At the present time we are sadly deficient in dramatists; but like every thing else they have their day. Never perhaps shall we behold a better delineator of nature than Shakespeare.

Thrice happy! could we catch great Shakespeare's art,
To trace the deep recesses of the heart;
His simple plain sublime, to which is given
To strike the soul with darted flame from heaven

Thompson.

They are beneficial for the human nature they display. This is the most remarkable characteristic of them; and so long as they present a faithful copy of the human heart, so long should they be read by all who wish to be esteemed as men of general information. They also give the most perfect specimens of the beautiful and sublime in writing; but this is to be considered of minor importance compared with the other. Shakespeare has given us the true manner in which they should be written. For his close adherence to nature he has justly merited the appellation—Father of the Drama. He has combined originality and the beauty and elegance of language with a faithful representation of the human heart, and herein he has no equal, nay, not even one, who dare lay any claim to equality.

But Shakespeare's magic could not copied be;
Within that circle none durst walk but he.

Dryden.

A knowledge of the deep and secret workings of the heart, a knowledge of man, is a desideratum above all most every thing else. He who wishes to be informed on this subject, can have no better school than the legitimate drama.

POETRY, I would have the student rank as high as any kind of writing except history. Before I proceed to an exhibition of the elegancies and results of poetical reading, I would introduce this beautiful quotation as a sort of sentimental motto.

The poet's eye, in a fine frenzy rolling,
Doth glance from heaven to earth, from earth to heaven,
And, as imagination bodies forth
The forms of things unknown, the poet's pen
Turns them to shapes, and gives to airy nothing
A local habitation and a name.—Shak.

Poetry, in the early ages of society, as far back as when Greece was in a flourishing condition, was the only kind of composition that exerted any influence.—Go back to Homer, the Father of Poets, and you will have a true picture of the esteem, the ancients had for this style of writing. So sublime and touching were his verses, that they were required to be learned by the young in their schools; and well would it be if coercion were used at this day in the same thing. Poetry is gifted with an omnipotence, a power of inciting the reader to any deed of daring. It had this effect upon the Greeks. Never would they have stood the brunt of battle with that firmness if Homer had not inspired them with a warlike spirit. Metamorphose the Iliad or Odyssey into prose, and half its force, beauty, and enlivening qualities, are lost; and the like result will be with any of our popular poems. Poetry draws the reader along through every scene it describes.—When it paints a battle, it places him in the field, and he almost hears the thundering of the cannon and sees wounded falling at his feet. Dr. Darwin has given us a very fine instance of this:

Near and more near the intrepid beauty press'd.
Saw through the driving smoke his dancing crest;
Saw on his helm, her virgin hands inwove,
Bright stars of gold, and mystic knots of love;
Heard the exulting shout, 'they run, they run!'—
'Great God!' she cried, 'he's safe, the battle's won!'—
A ball now hisses through the airy tides
(Some fury wing'd it, and some demon guides.)
Parts her fine locks, her graceful head that deck'
Wounds her fair ear, and sinks into her neck;
The red stream issuing from her azure veins,
Dyes her white veil, her ivory bosom stains!

This is certainly a most beautiful exemplification of the power of poetry. It places the reader in the midst of the conflict—he in fact sees the lady fall, and the blood gush from her wound. Let these same sentiments be expressed in a prosaic style, and their worth will be entirely lost. When poetry describes a rural life, its felicities and advantages, how it makes one loathe the city with all its appurtenances. When it places before the eye the solar system—the revolution of the planets and the laws which govern them, it fills the mind with a secret pleasure, it pours into the heart a joyful solemnity. The rythmical structure and the equal number of syllables in each line are mnemonic properties by which a piece of poetry may be committed to memory in half the time a piece of prose of equal length can. The melody of the lines so please the ear that it can be recollected much longer than any other style of writing. It is certainly necessary every young man should read the standard poetical works, such as Shakespeare, Milton, Dryden, Byron, Pope, and others. The poems of David, present the most striking illustration of the wonderful effects of poetry. Only those poets the public have ranked high, should be studied. The common every day rhyme that appears in our newspapers is not poetry; but sentiments or sentences collected from the standard poets or prose writers, and mangled and torn to pieces by some scape-grace.—'Try poetry by this standard: that which wearies, on acquaintance, is false; that which improves is true.'—I have omitted saying any thing of its character in the earlier ages of society, both for the want of time and the fullness it would be to the reader. For the same reason I have also omitted going into the proofs that poetry is an older medium for the communication of thought than prose.

Lastly, I would mention history as the most important branch of reading. To the young it is of most inestimable advantage, and should be the least neglected. No special course can be very well pointed out, as the youth of our land have different professions in view, and each of these professions require a different course. A few historical works can be named that ought to be studied by all, such as Rollin, Hume, Robertson, Goldsmith, &c. Among the more modern, Marshall's Life of Washington, which may as properly be termed, The History of the American Revolution. There are several other American histories, the youth should read attentively whatever may be his business in after life. They can be found in almost all our libraries. There are those that will exert a deleterious influence, unless the principles of the reader are firmly fixed. Among these, Hume's is the most prominent, and perhaps Gibbon's may be ranked next. Hume's infidel principles and want of veracity make him a dangerous author to the young. President Jefferson severely and justly condemns his History of England. 'Were it faithful, it would be the finest piece of history that ever was written. Its unfortunate bias may be partly ascribed to the accident of his having written backwards. His maiden work was the history of the Stuarts—the object of this work was an apology for them. He spared nothing, therefore, to wash them white and to palliate their misgovernment. For this purpose he suppressed truths, advanced falsehoods, forged authorities, and falsified records. All this is proved on him unanswerably by Brodie, but so bewitching was his style, and manner, that his readers were unwilling to doubt any thing, swallowed every thing, and all England became torries by the magic of his art. His pen revolutionized the public sentiment of that country more completely than the standing armies could even have done, which were deprecated by the patriots of that day.' Such is the opinion of Jefferson. He ought also to have set his face against the infidelity running through the whole history. The good he might have done by so doing would have been incalculable. Suffice it to say, that the young must expect forever to remain in the lower walks of their profession, unless they have a thorough knowledge of this kind of reading.

I have pointed out in the best manner possible what should be done to make a thorough-bred scholar. It remains now with the young to say whether they will be one or not. Here are two roads; at the end of one is happiness, peace, and prosperity—at the end of the other is infelicity, trouble, and misfortune; choose ye, while the freshness and vigor of life is yours, which road you will take.

NOTICES OF LEARNED FEMALES.

It is wrong to deny that the fair sex are capable of literature; all the old philosophers thought better of them. Pythagoras instructed not men only, but women; and among them Theano, whom Laertius makes to be his wife, and St. Clement calls the first of women declaring, that she philosophized and wrote poems.—The stoics, epicureans, and even the academics, delivered their lessons freely to both sexes and all conditions. Themistocles, the wife of Leontius, to whom there is extant an epistle of Epicurus, was a disciple of this philosopher.

Atossa, queen of Persia, is said to be the first who taught the art of writing epistles.

In the time of Alexander the Great, flourished Hipparchia, the sister of Metrocles the cynic, and wife of Crates. She wrote of philosophical arguments, essays, and questions, to Theorus, surnamed the Deist.

Pamphilia the Egyptian, who lived in the time of Nero, wrote eight books of historical miscellanies.

Agillis of Coreyra is celebrated for skill in grammar. She ascribes the invention of the play at ball to her country-woman Nausica, who is the only one of all heroines that Homer introduces at this diversion.

Quintilian celebrates three Roman women in words to this effect. "Cornelia, the mother of the Gracchi, contributed much to the eloquence of her sons; and her learned style is handed down to posterity in letters. The daughter of Lælius expressed in her conversation the eloquence of her father. There is an oration of the daughter of Quintus Hortensius, delivered before the Triumvirs, which will ever be read to the honor of her sex." Quintilian has omitted the learned consort of Varus, and Cornificia the poetess, who left behind her the most exquisite epigrams. This lady, who flourished in the reign of Octavius Caesar, used to say, that learning was free, as being entirely out of the reach of fortune.

Catharine of Alexandria was a most learned lady, if we may credit what is related of her. She is said to have disputed with fifty philosophers, at the age of only 18 years, and so far to have overcome them by the subtlety of her discourse, as to have converted them to the christian religion.

Who was more learned than Zenobia, queen of Palmyra, by religion a Jew? We have the testimony of her conqueror himself, the emperor Aurelian, to her character, in his letters to the Roman senate. Trebellius Pollio says, she spoke Egyptian, read Latin into Greek, and wrote an abridgement both of the Alexandrine and Oriental history. Her master in the Greek was Dionysius Longinus, who had before taught Porphyrus, and who was called a living library, in a walking museum.

Sosipatra, wife of the famous Eustathius, remembered the finest passages of all the poets, philosophers, and orators, and had an almost inimitable talent at explaining them. Though her husband was a man of prime rank in learning, yet she so far outshone him, as to obscure his glory; and after his death, she took upon her the education of youth.

What shall we say of Eustochium, daughter of Paula the Roman, who was learned in Latin, Greek and Hebrew, and most assiduous in the study of the sacred scriptures? St. Jerome speaks of her in her praise. There are epistles of the same father extant to several illustrious women, as Paula, Læta, Fabiola, Marcella, Furia, Demetria, Salvia, Gerontia, &c.—Why should we mention others, to whom there are letters extant of Ambrose, Augustin, and Fulgentius? The compliments of the fathers are testimonies of their learning.

Hypatia was the daughter of that Theon of Alexandria, whose writings now remain. She was a vast proficient in astronomy. This lady was murdered through religious frenzy, by the Alexandrine mob, because she made frequent visits to Orestes the philosopher. Some accuse Cyril, surnamed the Saint, as the author of this inhumanity: but those who are willing to exculpate him, lay the charge upon Theodorus, his reader or curate.

At the same time flourished Endocia, whose name before was Athenais, daughter of Leontius the philosopher, and consort of the emperor Theodosius the younger. She was deeply read both in Greek and Latin learning, skilled in poetry, mathematics, and all the philosophical sciences.

About the year of Christ 500, Amalasuenta, the daughter of Theoric, king of the Goths, and wife of Eutharic, who was made counsellor by the emperor or Justin, was celebrated both for her learning and her wisdom. Princes are said to come and advise with her, and admire her great understanding. She took upon her the administration of affairs in the name of her son Athalaric, who was left king at eight years of age, and whom she instructed in all the polite learning before unknown to the Goths; but this barbarous people made an insurrection on the occasion, and drove her out of authority.

Helpis, the learned wife of the learned Boethius, flourished in 530. She left behind her hymns to the apostles.

Bandonia, the scholar of St. Radegundis, wrote the life of her holy mistress, who died in 530.

About 650 flourished Hilda, an abbess celebrated by Pits among his English writers, and Bede in his Ecclesiastical History. She was daughter of Hereic, prince of Deira, and aunt of Adolph, king of the East Saxons.

Anno 770, St. Rictrude, a noble virgin, made great proficiency in literature under her master Alcuin: after whose departure out of England she shut herself up to her studies in the monastery of St. Bennet at Canterbury, where she produced many writings. St. Walpurg flourished about ten years after; and was also very famous.

Two centuries lower down, under the emperors Otto I and II, lived the nun Rhositar, skilled both in the Latin and Greek languages. She wrote a panegyric upon the deeds of the Othos, six comedies, the praises of the blessed virgin and Saint Dennis, in elegiac verses, with other works. In the year of Christ 1340 flourished Anna Comæna, daughter of Alexia Comæna, emperor of Constantinople. This princess, in the 15 books of her Alexiad, which she wrote upon the deeds of her father, displayed equally her eloquence and learning.

St. Hildegard of Mentz was famous about 8 years after; and at the same time flourished St. Elizabeth, of Schonau, sister of a certain king Egbert. The monkish writers celebrate them for their visions, which received the sanction of pope Eugenius III. But we mention them for their historical, didactical, and epistolary writings, a collection of which has been published. St. Catharine Senesis also wrote epistles, and various treatises in the dialogue manner which are now extant, as well as her life, written by Raimund her confessor, a dominican friar.

In the year 1484, under Charles VIII, king of France flourished Gabriele de Bourbon, princess of Trimouille. A catalogue of her various writings are preserved in French authors.

Three years after, Cassandra Fidele, a Venetian virgin, acquired great applause. By an excellent oration delivered publicly in the universities of Padua, in behalf of Betruti Lamberti, her relation, she won the supreme laurel crown in philosophy.

Alike for her own learning, and her patronage of the learned, Margaret of Valois, queen of Navarre, merited the praise of mankind. Joan the daughter of this princess had by Antony of Bourbon, Henry IV king of France, founder of the family of the late reigning monarch.

Bologna boasts of several learned women, among which were Joanna Blanchetta, and Novella Andrea; and of the learning of Catharina Landa, we read in Bembo's epistles.

In the year of Christ 1533, Catharine queen of England aunt by the mother's side to the emperor Charles V, wrote Meditations upon the Psalms, also a book of the lamentations of a sinner.

What shall we say of her sister Joanna, married to Philip archduke of Austria, duke of Burgundy, and by his wife king of Spain! She answered extempore in Latin the orations made to her in that tongue, in a progress through her several towns and cities after her accession.

Sir Thomas More, chancellor of England, had three daughters, Margaret, Elizabeth, and Cæcilia, of whom their father took care that they were not only chaste, but very learned; because he rightly judged, that their chastity would be by this means the more secure.

The learning of Fulvia Olympia Morata, daughter of Peregrine Moratus, is evident from the writings she has left. And that Hippolyta Taurella's was equal appears from her pieces collected together with those of Morata.

It is needless to quote queen Elizabeth, or the lady Jane Grey, as eminent instances of this kind; because the English historians are full of their praises upon the subject.

Vossius also mentions Anne Schurman, whose Latin poetry recommends her to this day. He thinks that if this catalogue was added to those he had given before of the female poets and historians that sufficient examples would appear in behalf of the fair sex to prove they were equally capable of fine literature with the men.

SALMAGUNDI.

Francis I, having asked Castellan, bishop of Orleans, whether he was of noble extraction: "Sire," replied he. "Noah had three sons with him in the ark, I cannot say from which of them I am descended."

A French gentleman, totally unacquainted with our language, being introduced into a circle of young ladies and gentlemen in Boston, after the usual compliments had passed, seated himself beside a beautiful young lady, and being deprived of the satisfaction of conversing with her, he seized her by the hand and began to evince by his looks the emotion of his heart. She requested him to be easy; which he mistaking for the French word baisez (kiss me) began kissing her, to the great mirth of the company. The consequence was, that the ladies came to an unanimous determination never again to say "be easy" to a Frenchman.

I never knew but one person, said Sterne, who interfered between man and wife either with safety or success. Upon a domestic pro and con once between the parties, that was rising even to blows, a friend of mine, who happened to be by, hit the husband a stroke with his right hand, crying, "Be quiet, you brute;" and struck the woman at the same time with his left saying, "Hold your tongue, you vixen." Then repeating his moral admonitions and friendly buffets, with a "Peace, you monster—Have done you termagant it—Hands off, you coward—Retire, you virago"—a fit of shame and laughing seized them both at the same time, at such extraordinary and impartial an umpire; they shook hands, immediately, and became good friends for the remainder, of their lives.

A very thin audience attending the third representation of a new comedy, the author observed, "Oh, it is entirely owing to the war." "Oh, no, (cried the manager,) it is actually owing to the piece."

Affected Honesty—Look out of your door—take notice of that man—see what disquietude, intriguing and shifting he is content to go through with, merely to be thought a man of plain dealing. Three grains of honesty would have saved him all this trouble.

The "cheap defence of nations."—Dr. Franklin said "Where I see a house well-furnished with books and newspapers, there I see intelligent and well informed children: but if there are no books or papers, the children are ignorant, if not profligate."

Falstaff's soliloquy on Honour.—Owe heaven a death? 'Tis not due yet; and I would be loth to pay him before his day. What need I be so forward with him that calls not on me?—Well, 'tis no matter, honour pricks me on. But how, if honour pick me off when I come on? how then? Can honour set a leg? no: or an arm? no: or take away the grief of a wound? no.—Honour hath no skill in surgery, then? no. What is honour? a word. What is the word? a trim reckoning. Who hath it? he that died a Wednesday. Doth he feel it? no. Doth he hear it? no. Is it insensible, then? yea, to the dead. But will it not live with the living? no. Why? detraction will not suffer it; therefore, 'Til none of it. Honour is a mere scutcheon; and so ends my catechism.

[Shakspeare.]

A solicitor, who was remarkable for the length, and sharpness of his nose, once told a lady, that if she did not immediately settle a matter in dispute, he would file a bill against her. "Indeed, Sir," said the lady, there is no necessity for you to file your bill, for I am sure it is sharp enough already.

The first Coffee House in London.—Coffee is a native of Arabia, supposed by some to have been the chief ingredient of the old Lacedæmonian broth. The use of this berry was not known in England till the year 1657, at which time Mr. D. Edwards a Turkey merchant, on his return from Smyrna to London, brought with him one Pasquet Rosee, a Greek of Ragusa, who was used to prepare this liquor, for his master every morning, who, by the way, never wasted company. The merchant therefore, in order to get rid of a crowd of visitants, ordered his Greek to open a coffee house, which he did in St. Michael's alley in Cornhill. This was the first coffee house opened in London.

A barrister observed to a learned brother in Court, the other morning, that he thought his whiskers were very unprofessional. "You are right," replied his friend, "a lawyer cannot be too barefaced."

Some one observed, "Matches are made in heaven." "Yea," answered another, "and they are very often dropped in the other place."

"Does your husband expectorate?" said an apothecary in Cheltenham, to a poor Irish woman who had long visited the shop for her sick husband.—"Expect to ate yer honour—no shure, and Paddy does not expect to ate—he's nothing at all to ate!" The husband was sent a large bason of mixture from a tureen of soup, then smoking on his table.

Vinegar made from Honey.—If a pound of honey be dissolved in three or four quarts of water, and exposed to a temperature between the 79th and 80th degrees of Fahrenheit's thermometer, it will in a short time become a very agreeable acid liquor, which possesses an aromatic flavour, and strength, superior to that of the best vinegar made of white wine. As the latter is frequently adulterated, and incomparably more expensive than the substitute we have proposed, this appears to deserve every attention in domestic economy.—Dom Encyclopedia.

POPULAR TALES.

THE ADALANTADO OF THE SEVEN CITIES.

A LEGEND OF ST BRANDAN.

Don Fernando could scarcely believe but that this was all a dream. He fixed a scrutinizing gaze upon the grand chamberlain, who, having delivered his message, stood in buckram dignity, drawn up to his full stature, curling his whiskers, stroking his beard, and looking down upon him with inexpressible loftiness, through his lack-lustre eyes. There was no doubting the word of so grave and ceremonious a hidalgo.

Don Fernando now arrayed himself in gala attire.—He would have launched his boat, and gone on shore with his own men, but he was informed the barge of state was expressly provided for his accommodation, and, after the fete, would bring him back to his ship; in which, on the following day, he might enter the harbor in befitting style. He accordingly stepped into the barge, and took his seat beneath the awning. The grand chamberlain seated himself on the cushion opposite. The rowers bent to their oars, and renewed their mournful old ditty and the gurgeon, but unwieldy barge moved slowly and solemnly through the water.

The night closed in, before they entered the river.—They swept along, past rock and promontory, each guarded by its tower. The sentinels at every post challenged them as they passed by.

'Who goes there?'

'The Adalantado of the Seven Cities.'

'He is welcome. Pass on.'

On entering the harbor, they rowed close along an armed galley, of the most ancient form. Soldiers with cross bows were stationed on the deck.

'Who goes there?' was again demanded.

'The Adalantado of the Seven Cities.'

'He is welcome. Pass on.'

They landed at a broad flight of stone steps, leading up, between two massive towers, to the water-gate of the city, at which they knocked for admission. A sentinel, in an ancient steel casque, looked over the wall.

'Who is there?'

'The Adalantado of the Seven Cities.'

The gate swung slowly open, grating upon its rusty hinges. They entered between two rows of iron-clad warriors, in battered armor, with cross bows, battle-axes, and ancient maces, and with faces as old-fashioned and rusty as their armor. They saluted Don Fernando in military style, but with perfect silence, as he passed between their ranks. The city was illuminated, but in such manner as to give a more shadowy and solemn effect to its old-time architecture. There were bonfires in the principle streets, with groups about them in such old-fashioned garbs, that they looked like the fantastic figures that roam the streets in carnival time. Even the stately dames who gazed from the balconies, which they had hung with antique tapestry, looked more like effigies dressed up for a quaint mummery, than like ladies in their fashionable attire.—Every thing, in short, bore the stamp of former ages, as if the world had suddenly rolled back a few centuries. Nor was this to be wondered at. Had not the Island of the Seven Cities been for several hundred years cut off from all communication with the rest of the world, and was it not natural that the inhabitants should retain many of the modes and customs, brought here by their ancestors.

One thing, certainly they had conserved; the old-fashioned Spanish gravity and stateliness. Though this was a time of public rejoicing, and though Don Fernando was the object of their gratulations, every thing was conducted with the most solemn ceremony, and wherever he appeared, instead of acclamations, he was received with profound silence, and the most formal reverences and swaying of their sombreros.

Arrived at the palace of the Alcayde, the usual ceremonial was repeated. The Chamberlain knocked for admission.

'Who is there?' demanded the porter.

'The Adalantado of the Seven Cities.'

'He is welcome. Pass on.'

The portal was thrown open. The chamberlain led the way up a vast but heavily moulded marble stair-case, and so through one of those interminable suites of apartments, that are the pride of Spanish palaces. All were furnished in a style of obsolete magnificence. As they passed through the chambers, the title of Don Fernando was forwarded on by servants stationed at every door; and every where produced the most profound reverences and courtesies. At length they reached a magnificent saloon, blazing with tapers in which the Alcayde, and the principal dignitaries of the city, were waiting to receive their illustrious guest. The grand chamberlain presented Don Fernando in due form, and falling back among the other officers of the household, stood as usual curling his whiskers, and stroking his forked beard.

Don Fernando was received by the Alcayde and the other dignitaries with the same stately and formal courtesy that he had every where remarked. In fact, there was so much form and ceremonial, that it seemed difficult to get at any thing social or substantial.—Nothing but bows, and compliments, and old-fashioned courtesies. The Alcayde and his courtiers assembled, in face and form, those quaint worthies to be seen in the pictures of old illuminated manuscripts; while the cavaliers and dames who thronged the saloon, might have been taken for the antique figures of gobelin tapestry suddenly vivified and put in motion.

The banquet, which had been kept back until the arrival of Don Fernando, was now announced; and such a feast! such unknown dishes and obsolete dainties; with the peacock; that bird of state and ceremony, served up in full plumage, in a golden dish, at the head of the table. And then, as Don Fernando cast his eyes over the glittering board, what a vista of odd heads and head-dresses, of formal bearded dignitaries, and stately dames, with castellated lock and towering plumes!

As fate would have it, on the other side of Don Fernando, was seated the daughter of the Alcayde.—She was arrayed, it is true, in a dress that might have been worn before the flood; but then she had a melting black Andalusian eye, that was perfectly irresistible. Her voice, too, her manner, her movements, all smacked of Andalusia, and showed how female fascination may be transmitted from age to age, and clime to clime, without ever losing its power, or going out of fashion. Those who know the witchery of the sex, in that most amorous region of old Spain, may judge what must have been the fascination to which Don Fernando was exposed, when seated beside one of the most captivating of its descendants. He was, as has already been hinted, of an inflammable temperament, with a heart ready to get in a light blaze at every instant. And then he had been so wearied by pompous, tedious old cavaliers, with their formal bows and speeches; is it to be wondered at that he turned with delight to the Alcayde's daughter, all smiles, and dimples and melting looks and melting accents? Beside, for I wish to give him every excuse in my power, he was in a particularly excitable mood, from the novelty of the scene before him, and his head was almost turned with this sudden and complete realization of all his hopes and fancies: and then, in the flurry of the moment, he had taken frequent draughts at the wine cup, presented him at every instant by officious pages, and all the world knows the effect of such draughts in giving potency to female charms. In a word, there is no concealing the matter, the banquet was not half over, before Don Fernando was making love, outright, to the Alcayde's daughter. It was his old habitude, contracted long before his matrimonial engagement. The young lady hung her head coyly; her eye rested upon a ruby heart, sparkling in a ring on the hand of Don Fernando, a parting gaze of love from Serafina. A blush crimsoned her very temples. She darted a glance of doubt at the ring, and then at Don Fernando. He read her doubt, and in the giddy intoxication of the moment, drew off the pledge of his affianced bride, and slipped it on the finger of the Alcayde's daughter.

At this moment the banquet broke up. The chamberlain with his lofty demeanor, and his lack-lustre eyes, stood before him, and announced that the barge was waiting to conduct him back to the caravel. Don Fernando took a formal leave of the Alcayde and his dignitaries, & a tender farewell of the Alcayde's daughter, with a promise to throw himself at her feet on the following day. He was rowed back to his vessel in the same slow and stately manner, to the cadence of some mournful old ditty. He retired to his cabin, his brain whirling with all that he had seen, and his heart now and then giving him a twinge, as he recollected his temporary infidelity to the beautiful Serafina. He flung himself on his bed, and soon fell into a feverish sleep. His dreams were wild and incoherent. How long he slept he knew not, but when he awoke he found himself, in a strange cabin, with persons around him of whom he had no knowledge. He rubbed his eyes to ascertain whether he were really awake. In reply to his enquiries, he was informed that he was on board of a Portuguese ship, bound to Lisbon; having been taken senseless from a wreck drifting about the ocean.

Don Fernando was confounded and perplexed. He retraced every thing distinctly that had happened to him in the Island of the Seven Cities, and until he had retired to rest on board the caravel. Had his vessel been driven from her anchors, and wrecked during his sleep? The people about him could give him no information on the subject. He talked to them of the Island of the Seven Cities and of all that had befallen him there. They regarded his words as the ravings of delirium, and in their honest solicitude, they administered such effectual remedies, that he was fain to drop the subject, and observe a cautious taciturnity.

At length they arrived in the Tagus, and anchored before the famous city of Lisbon. Don Fernando sprang joyfully on shore, and hastened to his ancestral mansion. To his surprise, it was inhabited by people unknown him; and when he asked about his family, no one could give him any information concerning them.

He now sought the mansion of Don Ramiro, for the temporary flame kindled by the bright eyes of the Alcayde's daughter had long since burnt itself out, and his genuine passion for Serafina had revived with all its fervor. He approached the balcony, beneath which he had so often serenaded her. Did his eyes deceive him? No! There was Serafina herself at the balcony. An exclamation of rapture burst from him, as he raised his arms toward her. She cast upon him a look of indignation, and hastily retiring, closed the casement. Could she have heard of his flirtation with the Alcayde's daughter? He would soon dispel every doubt of his constancy. The door was open. He rushed up stairs, and entering the room, threw himself at her feet. She shrank back with affright, and took refuge in the arms of a youthful cavalier.

'What mean you,' cried the latter, 'by this intrusion?'

'What right have you,' replied Don Fernando, 'to ask the question?'

'The right of an affianced suitor!'

Don Fernando started, and turned pale. Oh Serafina! Serafina! cried he, in a tone of agony, 'is this thy plighted constancy?'

'Serafina?—what mean you by Serafina? If it be this young lady you intend, her name is Maria.' 'Is not this Serafina Alvarez, and is not that her portrait?' cried Don Fernando, pointing to a picture of his mistress.

'Holy Virgin!' cried the young lady, 'he is talking of my great grandmother!'

An explanation ensued, if that could be called an explanation, which plunged the unfortunate Fernando into tenfold perplexity. If he might believe his eyes, he saw before him his beloved Serafina, if he might believe his ears, it was merely her hereditary form and features, perpetuated in the person of her great grand-daughter.

His brain began to spin. He sought the office of the Minister of Marine, and made a report of his expedition, and of the Island of the Seven Cities, which he had so fortunately discovered. No body knew any thing of such an expedition, or such an island. He declared that he had undertaken the enterprise under a formal contract with the crown, and had received a regular commission, constituting him Adalantado.—This must be a matter of record, and he insisted loudly that the books of the department should be consulted. The wordy strife at length attracted the attention of an old gray-headed clerk, who sat perched on a high stool, at a high desk, with iron rimmed spectacles on the top of a thin, pinched nose, copying records into an enormous folio. He had wintered and summered in the department for a great part of a century, until he had almost grown to be a piece of the desk at which he sat; his memory was a mere index of official facts and documents, and his brain was a little better than wax and parchment. After peering down for a time from his lofty perch, and ascertaining the matter in controversy, he put his pen behind his ear, and descended. He remembered to have heard something from his predecessor about an expedition of the kind in question, but then it had sailed during the reign of Don Joan II., and he had been dead at least a hundred years. To put it, beyond dispute, however, the archives of the Torre do Tombo, that sepulchre of old Portuguese documents, were diligently searched, and a record was found of a contract between the crown and one Fernando de Ulmo, for the discovery of the Island of the Seven Cities, and of a commission secured to him as Adalantado of the country he might discover.

'There!' cried Don Fernando, triumphantly, 'there you have proof, before your own eyes, of what I have said. I am the Fernando de Ulmo specified in that record. I have discovered the Island of the Seven Cities, and am entitled to be Adalantado, according to contract.'

The story of Don Fernando had certainly, what is pronounced the best of historical foundation, documentary evidence; but when a man in the bloom of youth talked of events that had taken place above a century previously, as having happened to himself, it is no wonder that he was set down for a mad man.

The old clerk looked at him from above and below his spectacles, spruinged his shoulders, stroked his chin, reascended his lofty stool, took the pen from behind his ears, and resumed his daily and eternal task, copying records into the fiftieth volume of a series of gigantic folios. The other clerks winked at each other shrewdly, and dispersed to their several places, and poor Don Fernando, thus left to himself, flung out of the office, almost driven wild by these repeated perplexities.

In the confusion of his mind, he instinctively repaired to the mansion of Alvarez, but it was barred against him. To break the delusion under which the youth apparently labored, and to convince him that the Serafina about whom he raved was really dead, he was conducted to her tomb. There she lay, a stately matron, cut out in alabaster; and there lay beside her: a portly cavalier, in armour; and there knelt, on each side, the effigies of a numerous progeny, proving that she had been a fruitful vine. Even the very monument gave proof of the lapse of time, for the hands of her husband, which were folded as if in prayer, had lost their fingers, and the face of the once lovely Serafina was noseless.

Don Fernando felt a transient glow of indignation at beholding this monumental proof of the inconstancy of his mistress; but who could expect a mistress to remain constant during a whole century of absence?—And what right had he to rail about constancy, after what had passed between him and the Alcayde's daughter. The unfortunate cavalier performed one pious act of tender devotion; he had the alabaster nose of Serafina restored by a skillful statuary, and then tore himself from the tomb.

He could now no longer doubt the fact that, somehow or other he had skipped over a whole century, during the night he had spent at the Island of the Seven Cities, and he was now as complete a stranger in his native city, as if he had never been there. A thousand times did he wish himself back to that wonderful island, with its antiquated banquet halls, where he had been so courteously received; and now that the once young and beautiful Serafina was nothing but a great grandmother in marble, with generations of descendants, a thousand times would he recall the melting black eyes of the Alcayde's daughter, who doubtless, like himself, was still flourishing in fresh juvenility, and breathe a secret wish that he were seated by her side.

He would at once have set on foot another expedition, at his own expense, to cruise in search of the fabled island, but his means were exhausted. He endeavored to rouse others to the enterprise, setting forth the certainty of profitable results, of which his own experience furnished such unquestionable proof. Alas! no one would give faith to his tale; but looked upon it as the feverish dream of a ship-wrecked man. He persisted in his efforts; he sought forth in all places and all companies, until he became an object of jest and jeer to the light-minded, who mistook his earnest enthusiasm for a proof of insanity, and the very children in the streets bantered him with the title of "The Adalantado of the Seven Cities."

Finding all his efforts in vain, in his native city of Lisbon, he took shipping for the Canaries, as being nearer the latitude of his former cruise, and inhabited by people given to nautical adventure. Here he found ready listeners to his story: for the old pilots and mariners of those parts were notorious island-hunters and devout believers in all the wonders of the seas. Indeed, one and all treated his adventure as a common occurrence, and turning to each other, with a sagacious nod of the head, observed, 'He has been at the Island of St. Brandan.'

They went on to inform him of that great marvel and enigma of the ocean; of its repeated appearance to the inhabitants of their island; and of the many but ineffectual expeditions that had been made in search of it. They took him to a promontory of the island of Palma, from whence the shadowy St. Brandan had oftentimes been descried, and they pointed out the very tract in the west where its mountains had been seen.

Don Fernando listened with rapt attention. He had no longer a doubt that this mysterious and fugacious island must be the same with that of the Seven Cities; and that there must be some supernatural influence connected with it, that had operated upon himself, and made the events of a night occupy the space of a century.

He endeavored, but in vain, to rouse the islanders to another attempt at discovery; they had given up the phantom island as indeed inaccessible. Fernando, however, was not to be discouraged. The idea wore itself deeper and deeper in his mind, until it became the engrossing subject of his thoughts and object of his being. Every morning he would repair to the promontory of Palma, and sit there throughout the five-long day, in hopes of seeing the fairy mountains of St. Brandan peering above the horizon; every evening he returned to his home, a disappointed man, but ready to resume his lonesome post, on the following morning.

His assiduity was all in vain. He grew gray in his ineffectual attempt; and was at length found dead at his post. His grave is still shown in the island of Palma, and a cross is erected on the spot where he used to sit and look out upon the sea, in hopes of the reappearance of the enchanted island.

MISCELLANY.

THE JEWELS.

A TRADITION OF THE RABBIS.

The celebrated teacher Rabbi Meir, sat, during the whole of one Sabbath day, in the public school instructing the people. During his absence from the house his two sons died. Both of them of uncommon beauty, and enlightened in the law. His wife bore them to her bed, and spread white covering over their bodies. In the evening the Rabbi Meir came home.

'Where are my two sons,' he asked, 'that I may give them my blessing? I repeatedly looked round the school, I did not see them.'

'She reached to him a goblet. He praised the Lord at the going out of the Sabbath, drank and again asked.

'Where are my sons that they too may drink of the cup of blessing?'

'They will not be far off,' she said, and placed food before him that he might eat.

He was in a gladsome and genial mood: and when he had said grace after the meal, she thus addressed him.

'Rabbi, with thy permission I would fain propose to thee one question.'

'Ask it then, my love!' he replied.

'A few days ago a person entrusted some jewels to my custody, and now he demands them again: should I give them up?'

'This is a question,' said Rabbi Meir, 'which my wife should not have thought necessary to ask. What wouldst thou hesitate or be reluctant to restore to every one his own?'

'No,' she replied, 'but I thought it best not to restore them without acquainting thee therewith.'

She then led him to the chamber and stepping to the bed, took the white covering from the dead bodies.

'Ah my sons, my sons!' thus loudly lamented the father, 'my sons! the light of mine eyes and the light of my understanding! I was your father, but ye were my teachers in the law.'

The mother turned away and wept bitterly. At length she took her husband by the hand and said.

'Rabbi, didst thou not teach me that we must not be reluctant to restore that which was entrusted to our keeping? See the Lord gave, the Lord hath taken away, and blessed be the name of the Lord!'

'Blessed be the name of the Lord!' echoed Rabbi Meir, 'and blessed be his name for thy sake too, for well it is written. "Whose hath found a virtuous wife, hath a greater treasure than costly pearls; she openeth her mouth with wisdom and in her tongue is the law of kindness."

THE SEA'S BOTTOM.

The bottom of the basin of the sea seems to have inequalities like those of the surface of the continents. Were it dried up, it would present valleys and plains. It is covered almost throughout with an immense quantity of testaceous animals, or those who have shells intermixed with sand and grain. The bottom of the Adriatic Sea is composed of a compact bed of shells, several hundred feet in thickness. A celebrated diver, employed to descend into the Straits of Messina, saw there, with horror, enormous polypi attached to the rocks, the arms of which, being several feet long; were more than sufficient to strangle a man; in many seas, the eye perceives nothing but a bright, sandy, plain bottom, extending for several hundred miles without an intervening object. But in others, particularly in the Red Sea, it is very different; the whole body of this extensive bed of waters, literally speaking, a forest of submarine plants and corals, formed by insects for their habitation, sometimes branching out to a great extent. Here are seen the madrepores, sponges, mosses, sea mushrooms, and various other things, covering every part of the bottom. The bed of many parts of the sea near America presents a very different though very beautiful appearance. This is covered with vegetables, which make it look as green as a meadow; and beneath are thousands of turtle and other sea animals feeding thereon. There are some places of the sea where no bottom has yet been found, still it is not bottomless. The mountains of continents seem to correspond with what are called the abysses of the sea. The highest mountains do not rise above 25,000 feet; and, allowing for the effects of the elements some suppose that the sea, is not beyond 56,000 feet in depth. Lord Mulgrave used, in the Northern Ocean, a very heavy sounding lead, and gave out, along with it, cable rope to the length of 4,686 feet, without finding the bottom. But the greatest depth hitherto sounded was by Captain Scoresby, who, in the Greenland Sea, could find no bottom with 1,200 fathoms or 7,200 feet of line. According to Laplace its mean depth is about two miles, which supposing the general received estimates to be correct, as to the proportion the extent of the water bears to the dry land on the earth's surface, would make about two hundred and 80 millions of cubic feet of water.—Rev. C. Williams' Works.

ANECDOTE OF GARRICK.

When Garrick first came upon the stage, and, one very sultry evening in the month of May, performed the character of Lear, he, in the four first acts, received the customary tokens of applause; and at the conclusion of the fifth, when he wept over the body of Cordelia, every eye caught the soft infection, the big round tear ran down every cheek; at this interesting moment, to the astonishment of all present, his face assumed a new character and his whole frame appeared agitated by a new passion—it was not tragic, for he was evidently endeavoring to suppress a laugh; in a few seconds the attendant nobles appeared to be affected in the same manner; and the beautiful Cordelia, who was reclined upon a crimson couch, opening her eyes to see what occasioned the interruption, leaped from the sofa; and with the majesty of England, the gallant Albany, and tough old Kent, ran laughing off the stage. The audience could not account for so strange a termination of a tragedy, in any other way than by supposing the dramatic persona were seized with a sudden frenzy; but their risibility had a different source. A fat Whitechapel butcher, seated on the centre of the first bench of the pit, was accompanied by his mastiff, who, being accustomed to sit on the same seat with his master at home, naturally thought he might enjoy the same privilege here; got upon the bench, and fixing his fingers on the rail of the orchestra, peeped at the performers with as upright a head, and as grave an air, as the most sagacious critic of his day. Our corpulent slaughterman was made of melting stuff, and, not being accustomed to a playhouse heat, found himself much oppressed by the weight of a large and well-powdered Sunday peruke, which, for the gratification of cooling and wiping his head, he pulled off, and placed on the head of his mastiff. The dog, being in so conspicuous, so obtrusive a situation, caught the eye of Garrick and of the other performers. A mastiff in a churchwarden's wig (for the butcher was a parish officer) was too much; it would have provoked laughter in Lear himself, at the moment he was most distressed; no wonder then that it had such an effect in his representative.

THE WONDERS OF HORTICULTURE.

Innumerable are the advantages which mankind have derived from the horticulturists. Few would suppose that the peach (from which branched the nectarine) had its origin in the almond; or that the shaddock, the citron, the orange, the lemon, proceeded from the diminutive white lime. The favourite edible celery, springs from a rank and acid root denominated smallage, which grows on all sides of ditches, and in the neighbourhood of the sea. The hazel nut was the ancestor of the filbert and the cubnut, while the luscious plum can claim no higher source than the sloe. From the sour-crab issues the golden pippin, and the pear and cherry originally grew in the forest. The garlick asparagus, which grows, though not very commonly, in stony and gravelly situations near the sea, when growing spontaneously, is a diminutive plant, and none indeed but a practised eye, examining into the species which is reared by artificial culture, can discern the least resemblance. Wondrous to relate the cauliflower, of which broccoli is a sub-variety, derives, together with the cabbage, from the cale-wort; a plant in its natural state, and scanty leaves, not weighing half an ounce. The Crambe Maritima, which is found wild adjacent to the sea, has been improved into sea-kale; the invaluable potato is the offspring of a bitter American root of spontaneous growth; and the all-tempting pine-apple descends from a fruit which in foreign climates grow wild by the sides of rivulets, and under the shade of lofty trees.—Gardner's Gaz.

Masonic Maxims.—To shroud the imperfections of our friend, and cloak his infirmities, is Christian and charitable, and consequently befitting a Mason; even the truth should not be told at all times; for where we cannot approve, we should pity in silence. What pleasure or profit can there arise by exposing the errors of a brother? To exhort him is virtuous; to revile him is inhuman; to set him out as an object of ridicule is infernal.

FINISHING AN EDUCATION.

"She has finished her education," said my friend. F'n'shed her education! said I—just as though a young lady's education was a stocking or rather a bonnet, and now it was to be placed in the band box, to be displayed to visitors and worn only on set occasions. Mr. editor, I protest against the doing up and finishing off a young lady's education with her teens—just at that time when she begins if she ever does begin, to think. A young man has just acquired at one-and-twenty, the elements of education, and is prepared to study advantageously according to his own discretion; but a young lady has done—finished,—the circle of her science is complete; and she is ready for any station in life. That may be thrown in her way. Now, why, in the name of common sense may not a woman think, and if she may think, why may she not study, and acquire profitable food for thought?

There is a lady, of whom I have some knowledge that "finished her education," by learning peculiarly good advantages at an early age. She is now a wife and mother of six children. She plays well upon the Piano—sings sweetly—dances elegantly—is very polite, &c.—but her husband must, and actually does put all her children to bed, and takes care of them through the night; and as to her table—the bread is execrable, to one who has visited his grand mother's pantry: and her coffee—O! her coffee! it would cost her head, if the very scent of it reached the Grand Turk's palace; and yet the lady has "finished her education."

The question "Why Printers do not succeed in business as well as Brewers?" was thus answered:—"Because Printers work for the head and Brewers for the stomach, and where twenty men have a stomach but one has a head."

A silly fop in company with lady F. and I wanting his servant, cried out, 'where is my blockhead.'—'Upon your shoulders,' replied the lady.

BIOGRAPHY.

AUDUBON.

This distinguished ornithologist, one of America's most gifted and most remarkable sons, has recently returned from Europe with his entire collection of original drawings. They are now exhibited at the Lyceum in New York. The Herald furnishes the following interesting sketch of this truly extraordinary man:

Early one morning in the month of October, in 1805 a young man sat reading a volume of Goldsmith's Natural History, in a small house in Pearl-street in this city. He was just entering his 19th year: his form was admirably moulded, though slight; his stature rather under than over the middle size; his dark hair, parted back, displayed a forehead unusually well developed; his features were finely formed, and lighted up by eyes dark and fiery as the eagle's gave token of intelligence of no common order. His eye glanced alternately from the page before him to a small and beautiful bird in the room, fluttering against the bars of his wiry prison; at last, closing the book and rising from his seat, he exclaimed: "This description is true, but the drawing is bad; I will paint that bird myself from nature." Before that day's sun went down behind the western hills, the bird was painted with a truth to nature never excelled! That young painter was Audubon!

This was his first great effort; the fire of true genius which nothing on earth can quench, had long been smouldering in his bosom; it now burst forth with an ardor never again to be repressed. Young Audubon had made rough sketches and drawings, and copies of birds often before the time we speak of; but from this hour the destiny of his future life was fixed. He was thenceforth to be the painter, the historian of the birds of the great continent of North America. Thirty-five years have rolled over his head; the fiery suns of summer, and the frosts of winter have left him unscathed in form or intellect; his figure is still erect; his sinewy limbs as active as ever; his features calm, clear, hale and hearty; and though the hand of time has somewhat silvered his hair, his eye still retains the eagle fire that beamed from it in dawning manhood. And in every sense of the word, Audubon is a great, an extraordinary man.

Audubon left the city of New York whilst still a young man, and went to Louisiana and Kentucky.—Here all his leisure time was spent wandering in the woods, with his gun, pencil, and sketch book. At that early age, he had resolved to travel on foot over North America, and find every bird it contained, sketch it from nature, shoot, stuff and finish it. He has done this. At Louisville he first met with the eccentric and talented John Wilson, the pioneer in American ornithology, from whom he obtained much valuable information, and with whom he was on terms of the warmest friendship to the day of his death. Leaving Louisville he descended the Ohio, still exploring the woods and forests of the then far west, till he reached the Mississippi; and soon after this he gave up every other business, occupation and pursuit, and devoted himself entirely to this great undertaking of describing with pen and pencil, all the birds of North America.

His life has been a most eventful and curious one; sometimes teeming with pleasure and delight; sometimes abounding with pain of body and bitterness of soul. His has been alternately a life of privation, glory, suffering, delight, want, misery, care, wrong, prosperity and happiness. He has crossed and recrossed every passable portion of North America, at least ten times, and mostly on foot. Alone, unheeded, unaided, uncheered, except by the inward delight thrilling through his own bosom, he has accomplished most of the great task that will hand his name down to Time's latest day with never dying fame.

He has caught, killed, prepared, and painted with his single hand, every known bird in the country, numbering over five hundred!

He has spent 25 years of his illustrious life to effect this, he has succeeded in his tremendous task. He has every bird and every original drawing of each bird in his possession. He has been to England, and succeeded in getting all his drawings engraved in a style of excellence never surpassed.

He has 200 sets only of his great work printed, five volumes forming a set; of these seventy-six have been sold in Europe, and seventy-four in the United States, at an average of $1000 each set of 500 plates, the latter press forming a distinct block. And after accomplishing all this, he has returned, at the age of 53, to the city of New York, the successful scene of his early efforts, with his splendid and unrivalled collection of original drawings, which are now in the course of exhibition at the Lyceum in Broadway.

AMERICAN MASONIC REGISTER.

ALBANY, SATURDAY, NOV. 16, 1839.

THE HISTORY OF MASONRY.—We commence this week, on our first page, an interesting and ably written history of freemasonry. To those of the "mystic tie" we flatter ourselves it will be particularly acceptable, as it is eminently calculated to settle the conflicting opinions entertained in regard to the institution. To the general reader, it cannot fail of proving a source of information on a subject, which so much has been said, of late years, and which so little has been understood.

Masonry is truly a science, and that too of the noblest order. No man, be he intelligent, who is inducted into its mysteries, but will rise up a "wiser and a better man." That our ceremonies are unmeaning is untrue. It is true, they do not conform to "modern usages," and it is equally true, that there is many a brother who has been hurried thro' the ceremonies, with about as much of the science of masonry, when he came out, as when he went in. But to the heart that is prepared to receive the impress of our ceremonies, there is a continual progressive beauty from the "rough ashler," to the perfect Arch.

Perhaps there has been no more bitter enemies to the institution, than can be found in the writings of the Abbe Barreul, and Dr. Robinson, (opponents of the Giddens school scarcely merit a notice) neither were Masons, and both of them had suffered their prejudices to assimilate Masonry with German Illuminism.

It has been the author's object "to divest the history of Freemasonry of that jargon and mystery in which it hath hitherto been enveloped; and to attempt something like a classical view of this ancient and respectable institution.

"The history of an association, which has existed from the remotest antiquity; which has extended to every corner of the world, and embraced men of every rank, of every religion and every form of government, must surely be interesting to a contemplative man, who is accustomed to discover new features of the mind, in every human institution. But those who derive amusement, only from the recital of bloody wars and domestic commotions, who are delighted with romantic narrations, and stories of imaginary happiness and misery, will find here no gratifications of their sanguinary and corrupted taste. They will turn, with disappointments, from the history of a peaceable association, formed for the purpose of scientific improvement and the exercise of mutual benevolence; patronising and executing those magnificent structures, which at one time have contributed to the utility and ornament of nations, and at another to the amusement and admiration of succeeding ages; an association sometimes persecuted from the jealousy of power,—sometimes alarmed by the threats of superstition,—frequently attacked, but never overturned."

OFFICERS

Of Olive Branch Lodge, No. 39, held at Bethany Centre, Genesee County, N. Y.

S. W. Curtis, W. M.
G. W. Webb, S. W.
C. Barrows, J. W.
Wm. Mott, Treas.
N. Huggins, Sec'y
J. Gardner S. D.
O. Perkins, J. D.

Regular communications the first Wednesday preceding the full moon.

There are several circumstances connected with this Lodge, which are worthy of remark. It has been termed the "Veteran frontier Lodge," although it perhaps, might with more propriety be denominated the insulated Lodge, it being the only Lodge, west of Genesee, in this State, which has held its regular communications and paid its dues to the Grand Lodge from the commencement of the Morgan excitement, to this time. Much praise is due to the brethren in Bethany and its vicinity, in sustaining themselves against that tremendous cataract, which for years swept almost every thing before it. Truth has prevailed; error has been combated by reason and this little band of brethren, who have contended manfully for the principles of their order, have witnessed their triumph in the downfall of apostacy, and the utter prostration of the natural enemies of the order.

We hope the brethren will not consider us invidious, if en passant, we render to our veteran Brother Blanchard Powers, that public masonic acknowledgement, which is so richly his due. Br. Powers, although upwards of Seventy years of age, has from the commencement of the Morgan difficulties, exhibited a devotion and zeal for the interests and welfare of the institution, scarcely to be found among the most enthusiastic Supporters of the Masonic Institution. To his steadfast and untiring perseverance, may be ascribed in a great measure the duration and prosperity of Masonry in the region of the country in which he resides. During the sitting of the Grand Lodge, at their late communication, the Grand Secretary in his annual report, says—"I cannot allow the present opportunity to pass without mentioning the valuable services of Brother Powers, who although upwards of Seventy years of age, is zealously attached to the order, and has in the discharge of his duties as Grand Visiter, performed services which entitle him to the thanks of the Grand Lodge." The Grand Secretary was directed to express the views of the Grand Lodge by giving Br. Powers a written testimonial of the appreciation of his services.

GENESEE ENCAMPMENT.

At a regular communication of Genesee Encampment, No. 10 held at Lockport, Niagara county, on the 18th day of September, last, the following officers were elected, for the ensuing year:—

M. E. Sir Ebenezer Mix, G. C.

" Horace Narramor, G.
" Jonathan Austin, C. G.
" Peter P. Murphy, Prelate.
" Philip Murphy, S. W.
" B. V. Peterson, J. W.
" Blanchard Powers, Treasurer.
" Henry Maxwell, Recorder.
" Liller Fisher, Standard Bearer.
" James High, Sword Bearer.
" Reuben Harriman, Warder.

Sirs Frederic Follett, Ezekiel Hall, and Sherman M'Lean, Capts. of the Guard.

After the election, the doors of the Hall were thrown open for the admission of companions, brethren, and others, and the M. E. Grand Commander, delivered a lecture, setting forth the origin, and tracing the progress of the orders of Masonic Christian Knighthood, and exhibiting the connection of those orders with ancient Freemasonry, derived from authentic ancient and modern, sacred and profane history. We shall endeavor to procure a copy of the address for publication in our paper.

CLOSE VOTING.—According to the official canvass, of this District, just published, in which was polled at the late election, 49,098 votes, Gen. Root is elected over his opponent, Mr. Wilson, by only two votes.—Gen. R. received 24,550 votes, and Mr. W. 24,548.

Provisions.—The late press in the money market, has had the tendency of bringing almost all kinds of provisions down, to the old standard. A friend who is daily in the market, informs us, that butter has been sold for 13 cents, chickens 10, pork 4½, and other articles of consumption, in the same proportion. We shall probably be enabled to buy this winter, as much for one shilling, as we did last for two, and the only difficulty will be to get, as the Hibernian said, the same one shilling.

Five young females took the veil of nuns last week at Georgetown, D. C. in the convent of the Sisters of the Visitation. They belonged, says the Georgetown Advocate, to "wealthy families in the District, and had been on probation four years."

Masters, Wardens, and Secretaries of Lodges, are requested to act as our Agents, in procuring subscribers. The Back Numbers will in all cases be furnished.

Peter Woodard, aged 24 years, (on the 21st inst.) while feeding a thrashing machine in the town of Aurelius, Cayuga Co. under the power of seven horses, had his right arm drawn into the machine, and so terrible torn, as to render immediate amputation necessary.

MOBILE.—The Register of the 30th says: There were six interments yesterday, and up to the present writing, we have heard of three today, embracing some of our oldest and most respectable citizens. In most of the malignant cases, the black vomit occurs.

Our friends should wait surer indications of returning salubrity to the atmosphere, than we yet have. The weather continues very unfavorable—dry and sultry at mid day, with cold nights. Duty compels us to caution absentees against returning until we have a severe frost. Interments during the month of October, were 120.

The yellow fever, it is said, has broke out with great violence at Vicksburgh.

The city Inspector reports the deaths of 123 persons, in the city and county of New York, from the 2d to the 9th of Nov. 1839.

MUSEUM.—This place continues to be a source of much attraction. Welden the Magician, is said to be unique in his line.

The Apollo.—In Green street, has lately undergone several improvements. A neat little pit has been added. Mr. & Mrs. Thorn are among the attractions at this place.

Steamboat Sunk.—The N. O. Bulletin of the 5th inst. says:—The steamboat Far West is sunk to the guns on Island shore, opposite Bayou Sa a, having been run into by steamboat Southerner. Her cargo of cotton probably will be saved; the boat, &c. lost.

MARRIED.

On the 20th ult. by the Rev. Dr. Nichols, Lieut. Robert Allen, 2d U. S. Artillery, to Miss N. I. Preble daughter of the Hon. W. P. Preble, of Portland, Maine.

In Rochester, on the 7th inst. by the Rev. Mr. Beecher, Mr. James H. Weld, of Columbiaville, to Miss Ellen Ann Medbery, of Rochester.

On Tuesday evening last by the Rev. Mr. Kelly, Mr. Peter Stanton, to Miss Margaret Fitzgerald. All of this city.

On the 12th inst. in the city of New York, by the Rev. Dr. Strobel, Mr. Thomas J. Mesick, merchant of this city, to Louisa C. second eldest daughter of Mrs. H. F. Benne, formerly of this city.

At Schodack, on the 11th inst. by the Rev. E. P. Stimson, James D. Van Vechten, to Rachel Ann, daughter of Henry Van Denbergh, esq.

At Rensselaerville on Wednesday evening Nov. 6th, by the Rev. Zebulon Phillips, Mr. Chester Cook, of Rensselaerville, to Miss Marietta Russ of the same place.

At Oakhill on Thursday Nov. 7th at 10 o'clock A. M. by the Rev. J. Cone, Mr. Alban Crocker of Rensselaerville, to Miss Adela Campbell of Oakhill. Greene Co.

DIED.

On the 6th of November, inst., Dominic T. Blake, a member of the New York Bar for the last 36 years.

At Donaldsonville, La. on the 24th ult., of nervous fever, Rensselaer Gansevoort, M. D. formerly of this city, aged 39 years, son of the late Leonard Gansevoort, jr., esq.

Suddenly, at Sandy Hill, on the 29th ult., George Burr, esq. aged 33 years.

Suddenly, on Tuesday morning, the 12th inst., Phoebe, wife of John McKnight, in the 25th year of her age.

In this city, yesterday, Mr. John Godden, in the 25th year of his age.

At St. Augustine on the 5th inst. Lieut. Rodney, and on the 6th. Quartermaster McCrabb, U. S. Army.

A Patriot gone.—The Republican Journal, printed in Belfast, Me. records the death of one John Cochran, who made one of the famous "Boston Tea Party." He was born in Boston and removed to Belfast a number of years since. He was a man of good property, which is not always the case with revolutionary veterans, and highly respected by a large circle of friends.

At Carlisle, Pen., on the 16th ult., Miss Catharine, 4th daughter of Commodore Jesse D. Elliott, aged 16 years and 6 months.

In Brownington (Vt.) on the 25 ult. Humphrey Nichols, 85 years a veteran of the Revolution and a Pensioner.

POETRY.

For the American Masonic Register and Literary Companion
MY MOTHER'S GRAVE.

I know that there are fairer climes,
Where the bright sun forever shines;
Where citron groves and orange flowers,
Their perfume lent to fairy bowers,
But in our land the wind blows keen,
And beautiful flowers are seldom seen;
Yet, I would always here remain,
For mother's in the churchyard lain.

I've heard of climes where birds' sweet song
Borne by the gentle breeze along,
Is heard o'er streams that murmur by,
Whose bosoms mirror the blue sky,
Though these all bright appear to be,
There is no beauty there for me.
Ah! no, these scenes they tempt me not
My mother's grave is on this spot.

Though songsters linger not here long,
But fly o'er they complete their song,
Though we have winters cold and drear,
And chilling winds throughout the year,
And frost and snow, and piercing blast,
And leafless trees and sky o'er cast,
Yet O! persuade me not to go,
My mother's grave is 'neath the snow.

FLORA.

ODE TO THE SOUTH POLE.

BY BOANERGES BURSTALL.

Stupendous Pole!—thou walking-stick of Time!
Thou giant flag-staff in empyreal air!
Throned in Antarctic solitude sublime,
Portentous mystery! what dost thou do there?

Ly'st thou enchain'd in that benighted sea?
Sleep'st thou in lullaby of whistling thunders?
O Pole! in frenzy when I think of thee,
I think—I think—unutterable wonders!

There dost thou sit, unseen, untouch'd, unshaken,
A thousand sea-calves roar at thee in vain;
Ten thousand bears in vain their growls awaken,
And thrice ten thousand whales spout up the foaming main!

Should thou, O steadfast Pole! desert thy station,
New Zealand's coasts would tremble at the sight,
The Hindoo tawnies quake in consternation,
And sable Hottentots turn pale with fright.

Shouldst thou break loose in some stupendous thaw,
Leap to the North, and kiss thy Arctic brother,
Then sea and land, "in elemental war,"
As poets say, would make a "dreadful pother."

Hark! hear we not the South Sea island rushing Through Behring's Straits which vainly bid them stand.

There goes New Holland, old Spitzbergen crushing,
Cape Horn runs butting against Newfoundland!

I see old Neversink falling away,
And Bunker Hill upset in Lake Champlain,
I see Gibraltar skate through Baffin's Bay,
And Cuba scouring o'er the State of Maine.

Here, I see sea-serpents twist their tails on high,
And shoals of frightened porpoises are dashing;
There great leviathans and little fry,
Penobscot shad and Norway kraken splashing.

Six waterspouts stream up Wakulla fountain
Thund'ring from Pasquotank to Tombigbee,
Rhode Island jumps astride of Saddle Mountain
And canters down the Falls of Genesee!

The Blue Ridge tumbles o'er the western prairie,
And pounds the buffaloes with desperate slaughter;
Now strong Madeira dashes Grand Canary,
And now up hill, good Lord! runs Taunton water!

Behold Bermuda burst his rocky tether,
And rush upon Cape Cod in roaring war!
And there the world all go smash together,
Boston and Paris, Bangtown and Bangor!

The moon blows up, the fix'd stars run away,
Earth, sun and comets into chaos swing!
'Tis done! the skies come tumbling down!—But stay
It is not done, because there's no such thing.

No! mortal sight is happily a stranger
To all the horrors of the astounding scene;
Fate has look'd out in time to spy the danger,
And placed the equinoctial line between.

While stands the mountains, the South Pole will stand,
When fall, the mountains, the South Pole will fall,
New Holland, Java and Van Dieman's Land,
And Owhyhee and South Sea Islands all.

Then fare the well, dread Pole, the very notion,
Curdles my blood with horrifying chill.
Don't think of such tremendous locomotion,
But fare thee well, South Pole, and stand stock still!

The following beautiful Ode is from the pen of the "Boston Bard," and accords so exactly with those sentiment of charity, taught and practised in Masonic Lodges, that we republish it, probably for the hundredth time, with pleasure.

WHAT IS CHARITY?

'Tis not to pause, when at our door
A shiv'ring brother stands,
To ask the cause that made him poor,
Or why he help demands.

'Tis not to spurn that brother's prayer,
For faults he once had known;
'Tis not to leave him in despair,
And say that we have none.

The voice of charity is kind;
She thinketh nothing wrong;
To every fault she seemeth blind,
Nor vaunteth with her tongue.

In penitence she placeth faith;
Hope smileth at her door;
Relieveth first, then kindly saith,
Go, brother, sin no more.

MASONIC ODE.

When first Eternal justice bade
Life's varied ills untemper'd flow,
'Twas then Almighty goodness said,
Go Pity, cheer the realms of woe.
Go mild Compassion, go Charity and Love,
Tell man there's Mercy yet above.

Scarce fled from heaven the high behest,
That whelm'd in light the smiling earth,
Ere wide creation doubly bless'd,
Hail'd MASONRY's propitious birth.
With strains majestic, ye Masons lift the skies,
I ot g-e-a-f-ul h-a-l-l-e-l-u-j-a-h-s i-e.

Hail Royal Art! in humble zeal!
The Mason greets thy gladdening sway;
'Tis thine to teach his heart to feel,
And thine to bid his hand obey.
'Twas wisdom fashion'd, 'twas strength thy temple rais'd
And Beauty o'er the fabric blaz'd.

Sweet Charity, whose soothing art
Can bid dull apathy adore,
Can sweep the chords of every heart,
Primeval harmony restore.
Come lovely sister, come smooth life's rugged way,
And lead our souls to realms of day.

VERSES

Addressed to Miss R—B—, who complained of the tooth-ache.

You complain, my dear girl, of the ache of your tooth;
And I've heard it, indeed, with surprise;
Pray have you forgot, that, to many a youth,
You have given heart-aches with your eyes?

And the ache of the heart, let me tell you, sweet maid,
Is worse than the pain you lament;
It throws o'er the prospects of life a deep shade,
And drives from the bosom content.

Then cease from your wailings and outcries of woe,
And quit all your sobbings and sighs;
The Fates, dear Rebecca, order'd it so—
Through your teeth, thus to punish your eyes.

SONNET.

BY A MOTHER TO HER SLEEPING BOY.
O, I could gaze for ever on that brow,
Where innocence and peace in beauty rest!
Upon those curls, that seem a cherub's nest;
That quiet smile, of sweet and heavenly glow,
And the dark silken lash, which gently now
Falls on that rosy cheek, so oft impressed
With love's warm kiss, when folded to this breast.
And will thy face in manhood's slumbers show
These tokens of a soul within serene?
Or in their stead, by time, will marks of care,
And disappointment's traces, there be seen?
No, if a widowed mother's fervent prayer
Prevail with Heaven, the ills which hers have been,
Shall never blight thee, bud of promise fair!

WEEDS.

Scorn not those rude, unlovely things,
All cultureless that grow;
And rank o'er woods, and wilds, and springs,
Their vain luxuriance throw.

Eternal love and wisdom drew
The plan of earth and skies;
And He, the span of heaven that threw,
Commands the weeds to rise.

Then think not nature's scheme sublime
These common things might spare:—
For science may detect in time
A thousand virtues there.

THE HISTORY OF FREEMASONRY.

DRAWN FROM AUTHENTIC SOURCES OF INFORMATION.
No. II.

As men in the early ages of society, were destitute of those methods of diffusing knowledge which we now enjoy, and even of those which were used in Greece and Rome, when the art of printing was unknown; the few discoveries in art and science which were then made must have been confined to a small number of individuals. In these ages, the pursuit of science must have been a secondary consideration, and those who did venture to explore the untrodden regions of knowledge, would overlook those unsubstantial speculations which gratify the curiosity of philosophic men; and would fix their attention on those only which terminate in public utility, and administer to the necessities of life. As architecture could only be preceded by agriculture itself it must have been in this science that the first efforts of human skill were tried; and in which man must have first experienced success in extending his dominion over the works of nature. The first architects, therefore, would be philosophers. They alone required the assistance of art; and they alone would endeavor to obtain it. The information which was acquired individually, would be imparted to others of the same profession; and an association would be formed for the mutual improvement of its members. In order to preserve among themselves that information which they alone collected; in order to excite amongst others a higher degree of respect for their profession, and prevent the intrusion of those who were ignorant of architecture, and, consequently, could not promote the object of the institution, appropriate words and signs would be communicated to its members; and significant ceremonies would be performed at their initiation, that their engagement to secrecy might be impressed upon their minds, and greater regard excited for the information they were to receive. Nor is this mere speculation; there exist at this day, in the deserts of Egypt, such monuments of architecture, as must have been reared in those early ages, which preclude the records of authentic history, and the erection of these stupendous fabrics, must have required an acquaintance with the mechanical arts, which is not in the possession of modern architects. It is an undoubted fact, also, that there existed, in those days, a particular association of men to whom scientific knowledge was confined, and who resembled the society of Freemasons in every thing but the name.

In Egypt, and those countries of Asia which lie contiguous to that favored kingdom, the arts and sciences were cultivated with success, while other nations were involved in ignorance. It is here, therefore, that Freemasonry would flourish, and here only can we discover marks of its existence in the remotest ages. It is extremely probable, that the first, and the only object of the Society of Masons, was the mutual communication of knowledge connected with their profession; and that those only would gain admittance into their Order, whose labours were subsidiary to those of the architect. But when the ambition or vanity of the Egyptian priests prompted to erect huge and expensive fabrics, for celebrating the worship of their Gods, or perpetuating the memory of their kings, they would naturally desire to participate in that scientific knowledge, which was possessed by the architects they employed; and as the sacerdotal order fell, among a superstitious people, to gain the objects of their ambition, they would in this case, succeed in their attempt, and be initiated into the mysteries, as well as instructed in the science of Freemasons. These remarks will not only assist us in discovering the source from which the Egyptian priests derived that knowledge, for which they have been so highly celebrated; they will also assist us in accounting for those changes which were introduced on the forms of Freemasonry, and for the admission of men into the Order, whose professions had no connection with the royal art.

When the Egyptian priests had, in this manner, procured a mission into the Society of Freemasons, they connected the mythology of their country, and their metaphysical speculations concerning the nature of God, and the condition of men, with an association formed for the exclusive purpose of scientific improvement, and produced that combination of science and theology which, in after ages, formed such a conspicuous part of the principles of Freemasonry.

The knowledge of the Egyptians was carefully concealed from the vulgar; and when the priests did condescend to communicate it to the learned men of other nations, it was conveyed in symbols and hieroglyphics, accompanied by particular rites and ceremonies, marking the value of the gift they bestowed. What those ceremonies were, which were performed at initiation into the Egyptian mysteries, we are unable, at this distance of time, to determine. But as the Eleusinian and other mysteries had their origin in Egypt, we may be able, perhaps, to discover the qualities of the fountain, by examining the nature of the stream.

The immense population of Egypt, confined with other causes, occasioned frequent emigrations from that enlightened country. In this manner it became the centre of civilization, and introduced into the most ignorant and savage of men, the sublime mysteries of religion, and those important discoveries and useful inventions, which originated in the ingenuity of its inhabitants. The first colony of the Egyptians that arrived in Greece, was conducted by Inachus, about nineteen hundred and seventy years before the Christian era; and about three centuries afterwards he was followed by Cecrops, Cadmus, and Demos. The savage inhabitants of Greece beheld with astonishment the magical tricks of the Egyptians; and regarded as soothsayers and skilful adventurers, who communicated to them the arts and sciences of their native land. In this manner were sown those seeds of improvement, which, in future ages, exalted Greece to such pre-eminence among the nations.

After the Egyptian colonies had obtained a secure settlement in their new territories, and were freed from those uneasy apprehensions, which generally trouble the invaders of a foreign land, they instituted, after the manner of their ancestors, particular festivals or mysteries, in honor of those, who had benefited their country by arts or by arms. In the reign of Erichonius, about fifteen hundred years before the commencement of our era, the Eleusinian mysteries were instituted in honor of Ceres, who, having come to Greece in quest of her daughter, resided with Triptolemus at Eleusis, and instructed him in the knowledge of agriculture, and in the still more important knowledge of a future state.

About the same time, the Panathena were instituted in honor of Minerva, and the Dionysian mysteries in honor of Bacchus, who invented theatres, and instructed the Greeks in many useful arts, but particularly in the culture of the vine. That the Eleusinian and Dionysian mysteries, were intimately connected with the progress of the arts and sciences, is manifest from the very end for which they were formed, and they were modelled upon the mysteries of Isis and Osiris, celebrated in Egypt, is probable from the similarity of their origin as well as from the consent of ancient authors. If there be any plausibility in our former reasoning, concerning the origin of knowledge in Egypt, it will follow, that the Dionysian, and the mysteries of Eleusis, were societies of Freemasons, formed for scientific improvement though tinged with the doctrines of the great Egyptian mythology.

But it is not from conjecture only that this conclusion may be drawn. The striking similarity among the external forms of these secret associations, and the still more striking similarity of the objects they had in view, are strong proofs, that they were only different streams issuing from a common fountain. Those who were initiated into the Eleusinian mysteries, were bound by the most awful engagements, to conceal the instructions they received, and the ceremonies that were performed. None were admitted as candidates, till they arrived at a certain age; and particular persons were appointed, to examine and prepare them for the rites of initiation. Those, whose conduct was found irregular, or who had been guilty of atrocious crimes, were rejected as unworthy of initiation, while the successful candidates were instructed, by significant symbols, in the principles of religion; were exhorted to quell every turbulent passion, and to merit, by the improvements of their minds, and the purity of their hearts, those ineffable benefits which they were still to receive. Significant words were communicated to the members; Grand officers presided over their assemblies; Their emblems were exactly similar to those of Freemasonry; and the candidate advanced from one degree to another, till he received all the lessons of wisdom and of virtue, which the priests could impart. But besides these circumstances of resemblance, there are two facts, transmitted to us by ancient authors, which have an astonishing similarity to the ceremonies of the third degree of Freemasonry. So striking is the resemblance, that every brother of the Order who is acquainted with them, cannot question, for a moment, the opinion which we have been attempting to support[.]

Having thus mentioned some features of resemblance between the mysteries of Eleusis, and those of Freemasonry; let us now attend to the sentiments of cotemporaries, respecting these secret associations; and we will find, that they have been treated with the same illiberality and insolence. That some men, who from self-sufficiency, or unsocial dispositions, have refused to be admitted into these Orders, should detract from the character of an association, which pretends to enlighten the learned, and expand the affections of narrow and contracted minds, is by no means a matter of surprise; and it is equally consistent with human nature, that those, whose irregular conduct had excluded them from initiation, should calumniate an Order, whose blessings they were not allowed to participate, and whose honours they were prohibited to share. Men of this description represented the celebration of the Eleusinian mysteries, as scenes of riot and debauchery; and reproached the members of the association, that they were not more virtuous, and more holy than themselves*. But it is in the opinion of cotemporary writers, that these rumours were wholly conjectural; and originated in the silence of the uninitiated, and the ignorance of the vulgar. They even maintain, that the mysteries of Eleusis produced sanctity of manners, attention to the social duties, and a desire to be as distinguished by virtue as by silence†. The illustrious Socrates could never be prevailed upon to partake of these mysteries‡; and Diogenes, having received a similar solicitation, replied, That Patæcion, a notorious robber, obtained initiation; and that Epaminondas and Agesitauts never desired it||. But did not these men know, that in all human societies, the virtuous and the noble must, sometimes, associate with the worthless and the mean? Did they not know that there often kneel in the same temple, the righteous and the profane; and that the saint and the sinner frequently officiate at the same altar?—Thus did the philosophers of antiquity calumniate and despise the mysteries of Eleusis; and, in the same manner, have some pretended philosophers of our own day, defamed the character, and questioned the motives of Freemasons. With a little less modesty than the ancients, they have not, like them, quarrelled with us because we are not more virtuous than themselves; they have told us, that we are less than the least of men, and charged upon us crimes as detestable in the eyes of Masons, as they are hostile to the interests of men.

IMITATION WINES.

It is not perhaps generally known that very large establishments exist at Certe and Marseilles in the south of France, for the manufacture of every description of wines. Some of these establishments are on so large a scale as to give employment to an equal if not greater number of persons than our large breweries. It is no uncommon occurrence with speculators engaged in this sort of illicit traffic, to purchase and ship imitation wines, fabricated in the places named, to Madeira, where, by collusion with persons in the custom-house department of the island, the wines are landed in the entrepot and thence, after being branded with the usual marks of the genuine Madeira vintage, reshipped principally, it is believed, for the United States. The scale of gratuity for this sort of work to the officials interested, may be estimated by the fact, that on one occasion seventy pipes were thus surreptitiously passed at a charge of one thousand dollars. It is a circumstance no less singular, that the same manœuvre is said to be commonly carried on with counterfeit wine made up in Certe and Marseilles; and thence dispatched to Oporto where the same process of landing, branding, and re-shipment as genuine port, is gone through, the destination of this spurious article being most generally the United States. Such is the extent of this nefarious commerce, that one individual alone has been in the habit of despatching, four times in the year twenty-five thousand bottles of Champagne each shipment of wines not the produce of the Champagne districts, but fabricated in these wine factories.

THE LEGENDARY. THE GERMAN STUDENT.

Gottfried Wolfgang was a young man of good family. He had studied for some time at Göttingen, but being of a visionary and enthusiastic character, he had wandered into those wild and speculative doctrines which have so often bewildered German students.—His secluded life, his intense application, and the singular nature of his studies, had an effect on both mind and body. His health was impaired; his imagination diseased. He had been indulging in fanciful speculations on spiritual essences, until, like Swedenborg, he had an ideal world of his own around him. He took up a notion, I do not know from what cause, that there was an evil influence hanging over him; an evil genius or a spirit seeking to ensnare him and ensure his perdition. Such an idea working on his melancholy temperament produced the most gloomy effects. He became haggard and desponding. His friends discovered the mental malady that was preying upon him, and determined that the best cure was a change of scene; he was sent, therefore, to finish his studies amidst the splendours and gaieties of Paris.

Wolfgang arrived at Paris at the breaking out of the revolution. The popular delirium at first caught his enthusiastic mind, and he was captivated by the political and philosophical theories of the day; but the scenes of blood which followed shocked his sensitive nature; disgusted him with society and the world, and made him more than ever a recluse. He shut himself up in a solitary apartment in the Pays Latin, the quarter of students. There in a gloomy street not far from the monastic walls of the Sorbonne, he pursued his favourite speculations. Sometimes he spent hours together in the great libraries of Paris, those catacombs of departed authors, ruminating among their hoards of dusty and obsolete works in quest of food for his unhealthy appetite. He was, in a manner, a literary goul, feeding in the charnel house of decayed literature.

Wolfgang, though solitary and recluse, was of an ardent temperament, but for a time it operated merely upon his imagination. He was too shy and ignorant of the world to make any advances to the fair, but he was a passionate admirer of female beauty, and in his lonely chamber would often lose himself in reveries on forms and faces which he had seen, and his fancy would deck out images of loveliness far surpassing the reality.

While his mind was in this excited and sublimated state, he had a dream which produced an extraordinary effect upon him. It was a female face of transcendent beauty. So strong was the impression it made, that he dreamt of it again and again. It haunted his thoughts by day, his slumbers by night; in fine he became passionately enamoured of this shadow of a dream. This lasted so long, that it became one of those fixed ideas which haunt the minds of melancholy men, and are at times mistaken for madness.

Such was Gottfried Wolfgang, and such his situation at the time I mentioned. He was returning home late one stormy night, through some of the old and gloomy streets of the Marais, the ancient part of Paris. The loud claps of thunder rattled among the high houses of the narrow streets. He came to the Place de Greve, the square where public executions are performed. The lightning quivered about the pinnacles of the ancient Hotel de Ville, and shed flickering gleams over the open space in front. As Wolfgang was crossing the square, he shrunk back with horror at finding himself close by the guillotine. It was the height of the reign of terror, when this dreadful instrument of death stood ever ready, and its scaffold was continually running with the blood of the virtuous and the brave. It had that very day been actively employed in the work of carnage, and there it stood in grim array amidst a silent and sleeping city, waiting for fresh victims.

Wolfgang's heart sickened within him, and he was turning shuddering from the horrible engine, when he beheld a shadowy form cowering as it were at the foot of the steps which led up to the scaffold. A succession of vivid flashes of lightning revealed it more distinctly. It was a female figure, dressed in black. She was seated on one of the lower steps of the scaffold, leaning forward, her face hid in her lap, and her long dishevelled tresses hanging to the ground, streaming with the rain which fell in torrents. Wolfgang paused. There was something awful in this solitary monument of woe. The female had the appearance of being above the common order. He knew the times to be full of vicissitude, and that many a fair head, which had once been pillowed on down, now wandered homeless. Perhaps this was some poor mourner whom the dreadful axe had rendered desolate, and who sat here heart-broken on the strand of existence, from which all that was dear to her had been launched into eternity.

He approached, and addressed her in the accents of sympathy. She raised her head, and gazed wildly at him. What was his astonishment at beholding, by the bright glare of the lightning, the very face which had haunted him in his dreams. It was pale and disconsolate, but ravishingly beautiful.

Trembling with violent and conflicting emotions, Wolfgang again accosted her. He spoke something of her being exposed at such an hour of the night, and to the fury of such a storm, and offered to conduct her to her friends. She pointed to the guillotine with a gesture of dreadful signification.

'I have no friend on earth!' said she.

'But you have a home,' said Wolfgang.

'Yes, in the grave!'

The heart of the student melted at the words.

If a stranger dare make an offer, said he, 'without danger of being misunderstood, I would offer my humble dwelling as a shelter; myself as a devoted friend. I am friendless myself in Paris, and a stranger in the land; but if my life could be of service, it is at your disposal, and should be sacrificed before harm or indignity should come to you.'

There was an honest earnestness in the young man's manner that had its effect. His foreign accent, too, was in his favor; it showed him not to be a hackneyed inhabitant of Paris. Indeed there is an eloquence in true enthusiasm that is not to be doubted. The homeless stranger confided herself implicitly to the protection of the student.

He supported her faltering steps across the Point Neuf, and by the place where the statue of Henry the Fourth had been overthrown by the populace. The storm had abated, and the thunder rumbled at a distance. All Paris was quiet; that great volcano of human passion slumbered for awhile, to gather fresh strength for the next day's eruption. The student conducted his charge through the ancient streets of the Pays Latin, and by the dusky walls of the Sorbonne to the great, dignified hotel which he inhabited. The old portress who admitted them stared with surprise at the unusual sight of the melancholy Wolfgang with a female companion.

On entering his apartment, the student, for the first time, blushed at the scantiness and indifference of his dwelling. He had but one chamber, an old fashioned saloon, heavily carved and fantastically furnished with the remains of former magnificence, for it was one of those hotels in the quarter of the Luxembourg palace which had once belonged to nobility. It was lumbered with books and papers, and all the usual apparatus of a student, and his bed stood in a recess at one end.

When lights were brought, and Wolfgang had a better opportunity of contemplating the stranger, he was more than ever intoxicated by her beauty. Her face was pale, but of a dazzling fairness, set off by a profusion of raven hair that hung clustering about her. Her eyes were large and brilliant, with a singular expression that approached almost to wildness. As far as her black dress permitted her shape to be seen, it was of perfect symmetry. Her whole appearance was highly striking, though she was dressed in the simplest style. The only thing approaching to an ornament which she wore was a broad black band round her neck, clasped by diamonds.

The perplexity now commenced with the student how to dispose of the helpless being thus thrown upon his protection. He thought of abandoning his chamber to her, and seeking shelter for himself elsewhere. Still he was so fascinated by her charms, there seemed to be such a spell upon his thoughts and senses, that he could not tear himself from her presence. Her manner, too, was singular and unaccountable. She spoke no more of the guillotine. Her grief had abated. The attentions of the student had first won her confidence, and then, apparently, her heart. She was evidently an enthusiast like himself, and enthusiasts soon understand each other.

In the infatuation of the moment, Wolfgang avowed his passion for her. He told her the story of his mysterious dream, and how she had possessed his heart before he had ever seen her. She was strangely affected by his recital, and acknowledged to have felt an impulse toward him totally unaccountable. It was the time for wild theory and wild actions. Old prejudices and superstitions were done away; every thing was under the sway of the 'Goddess of reason.' Among other rubbish of the old times, the forms and ceremonies of marriage began to be considered superfluous bonds for honourable minds. Social compacts were the vogue. Wolfgang was too much of a theorist not to be tainted by the liberal doctrines of the day. 'Why should we separate?' said he; 'our hearts are united, in the eye of reason and honor we are one. What need is there of sordid forms to bind high souls together?'

The stranger listened with emotion; she had evidently received illumination at the same school.

'You have no home nor family,' continued he; 'let me be every thing to you, or rather let us be every thing to one another. If form is necessary, form shall be observed; there is my hand. I pledge myself to you for ever.'

'For ever?' said the stranger solemnly.

'For ever!' repeated Wolfgang.

The stranger clasped the hand extended to her.—'Then I am yours,' murmured she, and sunk upon his bosom.

The next morning the student left his bride sleeping, and sallied out at an early hour to seek more spacious apartments, suitable to the change of his situation. When he returned, he found the stranger lying with her head hanging over the bed, and one arm thrown over it. He spoke to her, but received no reply. He advanced to awaken her from her uneasy posture. On taking her hand, it was cold; there was no pulsation; her face was pallid, ghastly. In a word she was dead.

Horried and frantic, he alarmed the house. A scene of confusion ensued. The police was summoned. As the officer of police entered the room, he started back on beholding the corpse.

'Great heaven!' cried he, 'how did this woman come here?'

'Do you know any thing about her?' said Wolfgang eagerly.

'Do I?' exclaimed the police officer, 'she was guillotined yesterday!'

He stepped forward, undid the black collar round the neck of the corpse, and the head rolled upon the floor.

The student burst into a frenzy. 'The fiend! the fiend has gained possession of me!' shrieked he. 'I am lost for ever!'

They tried to soothe him, but in vain. He was possessed with the frightful belief that an evil spirit had reanimated the dead body to ensnare him. He went distracted, and died in a madhouse.

THE TURNSPIT.

Louis XI. of France once took it into his head to visit the kitchen, and see what was going forward. He there found a little fellow about fourteen years of age busily engaged in turning the spit, with roast meat.—The youth was handsomely formed, and of so engaging an appearance, that the king thought him entitled to some better office than the humble one which he then filled. Accosting him, Louis asked whence he came, who he was, and what he earned by his occupation. The turnspit did not know the king, and replied to his interrogatory without the least embarrassment. 'I am from Berny, my name is Stephen, and I earn as much as the king.' 'What then does the king earn?' rejoined Louis. 'His expenses,' replied Stephen, 'and I mine.' By this bold and ingenious answer he won the good graces of the monarch, who afterwards promoted him to the situation of groom of the chamber.

THE ESSAYIST.

USE OF BIOGRAPHY.

That "what man has done man may do," is a most stimulating and encouraging truth. It is this consideration chiefly that renders the lives of individuals who have distinguished themselves in their day and generation so interesting to their fellow-creatures; and it is a remark which should be borne in mind, whether we are studying the actions of great good men, or of clever bad men. In the former case, we should inquire whether we are not possessed of the same qualities, powers, and opportunities (generally speaking) with which they were favored; and in the latter, that we partake of the same depraved nature, and are liable to the same temptations that led them astray. It is not the history of other beings—of those above or below us in the scale of intelligence; it is neither of angels nor brutes, but of men like ourselves, that we read.

It is a common remark, that biography is one of the most useful studies to which we can apply; but we must remember that its usefulness to us entirely depends upon our right application of it. It is idle, indeed, to take up a book of any kind, merely with a view to entertainment: we hope our readers are all of them by this time above so childish a practice; but it is possible to read with a general desire to derive benefit, and yet without that close personal application of it to ourselves, which alone is likely to do us good. We would therefore recommend, especially to the reader of biography, to keep one grand object in view; and to make this close inquiry whenever such a volume is opened—in what respects is this applicable to me. How can I make it subservient to my own improvement? We will endeavor to offer some suggestions that may assist the reader in this inquiry.

Suppose that a young person in the quiet and humble walks of life should meet with the annals of some great warrior or statesman, he would probably say, "this is nothing to me, except as mere amusement; I have no ambition, at least I have no talents or opportunities, to distinguish myself in public life; I am quite contented with my humble lot; I seek not great things for myself." Herein, indeed, he would show his wisdom; and yet it might not be true, that such a history was nothing to him. Whatever is in itself excellent, is worthy of our attention, and more or less of our imitation, however widely our circumstances may differ.

Great talents and splendid achievements are necessarily confined to a few; and as we may be virtuous and happy without them, this is not to be regretted; but it is the duty and interest of every individual to aim at excellence in his own sphere, however humble; and while it may be the farthest from our wishes or our duty to engage in public services, it may still be highly to our advantage to trace the steps, and to mark the progress by which great men have arrived at eminence. Many of the very same qualities are requisite to make a good tradesman, or skilful mechanic, which are needed to form a great statesman or general.

We shall probably find that such a man was early distinguished from the frivolous or dissolute around him by devotedness to his object; that he made it his study, his pleasure; not merely engaging in it as a matter of course or necessity. We shall find that he was not discouraged by difficulties, but rather stimulated by them to more vigorous efforts; that he never consulted his own ease or gratification, when they stood in the way of his grand design; that he was characterized by a disregard to trifles of all sorts, and by a steady aim at the most important ends. Now, as these, among other good qualities, insured to him success and distinction, so we may be assured that the same causes will produce the same effects, in whatever situations they may be applied. Thus far a little apprentice boy may learn of Peter the Great, and become, by and bye, as distinguished in his trade as the Czar was in his empire.—Jane Taylor.

The Jews in Russia.—Hitherto the title of citizens of the first class could not be held by the Jews in Russia. The Emperor has just issued an order to the Minister of the interior, by which this title may be held for any eminent service tendered to the State, either in art, science, manufactures, trade, or otherwise.

SKETCH OF TRAVEL.

THE SCHAH OF PERSIA.

His majesty was seated near the window, supported by a pile of cushions, while a single attendant knelt behind him, waving a broad fan of feathers above his head. His dress was, as usual, perfectly simple: the rich jewelled handle of his dagger alone betokened his rank. His age does not exceed one or two-and-thirty, but his thick beard and heavy figure make him appear an older man. His countenance is rather handsome, and except when his anger is excited, of a prepossessing and good-humoured expression; his manner, especially towards Europeans, is extremely affable; he generally speaks Turkish, the language of his tribe, but, both in that and in Persian, his enunciation is so rapid, that it requires some practice to understand him. Compared with the generality of Asiatics, the Schah is a man of considerable energy, and by no means deficient in information; he is well versed in the history of his own country, and has a tolerable correct idea of the geography and political state of Europe. His army is his hobby, and to his thirst for military fame he sacrifices both his own ease and comfort and the welfare and prosperity of his country. His court is far inferior in style and splendor to that of his grandfather and predecessor, the principal officers of state being occupied by men of low origin, deficient in that magnificent courtliness of manner which formerly distinguished the Persian noble. The late king was always attended by a numerous and gallant retinue of princes of the blood and officers of state, besides a crowd of inferior retainers; the present monarch often rides out with a few ill-mounted and worse-appointed followers. The Schah is a strict and conscientious Mussulman; he never indulges in the forbidden juice of the grape, an abstinence rare in a royal family; nor does he follow the universal practice of smoking. His harem, unlike that of his grandfather, the number of which exceeded all credibility, is within the limits prescribed by the Mohammedan law. Well would it have been for Persia and Fatteh, had Ali Schah been as moderate; for every governor, however insignificant, was conferred upon one of his countless sons, who drained the very heart's blood of the country. Since the accession of the present monarch, the greater part of these have been removed, and many of them are now reduced to the utmost distress, living from hand to mouth by the sale of shawls and jewels, the relics of better days. Some of the late king's wives have passed into the harem of private individuals; others who had amassed some property, live in their respective villages. Mohammed Schah has two sons; the eldest, the destined successor, is now at Tabrez, under the care of Suleiman Kkan, his maternal uncle. The mother of the boy was of the royal tribe. The second, who resides at Tehran, is a chubby little fellow about three years old, the son of a Koordish woman.—From Wilbraham's Trans-Caucasian Travels.

Folly and Death.—We understand that the elephant exhibited in this place last week, killed an individual on Sunday at Low's tavern, about twelve miles distant hence. It appears that the elephant was fastened in the neighborhood of the house, when some foolish persons undertook to amuse themselves at the expense of the sagacious animal. His keeper, knowing the danger of such a proceeding, removed him to a retired spot about one fourth of a mile off, and chained him to a tree. The same heedless and reckless individuals followed him there, when one of them was taken up by the elephant in his trunk and thrown several rods. Another then advanced to within reach of the enraged and insulted beast, when he was seized and thrown in a similar manner, his body pierced through with the enormous tusk of the elephant, which caused the immediate death of the unfortunate man.—Port Deposit Rock.

The reproach of New England for her blue laws, long a standing joke, must now be transferred to Old England. We notice that a young man in Leicester-shire has been fined 40 shillings and costs, for cleaning his shoes on Sunday morning, before going to church! The complaint was made by the lad's employer, with whom he had lived two years, and who admitted that his conduct as a servant was irreproachable.

MISCELLANY.

OLDEN TIMES.

The following account of the affair between Alexander Hamilton and Aaron Burr, we copy from the New York Evening Post, of 1804—thirty-six years ago. To those of that day, it will we believe prove an interesting reminiscence; and to those who have come on the stage of life, since that period, we presume it will be alike acceptable, as containing a correct historical account of that unhappy affray, which destroyed the life of one great man, and forever, ruined the prospects of another. "Sic transit gloria mundi."

HAMILTON AND BURR.

The shocking catastrophe which has recently occurred, terminating the life of Alexander Hamilton, and which has spread a gloom over our city that will not be speedily dissipated, demands that the circumstances which led to it, or were intimately connected with it, should not be concealed from the world. When they shall be truly and fairly disclosed, however some may question the soundness of his judgment on this occasion, all must be ready to do justice to the purity of his views, and the nobleness of his nature. It will only here be added, that the authenticity of the documents and the accuracy of the information which we have at last obtained, are beyond any question; and must put an end to all mistake or misrepresentation.

The following is the correspondence that passed between Gen. Hamilton and Col. Burr, together with an explanation of the conduct, motives and views of Gen. Hamilton, written with his own hand the evening before the meeting took place, and only to have been seen in the deplorable event that followed.

NO. 1.

New York June 18 1804.

Sir,
I send for your perusal a letter signed Charles D. Cooper, which, though apparently published some time ago, has but very recently come to my knowledge—Mr. Van Ness, who does me the favor to deliver this, will point out to you that clause of the letter to which I particularly request your attention.

You must perceive, sir, the necessity of a prompt and unqualified acknowledgment or denial of the use of any expression which would warrant the assertion of Dr. Cooper.

I have the honor to be,
Your obedient ser't.

A BURR.

Gen. Hamilton.

NO. 2.

New York, June 21st, 1804.

Sir,
I have maturely reflected on the subject of your letter of the 18th inst, and the more I have reflected, the more have I become convinced that I could not without manifest impropriety make the avowal or disavowal which you seem to think necessary. The clause pointed out by Mr. Van Ness is in these terms, "I could detail to you a still more despicable opinion which Hamilton has expressed of Mr. Burr. To endeavor to discover the meaning of this declaration, I was obliged to seek in the antecedent part of this letter for the opinion to which it referred, as having been already disclosed: I found it in these words "Gen. Hamilton and Judge Kent have declared in substance, that they looked upon Mr. Burr to be a dangerous man, and one who ought not to be trusted with the reins of government."

The language of Dr. Cooper plainly implies, that he considered this opinion of you, which he attributes to me, as a despicable one, but he affirms that I have expressed some other, still more despicable, without, however, mentioning to whom, when, or where. It is evident that the phrase "still more despicable" admits of infinite shades from very light to very dark. How am I to judge of the degree intended, or how shall I annex any precise idea to language so indefinite.

Between gentlemen, despicable and more despicable are not worth the pains of a distinction: when therefore you do not interrogate me, as to the opinion which is specifically ascribed to me, I must conclude, that you view it as within the limits to which the cause of political opponents upon each other may justifiably extend, and consequently as not warranting the ideas of which Dr. Cooper appears to entertain. If—what precise inference could you draw, as a guide for your conduct, were I to acknowledge that I had expressed an opinion of you still more despicable than the one which is particularized. How could I be sure that even this opinion had exceeded the bounds which you would yourself deem admissible between political opponents.

But I forbear further comment on the embarrassment to which the requisition you have made naturally leads. The occasion forbids a more ample illustration, though nothing could be more easy than to pursue it.

Repeating that I cannot reconcile it with propriety to make the acknowledgment or denial you desire, I will add that I deem it inadmissible on principle to consent to be interrogated as to the justice of the inference which may be drawn by others from whatever I may have said of a political opponent in the course of fifteen years competition. If there were no other objection to it, this is sufficient, but it would tend to expose my sincerity and delicacy to injurious imputations from every person who may at any time have conceived the import of my expressions, differently from what I may then have intended or may afterwards recollect. I stand ready to avow or disavow promptly and explicitly any precise or definite opinion which I may be charged with having declared of any gentleman. More than this cannot fully be expected from me, and especially it cannot be reasonably expected that I should enter into an explanation upon a crisis so vague as that which you have adopted. I trust on more reflection you will see the matter in the same light with me. If not I can only regret the circumstances and must abide the consequences.

The publication of Dr. Cooper was never seen by me till after the receipt of your letter.

I have the honor to be,
Your most obedient ser't.

A. HAMILTON.

Col. Burr.

NO. 3.

New York, June 21st 1804.

Sir,
Your letter of the 21st inst, has been this day received. Having considered it attentively, I regret to find in it nothing of that sincerity and delicacy which you profess to value.

Political opposition can never absolve gentlemen from the necessity of a rigid adherence to the laws of honor, and the rules of decorum. I neither claim such privilege nor indulge it in others.

The common sense of mankind affixes to the epithet adopted by Dr. Cooper, the idea of dishonor. It has been publicly applied to me under the sanction of your name. The question is not, whether he has understood the meaning of the word or has used it according to syntax, and with grammatical accuracy: but, whether you have authorized this application, either directly or by uttering expressions or opinions derogatory to my honor. The time when is in your own knowledge, but no way material to me, as the column has now first been disclosed, so as to become the subject of my notice, and as the effect is present and palpable.

Your letter has furnished me with new reasons for requiring a definite reply.

I have the honor to be,
Sir, your servant,

A. BURR.

Gen. Hamilton.

On Saturday the 22d of June, Gen. Hamilton, for the first time called on Mr. P. and communicated to him the preceding correspondence. He informed him that in a conversation with Mr. V. N. at the time of receiving the last letter, he told Mr. V. N. that he considered the letter rude and offensive, and that it was no possible for him to give it any other answer and that Mr. Burr must take such steps as he might think proper. He said further, that Mr. V. N. requested him to take time to deliberate, and then return an answer, when he might possibly entertain a different opinion, and that he would call on him to receive it. That his reply to Mr. V. N. was, that he did not perceive it possible for him to give any other answer than that he had mentioned, unless Mr. Burr would take back his last letter and write one which would admit of a different reply. He then gave Mr. P. the letter hereafter mentioned, of the 23d of June, to be delivered to Mr. V. N. when he should call on Mr. P. for an answer, and went to his country house.

The next day Gen. Hamilton received, while there, the following letter.

NO. 4.

June 23, 1804.

Sir,
In the afternoon of yesterday, I reported to Col. Burr the result of my last interview with you, and appointed the evening to receive his future instructions. Some private engagements, however, prevented me from calling on him till this morning. On my return to the city I found upon inquiry, both at your office and house, that you had returned to your residence in the country. Least an interview there might be less agreeable to you than elsewhere, I have taken the liberty of addressing you this note to enquire when and where it will be most convenient to you for receive a communication.

Your most obedient,
and very humble ser't
W. P. VANNESS.

Gen. Hamilton.

Mr. P. understood from Gen. Hamilton that he immediately answered, that if the communication pressing he would receive it at his country house that day, if not, he would be at his house in town the next morning at 9 o'clock. But he did not give Mr. P. any copy of his note.

NO. 5.

New York, June 23, 1804.

Sir,
Your first letter, in a style too peremptory, made a demand, in my opinion, unprecedented and unwarrantable. My answer, pointing out the embarrassment, gave you an opportunity to take a less exceptionable course. You have not chosen to do it, but by your last letter received this day containing expressions indecorous and improper, you have increased the difficulties to explanation intrinsically incident to the nature of your application.

If by a "definitive reply," you mean the direct avowal or disavowal required in your first letter, I have no other answer to give, than that which has already been given. If you mean any thing different, admitting of greater latitude, it is requisite you should explain.

I have the honor to be,
Sir, your obedient servant.

A. HAMILTON.

Col. Burr.

This letter, although dated on the 23d June, remained in Mr. P.'s possession until the 25th, within which period he had several conversations with Mr. V. N. In these conversations, Mr. P. endeavored to illustrate and enforce the propriety of the ground Gen. Hamilton had taken. Mr. P. mentioned to Mr. V. N. as the result, that if Col. Burr would write a letter requesting to know in substance whether in the conversation to which Dr. Cooper alluded, any particular instance of dishonorable conduct was imputed to Col. Burr, or whether there was any impeachment of his private character, Gen. Hamilton would declare to the best of his recollection what passed in that conversation; and Mr. P. read to Mr. V. N. a paper containing the substance of what Gen. Hamilton would say on that subject, which is as follows:

NO. 6.

"Gen. Hamilton says he cannot imagine to what Dr. Cooper may have alluded unless it were to a conversation at Mr. Taylor's in Albany last winter (at which Mr. Taylor, he, and Gen. H. were present) Gen. H. cannot recollect distinctly the particulars of that conversation so as to undertake to repeat them, without running the risk of varying or omitting what might be deemed important circumstances. The expressions are entirely forgotten, and the specific ideas imperfectly remembered: but to the best of his recollection it consisted of comments on the political principles and views of Col. Burr and the results that might be expected from them in the event of his election as governor, without reference to any particular instance of past conduct, or to private character."

After the delivery of the letter of the 23d, as above mentioned, in another interview with Mr. V. N. he desired Mr. P. to give him in writing the substance of what he had proposed on the part of Gen. Hamilton, which Mr. P. did in the words following:

NO. 7.

"In answer to a letter properly adapted to obtain from Gen. Hamilton a declaration whether he had charged Col. Burr with any particular instance of dishonorable conduct, or had impeached his private character, either in the conversation alluded to by Dr. Cooper, or in any other particular instance to be specified—he would be able to answer, consistently with his honor, and the truth, in substance, that the conversation to which Dr. Cooper alluded, turned wholly on political topics; and did not attribute to Col. Burr any instance of dishonorable conduct, or relate to his private character; and in relation to any other language or conversation of Gen. H. which Col. Burr will specify, a prompt and frank avowal or denial will be given."

On the 26th June, Mr. P. received the following letter:

NO. 8.

June 26th.

Sir,
The letter which you yesterday delivered me and your subsequent communication in Col. Burr's opinion evince no disposition on the part of Gen. H. to come to a satisfactory reconciliation. The injury complained of and the reputation expected, are so definitely expressed in Col. Burr's letter of the 21st inst. that there is not perceived a necessity for further explanation on his part. The difficulty that could result from confining the enquiry to any particular times and occasions must be manifest. The denial of a social conversation only, would have strong implications that on other occasions improper language had been used. When and where injurious opinions and expressions have been uttered by Gen. H. must be known to him, and of him only. Col. Burr's letter. No denial or declaration will be satisfactory, unless it be general, so as wholly to exclude the idea that rumors derogatory to Col. Burr's honor have originated with Gen. Hamilton or have been early inserted in any thing he had said. A definite reply to a request of this nature was demanded by Col. Burr's letter of the 21st inst. This being refused, leaves the alternative alluded to in Gen. Hamilton's letter of the 20th.

It was required by the position in which the controversy was placed by Gen. Hamilton on Friday last, and I was immediately furnished with a communication demanding a personal interview. The necessity of this measure has not in the opinion of Col. Burr been diminished by the general's list, or any communication which has since been received. I am consequently again instructed to deliver you a message, as soon as it may be convenient for you to receive it. I beg therefore you will be so good as to inform me at what hour I can have the pleasure of seeing you.

Your most obt. and very humble servant
W. P. VAN NESS.

THE STOLEN GIPSEY GIRL.

A number of years ago, two little girls each about the age of five or six years, disappeared about one and the same time from the house of their respective parents, who lived at separate and distant points in the south of France. The cause for the disappearance of these children was the same in both cases, namely, the dread of domestic correction for some trifling fault. Marguerite Cogordan, one of the girls, was taken away from the town of Valensole by a band of gypsies, who met the child at a fair there, and found her not unwilling to go with them. For nearly twenty years, Marguerite Cogordan lived with the gypsies, passing with them from place to place, but always retaining an indistinct recollection of her native spot, though she forgot its name. Her longings to return to her parents and her imperfect remembrances, were treated by those around her as the ravings of insanity.

At length Marguerite left the company of gypsies, and got into service with a judge of the town of Carcassonne, also in the south of France. To her new master the girl disclosed the wandering reminiscences that prevailed on her mind respecting her home and friends. The judge notified the young woman, and paid every attention to her statements, with the view of discovering her relatives for her. At length it struck him that her descriptions of scenery applied to the district of the Lower Alps, and he addressed letters to a chief magistrate of Diagne, the chief town of the department. The person addressed knew of no such case where a girl had disappeared from Diagne, but he chanced to remember that the name of Cogordan was not an uncommon one in the little neighbouring town of Valensole, and wrote to Carcassonne, stating this fact to Marguerite's master, and adding that her description of the scene of her birth applied perfectly to Valensole.

Upon receipt of this information the judge set out with Marguerite Cogordan for Valensole, and at once found a family there, which had sustained the loss of a child, suiting Marguerite every way in name and age. But a strange circumstance overthrew the poor girl's hopes. The parents, while admitting that they had once lost their child, declared at the same time that they had long since recovered her, and produced a young woman whom they called their daughter. The uniform name Marguerite was rejected by the parents; they looked coldly on her, and repulsed the testimonies of affection. This cruel and unexpected savour of truth threw the poor young woman into a violent fever. This warmth of feeling smote upon the hearts of the parents. They began to doubt, and finally, opened their hearts to the new comer, declaring their belief that she was the long-lost daughter.

But when the late Marguerite had held her peace, or at least had made no confession to explain the mystery. But being more closely interrogated, she avowed that her name was Berthe Bartolet, and that she was the daughter of a physician at Marseilles. She had left her home, she stated, when a child, and had been picked up by a gipsy mother, with whom she had travelled several years, and then down the country. Passing one day through Valensole, three years after the disappearance of Marguerite Cogordan, the parents of that girl had seen her, believed they recognised her to be their daughter, and had claimed her as such. Fearing to be sent back to a home where she had been ill used, she had given countenance to the deception, and had kept her real name secret. She remained with the Cogordans, and custom had at length made her feel as if she were truly in her own home. Once, indeed she had tried to find service somewhere else, but she had been driven back.

This disclosure made Marguerite Cogordan happy, and she now (1837 being the date of these events) lives with her long lost parents.

SUPERSTITIONS OF THE SWISS.

There is, perhaps, no canton of Switzerland where superstition has cast deeper roots than in that of the Grisons. Like the peasantry of Germany, they continually consult the signs of the almanc before they undertake any thing of great importance, such as sowing, planting, reaping, cutting of trees, bleaching, carrying, &c. But the most important season for them to dive into futurity is Christmas Eve, and they employ an endless variety of devices to obtain this interesting result. This is especially the case with such damsels as have passed the ominous limit of their twenty-fifth birth day, without having met with a husband, and who are now naturally anxious to ascertain whether and in what manner this supreme felicity is to fall on them during the ensuing year. For this purpose they put heaps of salt or brim in such places as are inaccessible to light; they haul up the chimney; throw their supper backwards; draw cards; open their psalter at random by means of a pin; pour melted lead or the white of an egg into water; pull a piece of wood from the fire; walk about the village green, or even the church yard; and from the peculiar appearances they observe, foretell all they wish to know. A woman must be excessively pious, renounce the hope of being ultimately relieved from that state of single blessedness which seems so irksome to the sensible people, and undergoes of a century of annual disquisition of the cool their conjugal ardour, and make them renounce these fooleries.

The surest and best omen, however is to see their future suitor in a dream. To effect this the expectant, without uttering a word, fetches salt, flour, and water, from three different houses, and at midnight, makes from these ingredients a small cake, which she eats before going to bed. This cake being very highly salted, and the heated imagination of the person rendering the blood feverish, it is natural that she should feel thirsty the next morning, and express a desire to drink before she goes to work. The first young man who then offers her drink is the person destined by heaven to marry her, and from that moment all little tricks of rustic coquetry are set in motion to bring about the execution of the celestial decree, and often with success.

When a person hears the cuckoo sing for the first time, and asks him if he shall enjoy long life, the bird's next note being long or short, is considered as a reply to the important question.

The ignes fati are, among the Grisons, less an object of terror than of pity, as they suppose them to be the souls of infants who have died without baptism. They never see one, without endeavoring to soothe the pain of the supposed sufferer by the recital of a few pater.

PUZZLING IRONS.

An expert hand will take off nine puzzling rings in six minutes. I have in my possession one with thirty-six rings, which was sent for a gentleman who vainly hoped he could disentangle them in a comparatively short time. He felt he believed persevere till he had taken off half the number, (for it remains with me in that state) after working at it at intervals, for about six or eight weeks, when he was obliged to give it up. Any one unacquainted with the power of numbers could scarcely be made to believe that, if nine rings can be taken off in six minutes four times that number would require nearly 3054 years and a half, working twelve hours in the day, without intermission, or that the averaged time required for taking off each ring would be about eighty five years. [Mechanics Magazine.]

SHAM DEAFNESS.

A marine, while serving on board a ship of war, complained from time to time to the surgeon that he was gradually losing the sense of hearing, and at the end of several months asserted that he was completely deaf. It being however, proved that the alleged infirmity was feigned, and as he could not be made to perform his duty, he was brought to the gangway and flogged; but previous to his being punished for punishment, and during its infliction, he was informed that he should be pardoned if he would admit the fraud and return to his duty. Every means that promised to be successful in surprising him into showing that he possessed the sense of hearing, was resorted to, but without success; firing a pistol close to his ear, suddenly rousing him during sleep, and endeavoring to alarm him, elicited nothing satisfactory. The officers at Hadar Hospital, to which he had been sent, resolved to punish him a second time. Dr. Lind, who was then physician to the hospital, heaped that punishment might be deferred, with the view of gaining time to try by another experiment whether the man was an imposter or not. His request was granted. The doctor chose a favorable opportunity, and coming unperceived behind him one day, he put his hand on the man's shoulder, and said in an ordinary tone of voice, "I am happy to tell you that you are invalided at last." "Am I?" replied the overjoyed marine. The imposture being thus rendered evident he was forthwith punished and sent on board ship.—Marshall on Enlisting, &c. of Soldiers.

CHILDREN.

How little do they who have grown up to man's estate trouble themselves about the feelings of children! It would really seem as if they fancied that children were destitute of all those fine and delicate springs of emotion which are recognised in mature life, and are the sources of all our joys and sorrows. It is time that the grown up world went to school to some one who has not forgotten the tender susceptibilities of childhood, that it may learn to sympathise with the little sufferers. The germinating bud has within its folded recesses all the beauty and the fragrance of the flower; the gentle distillations of heaven sink sweetly in its secluded shrine, and the sunbeams fall there as soothingly, as on the prouder details that would claim all to themselves. How many a sweet spirit withers beneath the blighting frown of an unsympathising guardian; how many a one retires to weep in solitude, because it is not loved as it would be, and is not comprehended in its affection! We little imagine what arcana we read, when the words "of such is the kingdom of heaven," pass our unheeded utterance.

Perhaps some of our readers may have read the following. There is truth and quaintness in it, and for 'he want of a better place, we will suppose the scene laid in Albany. Moses in the School for Scandal, never did it better.

THE LAST DAY OF GRACE.

—Ye Powers!
That dreadful note!—Day of Doom.

I awoke in the morning before the usual time. My sleep had little of quiet. I dreamed of duns and Deputy Sheriffs. I was no better off when awake, for my note was to be paid by two o'clock, and my pockets were empty. I put on my clothes. Dressing is bad at any time; but dressing when you have a note to pay before night is horrible. Every thing goes wrong.—You fasten the wrong buttons, stick pins into your flesh, and twist your clothes villainously out of shape.

At breakfast nothing was better. The coffee was scalding hot; the toast fell into my lap, butter side down (Nankeens on.) No appetite. Felt dyspeptical.—Thought of my note—two o'clock and it must be paid.

"I have a whole forenoon at least, before me," said I as I sallied forth intending to make a desperate effort to raise the money by borrowing. "Mr. Q——, my dear friend, I have four hundred dollars to raise this forenoon, all which I must borrow."

But Mr. Q—— had no cash. As to money, it was all sunk in the bottom of the sea, he believed. The banks would not discount. Horrible words! I had as lief hear it thunder as "the banks won't discount."

So I went to Mr. X. and Mr. W. and Mr. Z.—Not a dollar. Hard times—People failing, banks won't discount.

"Then nothing remains for me" said I "but to go to Sharp the broker." This was a worthy who assisted needy gentlemen at critical times, out of pure friendship.

The rascal knew I was in search of him as he stood talking with somebody at the corner of Congress-street. I shambled about near him, now trying to catch his eye, and now glancing at the dial on the Old State House, the hand of which moved with a fearful rapidity towards the point beyond which there was no salvation of credit. What could he be talking about so long? It was strange he could not see me.

After waiting a long time I succeeded in catching him as he pretended to be moving off. "Mr. Sharp" said I "have you any money to-day?"

"Not a dollar. I overdraw my cash account at the bank yesterday. Never saw such a time for money in my life."

"If the thing be possible" said I, "I should like to get a note cashed."

"Ahem!" said he, "money is money now. I have a stun to raise myself, but if you are in urgent want of this—"

"So much so" answered I, "that if it were for my own particular use, I could not really want it more."

"I think," said he, "that I know a man that can do it for you, a particular acquaintance of mine—(very particular, I dare say, thought I.) I'll step over the way and see him. Call on me in ten minutes."

"Very well" said I, and walked off.

My worthy friend saw me out of sight and then went into his office and sat down. Presently I came in. I knew very well, what he was about to say.

"I have been to see the person I spoke of" said he, "but could not find him. Wait a moment and I will try again." I sat down, and Mr. Sharp walked up the street, took a turn round the Old State House and came back.

"Ah I have found him" said he, "but he is so short of money—(I looked at my watch.)

"Why ye-es, but he demands fourteen percent, for cashing your note at thirty days."

I looked at my watch again,—it wanted ten minutes of two. I looked at my obliging and conscientious friend——. "There is no remedy" thought I "when a man is between the devil and the deep sea."

Here is my note Mr. Sharp.
"You have made so hard a bargain with him" said he "that I ought not demand any thing for my trouble." ("How generous" thought I.) But as I must provide for my family—"your family must be horse-leeches" thought I, "if they want providing for at this rate") I must say five dollars for my trouble."

There was no remedy again, so five dollars more went. I got to the bank one minute before two. Coming away I saw a great monster of a dog with a poor miserable half starved puppy under his paw, squeezing the breath out of his body.

"There's a broker and his customer" thought I.

ROMEO AND JULIET.

Every stranger who goes to Verona is sure to have his sympathy moved, and his curiosity excited by what is called "the Tomb of Juliet," and there is no man who has read Shakspeare that will not hie on to the spot where it lies, regardless, at the moment, whether it be real or not.

It is a fact well known that this part of Italy had furnished to our immortal Bard the materials of a tragedy, which for all the pathetic details of hapless love and devoted constancy, stands unrivalled in any language. And though much of legendary exaggeration is superadded to the catastrophe yet the main fact is attested by the local history of Verona; and, therefore the mind is disposed to the probability that the excavated oblong stone, which is now pointed out in the neglected ruins of an old Franciscan Monastery, might have once contained the beauteous form of the unhappy Juliet. Count Persico, one of the native nobility, who has published a very interesting work on the curiosities of Verona, and of the provinces adjacent, thus narrates the melancholly story of Romeo and Juliet:

"In the year 1303, or about that time, Bartholmew della Scala, being Captain of the Veronese, Romeo de Monticello was enamored of Juliet de Capelletti, and she of him, their families being at that time in bitter enmity with each other on account of party feuds. As, therefore, they could not be openly married, a private union took place between them. Shortly afterwards, Romeo having, in an affray of the two factions, killed Tebaldo, the cousin of Juliet, was obliged to seek for safety in flight, and proceeded to Mantua. His unhappy spouse, afflicted beyond measure, sought commiseration and counsel from the immediate agent of her secret marriage, seeing that there was no longer any hope of reconciliation between families now still more incensed against each other than before. Therefore, by a preconcerted arrangement, Juliet procured a sleeping draught, and shortly after, according to common report, yielded up her life. Romeo, having been apprized of the dire news before he heard that she was only apparently dead, resolved, in the bitterness of his anguish, to take poison and die likewise. Previous to his doing so however, not entirely despairing of her life, he went to Verona, and availed himself of the evening to enter the Monastery. Being here assured that his Juliet had been interred not long before, he swallowed the poison, which he had with him, and hastened to the tomb, where their mutual friend pointed out the way by a passage beyond that which was ready for his return. The friar wondered very much what had happened to Romeo, unconscious of the hard fate that awaited him. While he endeavored to assure him that the lady was not in reality dead, the poison began to operate, and now, on the very verge of death, he called on his Juliet, with a faint voice. She awoke, and scarcely recognised him. Romeo expired, and Juliet breathed for a moment only to share his hapless doom."

JUDGE BUNDLE'S CHARGE TO A GRAND JURY.

All laws are laws, and every law is a law; and laws are things made by the lawyers, to make men live according to the law, without any respect to the gospel; for that is another affair, and to be considered at another er opportunity, and by another sort of men and in another manner: Vide Coke upon Littleton chap 10th page 15th. But as the law. Now there are some men that are good men and some men that are bad men, and the bad men are not the good men, and the good men are not the bad men, but the bad men and the good men, and the good men and the bad men are two different sorts of men; and this we gather from Magna Charta, an old man that lived in the reign of King John the Great. Now, if any are good men, there would be no need of laws:—Therefore ergo, the laws were made for the bad men, and the good men have no business therewith, nor no advantage to receive therefrom: Ergo, therefore those who receive advantage from the laws must be bad men: and so, gem'em call up the prisoners and despatch them as soon as possible for I must go out of town tomorrow.

THE WAY TO BE HAPPY.

Cut your coat according to your cloth, is an old maxim and a wise one; and if people will only square their ideas according to their circumstances how much happier might we all be. If we would come down a peg or two in our notions, in accordance with our waning fortunes, happiness would be always within our reach. It is not what we have, or what we have not, which adds to or subtracts from our felicity. It is the longing for more than we have, the envying of those who possess that more, and the wish to appear in the world of more consequence than we really are, which destroys our peace of mind, and eventually leads to our ruin.

TO HOUSEWIVES.

The N. Y. American, which is exemplary in matters of taste, says—"The way to boil rice is not to boil it at all. Put it in a pot and cover it with water, place it near the fire, or over coals on the hearth, were it will get gradually hot, but not at any time faster than to simmer. It will thus be cooked so that every grain will be distinct and separate, and have that crawling appearance so much boasted of by the Carolinians."

A Virginia paper gives this recipe to make corn soup; cut the corn from the cob, and boil it in water until it is sufficiently done: then pour in new milk, with salt, pepper, and one or two eggs; continue the boiling, and stir in flour in order to thicken it a little. This soup is superiour to the best turtle soup ever made.

If so, our Farmers may live like Aldermen.

A SELF-MADE MAN.

The executors of the estate of William Young Birch, Esq., (who died about two years ago,) have paid over to "The Pennsylvania Institution for the Instruction of the Blind," the balance of his estate. The whole now amounts to $192,000, a munificent bequest, and one which places our most excellent institution in a far better situation for carrying out its great charity.

Mr. Birch was emphatically a self-made man. He came to this country from England, and worked for many years, we are told, as a book-binder, and subsequently became a book-dealer, in which business he amassed a large fortune. He never was married.—Charity was a consonant part of life. He was a good and kind-hearted man; and at his death, he gave to his house-keeper enough to render her independent, and aided others on the way to do well. The bestowment of the greater part of his estate to aid in educating the blind, shows him to have been a man of enlarged philanthropy.—Phil. Courier.

A celebrated German chemist, Mr. Hoenle, has invented a new plan for marking linen without ink.—This is effected by simply covering the linen, with a fine coating of pounded white sugar. The stamp, of iron, very much heated, is impressed on this material. Two seconds suffice for the operation. The linen remains slightly scorched, but the mark is indelible.

A woman in Waterville was divorced because her husband gets drunk. Reason enough. No creature should have a wife who is an habitual drunkard.

AMERICAN MASONIC REGISTER.

ALBANY, SATURDAY, NOV. 23, 1839.

THE GRAND LODGE OF THE DISTRICT of Columbia, held its annual Communication, on the 4th of November last, at Freemasons Hall, in the City of Washington. A full representation from every subordinate Lodge, under its jurisdiction, were present. We learn from the National Intelligence, that a greater degree of unanimity, courteousness, and kind feeling prevailed, than has been witnessed for several years. Each brother evinced a determination to sustain the ancient principles of the order, in the entire exclusion of party politics, or local prejudices, and meeting 'on the level,' the energies of the craft were concentrated on the restoration of the great leading principles of the Order. in the diffusion of useful knowledge, the cultivation of the mind, the dissemination of those principles which are calculated to qualify a man so to deport himself, that the world may be benefitted by his having lived in it: to cheer the heart of the care worn widow, wipe away the falling tear of the orphan, place a staff under the arm of decrepitude, and light up a fire on the hearth of the disconsolate.

The meeting was favored with the venerated chiefs of the Order, which contributed very materially to the interest of the occasion.

After the transaction of the ordinary business of the Grand Lodge, the following brethren were elected the Grand Officers, for the ensuing year.

CORONER'S INQUEST.—The Coroner of New-York, held an inquest at 28 Monroe street on the body of Harriet, wife of William Blanchard, a native of Albany aged 47. Deceased was, it appeared, subject to temporary fits of insanity, pending which she had been often heard to threaten to take her own life. On Saturday evening she procured a quantity of laudanum which she took, and from the effects of which she died about noon on Sunday. Verdict suicide by laudanum. Mrs. Blanchard, was the daughter of the late Jared Skinner, of this city.

ANNIVERSARY SUPPER.

The Officers and Brethren of Lafayette Lodge, No. 18, of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, hereby give notice, that they will celebrate their anniversary, by a Supper and Ball, on Thursday evening the 28th of November instant, in the village of Poughkeepsie. All regular brethren are respectfully invited to attend.

The Mobile Fires.—The Committee of safety at Mobile, have reported to a public meeting, that after an impartial investigation, they have come to the opinion, that John H. Love, and James B. Wilson, are guilty: they recommend the appointing of another committee, who shall be empowered to examine the testimony and dispose of them in such manner as may be deemed proper. The English of which, is, we suppose, to turn them over to Judge Lynch.

THE LATE SOLOMON SOUTHWICK.
TRIBUTE OF RESPECT.

At a meeting of the Editors and Printers of the city of Albany, at the City Hotel, November 19, to devise the means of paying due respect to the memory of their departed and lamented brother, SOLOMON SOUTHWICK. E. W. Skinner was called to the chair, and George Hanford appointed secretary.

On motion a committee was appointed, consisting of E. Croswell, Jesse Buel, Robert Packard, M. McPherson and G. W. Ryckman, to report resolutions expressive of the sense of the meeting.

Resolved, That the members of this meeting have heard with unfeigned regret, of the death of their venerable and distinguished fellow-citizen, SOLOMON SOUTHWICK.

Resolved, That we deplore the event as a public loss—is the withdrawal from his field of usefulness and labor, of one who during a long and not unchequered life, has exhibited the characteristics of a large and gifted mind, who as an able and gifted writer, a respected citizen, and a Christian philanthropist, as the intrepid advocate of truth and of liberal principles; the generous friend of humanity, has been prominently known in this community for the last forty years.

Resolved, That we feel it particularly incumbent on us as members of the editorial and printing professions, with which he has been so long and honorable connected to express in this public manner, our sense of his merit, and of the public deprivation.

Resolved, That as a suitable tribute to genius and talent, and a further testimony to professional character and personal worth, we will as a body attend the funeral of our deceased brother; and that we tender to the surviving members of his bereaved family, our sympathy and condolence, under this afflicting dispensation of the Divine Will.

Resolved, That a copy of the proceedings of this meeting be addressed by the Chairman to the family of the deceased, and that they be published in the city newspapers.

E. W. SKINNER, Chairman.

G. HANFORD, Sec'y.

ST. ANDREW'S SOCIETY.

At a meeting of the St. Andrew's Society of the city of Albany, held on the 4th inst., at Wm. Leggat's in Beaver street the following gentlemen were duly elected officers of the society for the ensuing year.

Robert Boyd, President.
 Peter Smith, 1st Vice President.
 John McDowall 2d Vice President.
 Peter Bullions, Chaplain.
 Dr. D. McLachlan, Physician.
 Lachlan McPherson, Treasurer.
 James Dickson, Secretary.
 John Leask, Assistant Sec'y.

 David Brown, Managers.

Old Prices Returning.—The Dayton (Ohio) Journal states that a contract to deliver 1000 barrels flour at $3 62 1-2, has been made by a miller of that vicinity. The Middleton (Ohio) Mail states that a lot of corn was sold in Hamilton last week, at 25 cents per bushel, and that another lot could not find a purchaser at that price. In the rich corn district of Missouri, 12 1-2 cents per bushel is now the standing price.

Homopathy in Paris.—Hahnsmann, the father of the science of Homopathy, who is now 85 years of age has so many patients in Paris, that he is compelled to turn a portion over to his wife, a lady who having been cured, or having fancied that she was cured by Homopathy, married her doctor under the impulse of admiration and gratitude, and now assists him in his labors.

MARRIED.

In this city, on Monday 18th inst., by the Rev. Mr. Castle, Mr. Peter Courtright to Miss Margaret Angus, all of this city.

In Bethlehem, on Thursday evening 14th inst., by the Rev. Mr. Kissam, Mr. Andrew Bender to Miss Maria P. Warren, all of Bethlehem.

In New Scotland, on Wednesday 13th inst., by the Rev. S. V. E. Westfall, Mr. James W. Coughtry, of New Scotland, to Miss Nancy Latta, of Clarksville, Albany county.

In New York, on Tuesday morning, in the church of St. Thomas, by the Rev. Dr. Hawks, the Hon. Luther Bradish, Lieut. Governor of the State of New York, to Miss E. Hart, of New-York.

At Cambridge, Washington co. on the 14th inst., by the Rev. Ephraim H. Newton, Mr. John L. Quackenbush, of Hoosic, to Miss Mary D. Brownell, of Pownel, Vt.

In this city, on the 17th inst., by the Rev. T. Seymour, Mr. John Manethrop, of Troy, to Miss Mary Van Leuven, of this city.

On Monday afternoon, by the Rev. W. F. Walker, Mr. Joseph C. Potter, of New York, to Miss Cornelia Livingston, of Troy.

DIED.

On Sunday, Samuel Watkins, youngest son of John S. Van Rensselaer, aged 7 years.

In this city on the 19th inst., of a short but painful illness, Mr. John F. Dunlap, formerly of the city of Boston.

On the 4th inst., at Phelps, Ontario county, Wm. Hildreth, Senr., in the 56th year of his age.

POETRY.

For the American Masonic Register and Literary Companion.

THE DYING CHILD.

List, mother, to the strains I hear,
That whisper to my soul of bliss;
Whose softness dries the falling tear,
I ne'er heard sound so sweet as this.

My sister sings with melody
So sweet, so touching is her voice,
Enraptured still I fear to break
The charm that bids my soul rejoice.

But sweeter these than mortal tones,
For they speak not of earthly joy;
They whisper that this fleeting earth
Is nothing but a transient toy.

Ah! now I know that heavenly sound,
'Tis angel's beckoning me away,
And my root soul would gladly bound
To realms above. Why bid me stay?

Life, I'm not weary of thy hours,
For still thou'st many charms for me;
The warbling birds the lovely flowers,
Do but increase my love for thee.

But hark! my Saviour calls me home,
Gladly I will his voice obey;
Then shall I meet those spirits pure
That now are calling me away.

Without one murmur of regret,
My last farewell to thee is given;
Happier than I ever's soft as sweet,
Assures me we will meet in heaven.

Ah! nearer sound those voices now,
And louder does the music swell;
I must away, my weeping friends,
I mount the car—farewell—farewell.

FLORA.

THE FUTURE LIFE.

BY W. C. EVANS.

How shall I know thee in the sphere which keeps
The disembodied spirits of the dead,
When all of thee that time could wither, sleeps,
And perishes amongst the dust we tread?

For I shall feel the sting of ceaseless pain
If there I meet thy gentle presence not,
Nor hear the voice I love, nor reach again
In thy serene eyes the tender thought.

Will not thy own meek heart demand me there—
That heart whose fondest throbs to me were given
My name on earth was ever in thy prayer:
Shall it be banished from thy tongue in heaven?

In meadows framed by heaven's life-breathing wind—
In the resplendent of that glorious sphere,
And far as movements of thy untethered mind,
Wilt thou forget the love that joined us here?

The love that I'ved through all stormy past,
And meekly with my harsher nature bore,
And deep grew, and tenderer, to the last:
Shall it expire with life, and be no more?

A happier lot than mine, and larger light,
Await thee there, for thou hast bowed thy will
In cheerful homage to the rule of right,
And loved all, and rendered good for ill.

For me—the world cares in which I dwell
Sunk and consumed the heart, as heat the scroll,
And wrath has left the scar—that fire of hell
Has left its frightful scar upon my soul.

Yet, though thou wear'st the glory of the sky,
Wilt thou not keep the same beloved name,
The same fair though useful brow and gentle eye,
Lovelier in heaven's sweet climate, yet the same.

Shalt thou not teach me, in that eddied home,
The wisdom that learned so all in this—
The wisdom that is love, till I become Thy fit companion in that land of bliss?

MASONIC HYMN.

Grand Architect! Supreme! Sublime!
Whose energetic word divine,
In thunder breath'd from glory's clime,
Gave light, and life, bliss, to be;
Where primal darkness walk'd the round,
Of wild confusion's void profound,
With wreaths of gloomy horror crown'd,
Till chaos heard a God's decree!

'Twas thine, O Lord! in strength to lay,
On wisdom's base, the sphere of day,
From whence the Sun, with boundless ray,
On wings of flame triumphant soars;
While life, O God! at thy command,
Inform'd the dust of ev'ry land,
And bliss the gift of mercy's hand,
In twice ten thousand forms ador'd!

Hark! hark! what songs are these, that sweep
Adown the vast, th' eternal steep,
And die away amid the deep:
To you archangel's ken unknown?
These songs are those which seraphs sung,
On glory's hill, with flaming tongue,
When rapture round th' empyrean rung,
And hail'd creation's corner stone!

Accept, approve, and bless, we pray
The work of this auspicious day,
On which, as masons, men, we lay,
A corner stone, inscrib'd to Thee,
Thou Ancient of eternal days!
And high above, the temple raise,
Devote to prayer, devote to praise;
And grant, O Lord! so much to be!

TAKE THE RUBY WINE AWAY.

Bring me forth the cup of gold,
Chased by Druid's hands of old,
Filled from yonder fountain's breast
Where the waters are at rest;
This for me—in joyous hour,
This for me—in beauty's tower,
This for me—in marriage's shrine,
This for me—in life's decline.

Bring me forth the humble horn,
Filled by hunter's hand at morn,
From the crystal spring that flows
Underneath the bloom of rose,
Where the violet loves to sip,
Where the lily cools her lip;
Bring me this—and I will say,
Take the ruby wine away.

Take away the dawning draught,
By the Bacchic dæmon quaff'd;
Take away the liquid death—
Serpent's nestle in its breath,
Terror rides upon its flood,
Vice surrounds its train of blood,
Sorrow in its bosom stings,
Sorrow buoyed on pleasure's wings.

Dip the bucket in the well,
Where the trout delights to dwell—
Where the sparkling water springs,
As it bubbles from the springs—
Where the breezes whisper sweet,
Where the happy children meet,
Draw, and let the draught be mine—
Take away the rosy wine!

TO THE WINDS.

BY BERNARD EARTON.

Ye viewless Minstrels of the sky!
I marvel not in times gone by
That ye were defied:
For even in this latter day,
To me oft has your power, or play,

Unearthly thoughts supplied.

Awful your power! when by your might
You heave the wild waves, crested white,
Like mountains in your wrath:
Ploughing between them valleys deep,
Which, to the seamen roused from sleep,
Yawn like Death's opening path!

Graceful you play! when round the Bower
Where Beauty culls Spring's loveliest flower
To wreath her dark locks there,
Your gentlest whispers lightly breathe
The leaves between, flit round that wreath,
And stir her silken hair,

Still, thoughts like these are but of earth,
And you can give far loftier birth:—
Ye come—we know not whence!
Ye go!—can mortals trace your flight?
All unperceptible to sight;
Though audible to sense.

The sun,—his rise and set we know:
The Sea—we mark its ebb and flow;
The moon—her wax and, and wane;
The stars,—Man knows their courses well
The Comet's vagrant path can tell,—
But you his search disdain.

Ye restless, homeless, shapeless things!
Who mock a lout's imaginings,
Like spirits in a dream;
What epithet can words supply
Unto the bard who takes such high
Unmanageable theme?

But one:—to me, when Fancy stirs
My thoughts, ye seem Heaven's messengers,
Who leave no path untrod
And when, as now, at midnight hour,
I hear your voice in all its power,
It seems the Voice of God.

THE GRAVE.

BY ROWLING.

Why should the grave be terrible?
Why should it be a word of fear,
Jarring upon the mortal ear?
There repose and silence dwell:
Thou'lt hear the funeral knell,
But the dead no funeral knell can hear.
Does the ray flower scorn the grave, the dew
Forget to kiss its turf? the stream
Refuse to bathe its? or the beam
Of moonlight, down the narrow bed,
Where the first pilgrim rests his head?
No! the moon is there, and smiling too!
And the sweetest song of the morning bird
Is oft in that ancient yew tree heard:
And there may you see the heron's bill
Bending his lofty form—easily—proudly,
And listen to the fresh wind, loudly
Playing around yon's d, as gay
As if it were a boy at play,
And children fled from durance they.

THE HISTORY OF FREEMASONRY,

DRAWN FROM AUTHENTIC SOURCES OF INFORMATION.
No. III.

This similarity of treatment, which the mysteries of Ceres and Freemasonry have received, is no small proof of the similarity of their origin, and their object. To this conclusion, however, it may be objected, that though the points of resemblance between these secret societies are numerous, yet there were circumstances in the celebration of the Eleusinian mysteries, which have no counterpart in the invocations, and dances, which were necessary in the festival of Ceres, have indeed, no place in the society of Freemasons: But these points of dissimilarity, instead of weakening, rather strengthen our opinion. It cannot be expected that in the reign of Polytheism, just sentiments of the deity should be entertained; and much less, that the adherents of Christianity should bend their knees to the gods of the heathens. The ancients worshipped those beings, who conferred on them the most signal benefits, with sacrifices, purifications, and other tokens of their humility and gratitude. But when revelation had disclosed to man more amiable sentiments concerning the Divine Being, the society of Freemasons banished from their mysteries, those useless rites with which the ancient brethren of the Order attempted to appease, and requite their deities; and modelled their ceremonies upon this foundation, that there is but one God, who must be worshipped in spirit and in truth.

The mysteries of Ceres were not confined to the city of Eleusis; they were introduced into Athens about thirteen hundred and fifty-six years before Christ; and, with a few slight variations, were observed in Phrygia, Cyprus, Crete, and Sicily. They had reached even to the capital of France; and it is highly probable that, in a short time after, they were introduced into Britain, and other northern kingdoms. In the reign of the Emperor Adrian, they were carried into Rome, and were celebrated, in that metropolis, with the same rite and ceremonies, which were performed in the humble village of Eleusis. They had contracted impurities, however, from the length of their duration, and the corruption of their abettors; and though the forms of initiation were still symbolical of the original, and noble objects of the institution; yet the licentious Romans mistook the shadow for the substance; and, while they underwent the rites of the Eleusinian mysteries, they were strangers to the object for which they were framed.

About the beginning of the fifth century, Theodosius the Great prohibited, and almost totally extinguished the Pagan Theology in the Roman empire; and the mysteries of Eleusis suffered in the general devastation. It is probable, however, that these mysteries were secretly celebrated, in spite of the severe edicts of Theodosius; and that they were partly continued during the dark ages, though stripped of their original purity and splendour. We are certain, at least, that many rites of the Pagan religion were performed, under the dissembled name of convivial meetings, long after the publication of the Emperor's edicts: and Paellust, informs us, that the mysteries of Ceres, subsisted in Athens till the eighth century of the Christian era, and were never totally suppressed.

Having thus considered the origin and decline of the mysteries of Eleusis; and discovered in them, numerous and prominent features of resemblance to those of Freemasonry; we may reasonably infer, that the Egyptian mysteries which gave rise to the former, had a still nearer affinity to the latter; and, from this conclusion, the opinions that were formerly stated, concerning the antiquity of the Order, and the origin of Egyptian knowledge, will receive very considerable confirmation.

Let us now direct our attention to the Dionysia, or mysteries of Bacchus, which were intimately connected with those of Ceres, and perhaps, still more with the mysteries of Freemasonry. Herodotus informs us that the solemnities, in honor of Dionysius or Bacchus, were transported from that country into Greece, by one Melampus. But not only did the mysteries of Ceres and Bacchus flow from the same source; the one was in some measure interwoven with the other, and it is almost certain, from what we are now to mention that those who were initiated into the former, were entitled to be present at the celebration of the latter. The sixth day of the Eleusinian festival was the most brilliant of the whole. It received the appellation of Bacchus, because it was chiefly, if not exclusively, devoted to the worship of that god. His statue, attended by the initiated, and the ministers of the temple, was conducted from Athens to Eleusis, with much pomp and solemnity. And after it had been introduced into the temple of Ceres, it was brought back to Athens with similar ceremonies. The connection between the Eleusinian and Dionysian mysteries is manifest, also, from the common opinion, that Ceres was the mother of Bacchus; and Plutarch assures us, that the Egyptian Isis was the same with Ceres; that Osiris was the same with Bacchus; and that the Dionysia of Greece was only another name for the Pamyia of Egypt. As Bacchus was the inventor of theatres, as well as of dramatical representations, that particular class of Masons, who were employed in the erection of these extensive buildings, were called the Dionysian artificers, and were initiated into the mysteries of their founder, and consequently in those of Eleusis. But, from the tendency of the human mind to embrace the ceremonial, while it neglects the substantial part of an institution, the Dionysian festival, in the degenerate ages of Greece, was more remarkable for inebriation and licentiousness, than for the cultivation of virtue and science; and he who at first celebrated as the inventor of arts, was afterwards worshipped as the god of wine. Those who were desirous of indulging, secretly, in licentious mirth, and unhallowed festival, cloaked their proceedings under the pretence of worshipping Bacchus; and brought disgrace upon those mysteries, which were instituted for the promotion of virtue, and the improvement of art.

About two hundred years before Christ, an illiterate and licentious priest came from Greece to Tuscany, and instituted the Bacchanalia, or feast of the Bacchanals. From Tuscany they were imported to Rome; but the promoters of these midnight orgies having proceeded to the farthest extremity of dissipation and disloyalty, they were abolished throughout all Italy, by a decree of the senate. It has been foolishly supposed, that the Bacchanalia were similar to the Dionysian mysteries, merely because they were both dedicated to Bacchus. The Liberalia of Rome was the festival corresponding to the Dionysia of Greece; and it is probable that this feast was observed, throughout the Roman empire, till the abrogation of the Pagan Theology in the reign of Theodosius. The opinion which an impartial enquirer would form, concerning the nature and tendency of the mysteries of Bacchus, would not be very favourable to the character of the institution. But it should be remembered that deviations from the intentions and form of any association, are no objection to the association itself; They are rather proofs of its original purity and excellence; as it is not from the paths of vice, but from those of virtue, that we are accustomed to stray.

Hitherto we have considered the Dionysian mysteries under an unpropitious aspect; let us now trace them in their progress from Europe to Asia, where they retained their primitive lustre, and effectually contributed to the rapid advancement of the fine arts.

About a thousand years before Christ, the inhabitants of Attica, complaining of the narrowness of their territory, and unfruitfulness of its soil, went in quest of more extensive and fertile settlements. Being joined by a number of the inhabitants of surrounding provinces, they sailed to Asia Minor, drove out the inhabitants, seized upon the eligible situations, and united them under the name of Ionia, because the greatest number of the refugees were natives of that province. As the Greeks, prior to the Ionic migration, had made considerable progress in the arts and sciences, they carried these along with them into their new territories; and introduced into Ionia the mysteries of Minerva and Dionysius, before they were corrupted by the licentiousness of the Athenians. In a short time the Asiatic colonies surpassed the mother country in prosperity and science. Sculpture in marble and the Doric and Ionic orders were the results of their ingenuity††. They returned even into Greece; they communicated to their ancestors the inventions of their own country; and instructed them in that style of architecture, which has been the admiration of succeeding ages. For these improvements the world is indebted to the Dionysian Artificers, an association of scientific men, who possessed the exclusive privilege of erecting temples, theatres, and other public buildings in Asia Minor††. They supplied Ionia, and the surrounding countries, as far as the Hellespont with theatrical apparatus by contract; and erected the magnificent temple at Teos, to Bacchus, the founder of their order. These artists were numerous in Asia, and existed under the same appellation, in Syria, Persia, and India. About three hundred years before the birth of Christ, a considerable number of them were incorporated by command of the King of Pergamus, who assigned to them Teos, as a settlement, being the city of their tutelary god†. The members of this association, which was intimately connected with the Dionysian mysteries, were distinguished from the uninitiated inhabitants of Teos, by the science which they possessed, and by appropriate words and signs, by which they could recognize their Brethren of the order†. Like Freemasons they were divided into lodges, which were distinguished by different appellations; They occasionally held convivial meetings in houses erected and consecrated for this purpose; and separate associations were under the direction of a master, and presidents, or wardens. They held a general meeting once a year, which was solemnized with great pomp and festival, and at which the Brethren partook of a splendid entertainment, provided by the master, after they had finished the sacrifices to their gods, and especially to their patron Bacchus†. They used particular utensils in their ceremonial observances; some of which were exactly similar to those that are employed by the Fraternity of Freemasons: And the more opulent artists were bound to provide for the exigencies of their poorer brethren†. The very monuments which were reared by these Masons, to the memory of their masters and wardens, remain to the present day, in the Turkish burying grounds, at Siverhissar and Erakill. The inscription upon them express, in strong terms, the gratitude of the Fraternity, for their disinterested exertions in behalf of the Order; for their generosity and benevolence to its individual members; for their private virtues, as well as for their public conduct. From some circumstances, which are stated in these inscriptions, but particularly from the name of one of the lodges: it is highly probable, that Attalus, King of Pergamus, was a member of the Dionysian Fraternity.

MANNERS OF OUR ANCESTORS.

Lord Dorchester, having no wife to do the honours of the table at Thoresby, imposed that task upon his eldest daughter, as soon as she had bodily strength for the office, which in these days required no small share. For the mistress of a country mansion was not only to invite—that is, urge and tease—her company to eat more than human throats could conveniently swallow, but to carve every dish, when chosen, with her own hands. The greater the lady, the more indispensable the duty. Each joint was carried up in its turn, to be operated upon by her, and her alone; since the peers and knights on either hand were so far from being bound to offer their assistance, that the very master of the house, posted opposite to her, might not act as her cupbearer; his department was to push the bottle after dinner. As for the crowd of guests, the most inconsiderate among them—the curate, or subaltern, or squire's younger brother—if suffered through her neglect to help himself to a slice of the mutton placed before him would have chewed it in bitterness, and gone home an affronted man, half inclined to give a wrong vote at the next election. There were then professed carving-masters, who taught young ladies the art scientifically: from one of whom Lady Mary said she took lessons three times a week, that she might be perfect on her father's public days; when in order to perform her functions without interruption, she was forced to eat her own dinner alone an hour or two beforehand.—Correspondence of Lady Mary Montague, by Lord Wharnccliffe.

POPULAR TALES.

DUVAL THE HIGHWAYMAN.

Leaving out of sight Robin Hood, whose thefts have been so varnished over by time and romance as to look now like a lawful mulcting of the rich and oppressive, there is no robber or highwayman in the annals of the English "road," who pursued his profession in so accomplished a manner, and threw so many graces over his thefts, as Claude Duval. This personage was a real Macheath, one who eschewed all the corsair traits of the rascal's character, and there are some incidents in his history, which, we are sure, will amuse those of our readers to whom they are new.

Claude Duval was a Frenchman by birth, having first seen the light, in the year 1643, at Domfront, in Normandy, where his father, Pierre Duval, a miller, resided. Claude was well brought up, and at the age of thirteen or so, he either ran away from his parents, or was permitted by them to go and push his fortune in the world. Having reached Rouen, the Norman capital, Claude chanced to fall in with some post-horses returning to Paris, and was allowed to mount one of them on condition of helping the conductor to dress them at night.

The period of the restoration was well fitted for the development of such a character as that of Claude Duval. Hespeditly became a proficient in gaming, drunkenness, and all those other practices, which under royal favour, were regarded as the highest accomplishments of a gallant of the time.

He was the most insinuating of filcher's, contriving to steal with such a grace, that, so far from terrifying even the ladies, they were content to lose all they had for the pleasure of contemplating his courtesy, and to wish him good luck with what he had appropriated. One story which is told of him will exemplify his manner of going to work. We quote the words of a quaint and ironical notice of Claude Duval in the Harleian Miscellany. Having on one occasion received intelligence that a coach was about to pass along a certain road, with a booty of four hundred pounds in it, Duval and four associates took the field, and at the expected time beheld the object of their search. "In the coach, was a knight, his lady, and only one serving maid, who perceiving five horsemen making up to them, presently imagined that they were beset; and they were confirmed in this apprehension, by seeing them whisper to one another, and ride backwards and forwards. The lady, to show she was not afraid, takes a flageolet out of her pocket and plays: Duval takes the hint, plays also, and excellently well, upon a flageolet of his own, and in this posture he rides up to the coach side. 'Sir,' says he to the person in the coach, 'your lady plays excellently, and I doubt not but that she dances as well: will you please to walk out of the coach, and let me have the honor to dance one currant with her upon the heath?' 'Sir,' said the person in the coach, 'I dare not deny any thing to one of your quality and good mind; you seem a gentleman, and your request is very reasonable;' which said, the lacquey opens the door, out comes the knight, Duval leaps lightly off his horse, and hands the lady out of the coach. They danced, and here it was that Duval performed marvels: the best master in London, except those that are French, not being able to show such footing as he did in his great French riding-boots. The dancing being over, he waits on the lady to her coach. As the knight was going in, says Duval to him, 'Sir, you have forgot to pay the music.' 'No, I have not,' replies the knight and putting his hand under the seat of the coach, pulls out a hundred pounds in a bag, and delivers it to him; which Duval took with him a very good grace, and courteously answered, 'Sir, you are liberal, and shall have no cause to repent your being so; this liberality of yours shall excuse you the other three hundred pounds; and, giving him the word, that, if he met with any more of the crew, he might pass undisturbed. Duval civilly takes his leave of him."

He always treated the fair sex, when he met them on the road, with the most winning politeness, and would restore a favourite trinket with the grace of a cavalier who had picked up a dropped glove. Once, when in company with several of his crew, Duval met with a coach filled with ladies, and sent one of his friends forward to lay them under contribution. The fellow did his office rudely, taking away money, watches, rings, and even the gum bottle of a baby that was present. The child naturally cried, and one of the ladies, the infant's mother, entreated the man only to return the sucking bottle. But the surly thief refused, until Duval, observing him to stay longer than necessary, came up and discovered what had been done. Drawing forth a pistol, Duval levelled it at his associate's head, exclaiming at the same time, "Give back the bottle to the child. Can't you behave like a gentleman, and raise a contribution without stripping people? But, perhaps, you had some occasion for the sucking-bottle yourself, and, indeed, by your actions one would imagine you were hardly weaned." The abashed thief did as he was bid, and Duval departed, having the ladies in admiration of the courteous style of thievery which it was his will to practise, as well as of the ready wit by which he repressed his companion's acquisitiveness.

Claude Duval is said to have exhibited much ingenuity occasionally in compassing such purposes as sheer courage alone could not carry him through. He once entered the Crown Inn, in Beaconsfield, where he heard singing, dancing, and fiddling in merry progress. On inquiry, he found that a sort of wake or fair was kept there that day, and that a large company were assembled. Partly from his natural liking for sport, and partly from the hope of doing business, Duval resolved to alight, and spend the evening there. He did so, entered the kitchen, and called for a pint of wine. By chance an old farmer was sitting by the fire with a companion, whom he told, in Duval's hearing, that he had a hundred pounds in his pockets, which he was anxious for the safety of. Our appropriative hero immediately set down this money as his own, more particularly when he heard the old countryman ask leave to enter the dancing room, and see the diversion. Duval made the same request, and did it so courteously, that he was told he might stay as long as he pleased, and welcome. Thinking more of the hundred pounds than the fiddle or the dancing, the highway practitioner looked around him for some means of making the money change possessors. Clever as he was, he was no conjuror, and could not have what he wished by crying "Presto! pass." But he hit on another method of accomplishing his object. He saw that the only rational way of lightening the farmer of his burden, was to create confusion among the company, during which he might use his fingers unseen. A chimney in the room with a large funnel, struck him as a proper means of executing his project. He went out, and, having told the ostler of his wish to have a bit of frolic with the good company, prevailed upon that personage, by a bribe of two guineas, to dress up the large mastiff-dog of the stable-yard in a raw cow-hide with horns, which lay conveniently at hand, and then, by the help of a ladder and a rope, to let the disguised animal down the fore-mentioned chimney. Having thus arranged matters with his confederate, Duval returned quietly to the dancers, who continued to foot it in the merriest manner. By and bye, an alarming noise was heard in the chimney, and a most unearthly howling succeeded from the same quarter, followed by the thundering descent into the room of what appeared to be a black, yelling, horned demon. The whole company was thrown into confusion, and the question was, which should be first out of the room. The most active pushed down others, and the lights were overthrown, and trampled under foot. In this state of general consternation, Duval found it no difficult matter to empty the pocket of the farmer, whom he had kept a sharp hold of in the bustle. The dog, meanwhile having broken the rope by its weight, bounded over the prostrate crowd, and made its way to the stable, where the ostler instantly uncased it, and rendered it impossible for the trick to be discovered.

Whether it had been found out or not, Duval had taken care of himself. As soon as he had effected his purpose, he took horse, and spared neither whip nor spur till he found himself in London. The loss of the money was discovered after his departure, and search was made for it every where: but, of course it could not be found. It was thereupon settled by common consent that the devil had been permitted to take it away in order to punish the old farmer, who was noted for his miserly covetousness.

When the proclamation, already alluded to, was promulgated, Duval, being then well provided with money thought proper to decamp for France. He was not here long ere he squandered all he possessed, and was compelled to resort to his old practices. It is recorded of him that he assumed the character of alchemist, ostensibly for the purpose of extracting gold from lead but in reality to squeeze it out of an avaricious Jesuit, confessor to the king of France. By putting some pieces of gold into the end of a stick, and then stirring with this stick a crucible filled with melting lead, Duval contrived to exhibit the seeming transmutation of a portion of the lead into gold, by the melting of the particles in the stick. By this means he insinuated himself into the Jesuit's confidence; and the result was, that one day his reverence being alone with his philosophic friend, found himself suddenly bound and gagged, and had the satisfaction of seeing his strong-box rifled before his face, himself being all the while unable to utter a word of remonstrance.

This enabled Claude Duval to return to England, which, somehow or other, foreigners of his class have always chosen as the favourite field of their exertions, possibly from the patriotic wish to spare their own countrymen. How long Duval flourished his after return to England, it is difficult to say, as the dates of the principal events of his life have not been preserved. He did not confine himself entirely to highway practice, but preyed upon the world, in various other ways. Dressed elegantly after the fashion of a finished gallant of the time, he frequented gaming-tables and laid under contribution knights, and squires, and lords of high degree, who little dreamt of the true character of their companion. Duval was a most dexterous cheat at cards—or, to speak in more measured language of such a man's qualifications, he could slip a card beautifully. He was mightily given to betting, and laid his wagers with such skill and prudence, that he often won large sums by the practice, and seldom lost small ones.

The law, which has no respect for persons, at length laid its hands on this polished highwayman, whom it had described in a thousand bills and proclamations.—He was not taken while attacking the king's lieges but after having assaulted several pottles of wine. In plain language, he was arrested while drunk, at the Hole in the Wall tavern in Chandos Street. His capture excited a sensation proportioned to the repute he had gained in life. After being arraigned convicted, and condemned, while he lay awaiting his doom in Newgate, he was visited by many ladies, among whom were several of rank, all anxious to see the man who, in his lawless courses, ever preserved a degree of romantic and most unwonted courtesy to those of their sex.—There rested on him, besides, we believe, no stain of blood, though, from the life he had led, this would be difficult to determine. The life of Duval was interceded for, but in vain. On the 21st of January 1669-70, when he had barely reached the age of twenty seven, he was executed at Tyburn. His youth, comeliness, and extraordinary character, in which a vein of good ran through the bad, caused tears it is said, to dim many gentle eyes, when he suffered at the fatal tree. Thanks to an improved moral of society, and thanks to an improved system of police, the race of Duvals are now extinct in the land, never, it is hoped to be revived.

Important to Farmers. A farmer of Long Island, writes that the half breed Durham cattle are better suited to bear the extremes of heat and cold which they will be exposed to in this climate, than the pure Durham, as their skins are thicker, and their coats closer and longer than the pure breed. The milking qualities of the heifers bred in this way are almost beyond belief some of them milking forty, and even fifty quarts a day, of rich fine milk.

CHARACTER.

From Benley's Dictionary.

MATHEWS, KEMBLE, AND MUSTAPHA THE CAT.

As everything relating to the late Charles Mathews is an object of public interest, we are happy to have it in our power to present our readers with a portrait in character of that unrivalled comedian, and with a scene in private life between him and his friend, Kemble.

Mr. Mathews and Mr. Kemble had been dining together at Mr. Charles Kemble's house. Mr. John Kemble had taken much wine, and when the party broke up, Mr. Mathews determined to accompany the tragedian to his own door. Giving him his arm, therefore, they proceeded slowly to Mr. Kemble's house in Great Russell Street, Bloomsbury. The tragedian was full of talk, and 'very happy' as it is called; and although the hour was late, his pressing invitation to his friend to enter the house with him induced my husband to obey. It was evident that the man who opened the door was the only person who remained up in the establishment. Mr. Kemble went into his library, by Mr. Mathews, and desired the attendant to bring a tray, at the same time, with great formality, introducing him to the notice of his guest as the 'gentleman who did him the honour to take care of his wine,' &c. It was in vain that Mr. Mathews protested against further hospitality. Mr. Kemble was too much excited to have his spirit easily laid; and, surrounded as he was with books, he began a disquisition upon their authors above all his 'beloved Shakespeare,' on whom he discoursed most eloquently, after taking a volume from the shelf, and devoutly kissing the binding. At length the tray was brought in with wine, water, &c., and with it entered an enormous cat decorated with a red collar and a bell. The appearance of his favourite cat called forth its master's most affectionate notice, and many relations of its extraordinary powers of understanding, its devoted attachment to its master's person, &c. were detailed to Mr. Mathews. Mustapha, Mr. Kemble declared, had much of human feeling of the best kind in his composition; he described how he watched his return home, mourned his absence, &c. and grew maudlin in its praise. The animal seemed happy in its master's presence; and looked up in his face as it composedly lay down before him.—Mr. Mathews mewed; Mr. Kemble, turning round at this sound, which he believed to proceed from the cat observed, 'There, my dear Mathews, do you hear that? Now that creature knows all I say of him, and is replying to it.' This amused my husband, and he repeated the experiment in all the varieties of feline intonation, mewing, purring, &c. Mr. Kemble, at last, said to him in his slow and measured tones, 'Now you don't know what he means by that, but I do. Mus! Mus!' (on every reiteration of this affectionate diminutive, raising his voice to its most tragic expression of tenderness) 'umph! My dear sir, that creature knows that it is beyond my usual time of sitting up, and he's uneasy! Mus! Mus!'—but Mus was sleepy and inattentive, and his master resumed his criticisms upon the different readings of Shakespeare, talked also of Lope de Vega, and was again interrupted by a mew, as he believed, from the dissatisfied Mus. 'What,' asked his fond master, looking down upon him, 'what is it you desire, my good friend?' (Mus., alias Mathews, mewed once more, in a more supplicating and more touching tone.) 'Well, well! I understand you; you want to go to bed. Well, I suppose I must indulge you.' Here Mr. Kemble deliberately arose, put down his book upon the table, with his face open at the page to which he had referred, took a measured pinch of snuff, and tottered to the door, which he with difficulty opened. He then awaited Mustapha's exit; but Mustapha having no voice in the affair, preferred remaining where he was; and his master kindly reproached him with being a 'little capricious' in first asking to go, and then preferring to stay. With a smile and look at my husband of the gentlest indulgence towards his favourite's humour, he tottered back again to his chair, resumed his declamatory observations upon the relative powers of dramatic writers, and their essential requisites, till the troublesome Mustapha again renewed his mewing solicitations. Mr. Kemble once more stopped, and looking again at the imaginary cause of his interruption, with philosophic patience, asked, 'well, Mus, what would you have?' Then after another pause, turning to his guest, said; 'Now, my dear Mathews, you are fond of animals, and ought to know this one; he's a perfect character for you to study. Now, sir, that cat knows that I shall be ill to-morrow, and he's uneasy at my sitting up.' Then benevolently looking at the cat, added—'Umph!—my dear Mus. I must beg your indulgence, my good friend; I really can-not go to bed yet.' Mus whined his reply, and his master declared that the cat asked to be allowed to go away. On the door being a second time opened, after similar exertion, on Mr. Kemble's part to effect this courtesy, and several grave chirpings in order to entice Mus. from the fireplace, the animal at length left the room. Mr. Kemble then returned, as before, to his seat, drank another glass of wine and water, and, just as he was comfortably re-established, the incorrigible Mus. was heard in the passage again, in loud lament, and importunate demand for re-admittance. 'Umph!' said Mr. Kemble, with another pinch of snuff—'now that animal, sir, is not happy, after all, away from me. (Mus. was louder than ever at this moment.) 'Why what ails the creature? Surely, there is more in this than we dream of, Mathews. You, who have studied such beings, ought to be able to explain.' Poor Mus. made another pathetic appeal for re-admission, and his master's heart was not made of flint. Mr. Kemble apologized to his guest for these repeated interruptions, and managed once more to make his way to the door. After opening it, and waiting a minute for the re-entrance of his favourite, but not seeing it, he smiled at my husband with the same indulgent expression as before, and remarked, 'Now, would you believe it, Mathews, that extraordinary animal was affronted at not being let in again on his first appeal—and now it is his humour not to come at all! Mus!—Mustapha!—Mus!' But as no Mus. appeared, the door was closed with the same deliberation, and Mr. Kemble once more contrived to regain his chair, and recommenced his comments, quite unobservant of the almost hysterical fit of laughter to which my husband was by this time reduced, at the imposition he had so successfully, though in the first place so unintentionally, practised upon the credulity of his grave and unsuspecting friend. But it did not end here; for Mr. Mathews reiterated his imitations, and Mr. Kemble again remarked upon his favourite's peculiarities of temper, &c.—again went to the door—again returned, till even Mr. 'Midnight' (as some friends of ours christened Mr. Mathews, from his love of late hours) felt it time to retire, and leave Mr. Kemble, which he did as he saw him fall asleep in the act of representing his idea of the scene of the sick king in Henry IV.—with his pocket handkerchief spread over his head as a substitute for the characteristic drapery of the dying monarch.*

ODDS AND ENDS.

There is no vice so pitiful, so contemptible as that of lying. He who permits himself to tell a lie once, finds it much easier to do it a second and third time till at length it becomes habitual; he tells lies without attending to it, and truths without the world's believing him.

There is nothing like keeping up one's dignity.—An Ohio editor, in speaking of the river, says it has got so low that it is beneath his notice.

"Why did Adam bite the apple?" asked a country schoolmaster of his pupil. Because he had no knife," said the boy.

A young lady, engaged as "help in a family up town" is so extremely modest that she dressed the legs of a chicken in pantalettes, and put chemisette over the breast, before sending it to the table.

An editor apologizes for the lack of editorial matter by saying that he carried several good and interesting articles to a wedding in his hat, and the girls coaxed them all out of him to wrap up bride's cake in! That's the last excuse we have heard.

An Irishman advertised a newly invented washing machine in these words:—"Every man his own washer-woman."

Richness of dress contributes nothing to a man of sense; but rather makes his sense, inquired into. The more the body is set off, the mind appears the less.

MISCELLANY.

HAMILTON AND BURR.

(CONCLUDED FROM PAGE 93.)

No. 9.

26th June, 1804.

Sir,
I have communicated the letter which you did me the honor to write to me of this date to Gen. Hamilton. The expectations now disclosed on the part of Col. Burr, appear to him to have greatly extended the original ground of enquiry, and instead of presenting a particular and definitive case for explanation, seem to aim at nothing less than an inquisition into his most confidential conversations, as well as others, through the whole period of his acquaintance with Col. Burr.

While he was prepared to meet the particular case fairly and fully, he thinks it inadmissible that he should be expected to answer at large as to every thing that he may possibly have said in relation to the character of Col. Burr at any time or upon any occasion.—Though he is not conscious that any charges which are in circulation to the prejudice of Col. Burr have originated with him, except one which may have been so considered, and which has long since been fully explained between Col. Burr and himself—yet he cannot consent to be questioned generally as to any rumors which may be afloat derogatory to the character of Col. Burr without specification of the several rumors, many of them probably unknown to him. He does not, however mean to authorise any conclusion as to the real nature of his conduct towards Col. Burr by his declining so loose and vague a basis of explanation, and he disavows, any unwillingness to come to a satisfactory, provided it be an honorable, accommodation. His objection is, the very indefinite ground which Col. Burr has assumed, in which he is sorry to be able to discern nothing short of predetermined hostility. Presuming, therefore, that it will be adhered to, he has instructed me to receive the message which you have in charge to deliver. For this purpose I shall be at home and at your command, to-morrow morning, from 9 to 10 o'clock.

I have the honor to be, respectfully,
Your obedient servant.
N. PENDLETON.

No. 10.

Sir,

The letter which I had the honor to receive from you, under date of yesterday, states that among other things, that in Gen. H.'s opinion Col. B. has taken a very indefinite ground, in which he evinces nothing short of predetermined hostility, and that Gen. Hamilton thinks it inadmissible that the enquiry should extend to his confidential as well as other conversations. In this Col. Burr can only reply, that secret whispers traducing his fame and impeaching his honor are, at least, equally injurious with slanders publicly uttered; that Gen. H. had, at no time, and in no place, a right to use any such injurious expressions; and that the partial negative he is disposed to give, with the reservations he wishes to make, are proofs that he has done the injury specified.

Col Burr's request was, in the first instance, proposed in a form the most simple, in order that Gen. H. might give to the affair that course to which he might be induced by his temper and his knowledge of facts. Col. Burr trusted with confidence that from the frankness of a soldier and the candor of a gentleman he might expect an ingenuous declaration. That if, as he had reason to believe, Gen. H. had used expressions derogatory to his honor, he would have had the magnanimity to retract them; and that if from his language injurious inferences had been improperly drawn, he would have perceived the propriety of correcting errors which might have been thus widely diffused.—With these impressions, Col. B. was greatly surprised at receiving a letter which he considered as evasive, and in a manner not altogether decorous. In one expectation, however, he was wholly deceived, for the close of Gen. Hamilton's letter contained an intimation that if Col. Burr should dislike his refusal to acknowledge or deny he was ready to meet the consequence. This Col B. deemed a sort of defiance, and would have felt justified in making it the basis of an immediate message. But as the communication contained something concerning the indefiniteness of the request; as he believed it rather the offspring of false pride or reflection, and as he felt the utmost reluctance to proceed to extremities while any other hope remained, his request was repeated in terms more explicit. The replies and propositions on the part of Gen. H. have in Col. B.'s opinion been constantly in substance the same.

Col. B. disavows all motives of predetermined hostility, charged by which he thinks insult added to injury. He feels as a gentleman should feel when his honor is impeached or assailed; and without sensation of hostility or wishes of revenge, he is determined to vindicate that honor at such hazard as the nature of the case demands.

The length to which this correspondence has extended, only tending to prove that the satisfactory redress earnestly desired cannot be obtained, he deems it useless to offer any proposition except the simple message which I shall now have the honor to deliver.

I have the honor to be,
Your obedient servant.
W. P. VANNESS,

Wednesday, June 27th, 1804.

With this letter a message was received, such as was to be expected, containing an invitation, which was accepted, and Mr. P. informed Mr. V. N. that he should hear from him the next day as to further particulars.

This letter was delivered to Gen. H. on the same evening, and a very short conversation ensued between him and Mr. P. who was to call on him early the next morning for a further conference. When he did so, Gen. H. said he had not understood whether the message and answer were definitively concluded, or whether another meeting was to take place for that purpose between Mr. P. and Mr. V. N. Under the latter impression, and as the last letter contained matter that naturally led to animadversion, he gave Mr. P. a paper of remarks, in his own hand writing, to be communicated to Mr. V. N. if the state of the affair rendered it proper.

In the farther interview with Mr. V. N. that day, after explaining the causes which had induced Gen. H. to suppose that the state of the affair did not render it improper, he offered this paper to Mr. V. N. but he declined receiving it, alleging that he considered the correspondence as closed by the acceptance of the message that he had delivered.

Mr. P. informed Mr. V. N. of the inducements mentioned by Gen. H. in those remarks for the postponing the meeting until the close of the circuit, and as this was uncertain Mr. P. was to let him know when it would be convenient.

On Friday, the 6th of July, the circuit being closed, Mr. P. gave this information, and that Gen. Hamilton would be ready at any time after the Sunday following. On Monday the particulars were arranged, and the public are but too well acquainted with the result.

The paper above alluded to is as follows:
No. 11.

Remarks on the letter of June 27th, 1804.

Whether the observations on this letter are designed merely to justify the result which is indicated in the close of the letter, or may be intended to give an opening for rendering any thing explicit which may have been deemed vague, heretofore, can only be judged of by the sequel. At any rate it appears to me necessary not to be misunderstood. Mr. Pendleton is therefore authorised to say that in the course of the present discussion, written or verbal, there has been no intention to evade, or defy or insult, but a sincere disposition to avoid extremities if it could be done with propriety. With this view Gen. H. has been ready to enter into a frank and free explanation on any and every object of a specific nature; but not to answer a general and abstract inquiry, embracing a period too long for any accurate recollection, and exposing him to unpleasant criticisms from, or unpleasant discussions with any and every person, who may have understood him in an unfavorable sense. This (admitting that he could answer in a manner the most satisfactory to Col. Burr) he should deem inadmissible, in principle and in precedent, and humiliating in practice. To this, therefore, he can never submit. Frequent allusion has been made to slanders said to be in circulation. Whether they are openly or in whispers they have a form and shape, and might be specified.

If the alternative alluded to in the close of the letter is definitively tendered, it must be accepted; the time, place and manner, to be afterwards regulated. I should not think it right in the midst of a circuit court to withdraw my services from those who may have confided important interests to me, and expose them to the embarrassment of seeking other counsel, who may not have time to be sufficiently instructed in their cause. I shall also want a little time to make some arrangements respecting my own affairs.

The following paper, in the hand writing of Gen. H., was enclosed with his will and some other papers in a packet addressed to one of his executors, which was of course not to have been delivered but in case of the melancholy event that has happened. As it contains his motives and reflections on the cause that have led to this fatal catastrophe, it is deemed proper to communicate it to the public.

No. 12.

On my expected interview with Col. B., I think it proper to make some remarks, explanatory of my conduct, motives and views.

I was certainly desirous of avoiding this interview, for the most cogent reasons.

1. My religious and moral principles are strongly opposed to the practice of duelling, and it would ever give me pain to be obliged to shed the blood of a fellow creature in a private combat forbidden by the laws.

2. My wife and children are extremely dear to me, and my life is of the utmost importance to them, in various views.

3. I feel a sense of obligation towards my creditors, who in case of accident to me, by the forced sale of my property, may be in some degree sufferers. I did not think myself at liberty, as a man of probity, lightly to expose them to this hazard.

4. I am conscious of no ill will to Col. B. distinct from political opposition, which, as I trust, has proceeded from pure and upright motives.

Lastly, I shall hazard much and can possibly gain nothing by the issue of the interview.

But it was, as I conceive, impossible for me to avoid it. There were intrinsic difficulties in the thing, and artificial embarrassments, from the manner of proceeding on the part of Col. B.

Intrinsic, because it is not to be denied that my animadversion on the political principles, character and views of Col. B. have been extremely severe, and on different occasions I in common with many others, have made very unfavorable criticisms on particular instances of the private conduct of that gentleman.

In proportion as these impressions were entertained with sincerity, and uttered with motives and for purposes which might appear to me commendable, would be the difficulty (until they could be removed by evidence of their being erroneous) of explanation or apology.—The disavowal required of me by Col. B. in a general and indefinite form, was out of my power, if it had really been proper for me to submit to be so questioned; but I was sincerely of opinion that this could not be, and in this opinion I was confirmed by that of a very moderate and judicious friend whom I consulted. Besides that Col. Burr appeared to me to assume, in the first instance, a tone unnecessarily peremptory and menacing, and in the second positively offensive. Yet I wished, as far as might be practicable, to leave a door open to accommodation. This, I think, will be inferred from the written communications made by me and by my direction, and would be confirmed by the conversations between Mr. V. N. and myself which arose out of the subject.

I am not sure whether, under all these circumstances, I did not go further in the attempt to accommodate than a punctilious delicacy will justify. If so, I hope the motives I have stated will excuse me.

It is not my design, by what I have said, to inflict any odium on the conduct of Col. B. in this case.—He doubtless has heard of animadversions of mine which bore very hard upon him; and it is probable that, as usual, they were accompanied with some falsehoods. He may have supposed himself under a necessity of acting as he has done. I hope the grounds of his proceeding are such as ought to satisfy his own conscience.

I trust, at the same time, that the world will do me the justice to believe that I have not censured him on light grounds, nor from unworthy inducements. I certainly have had strong reasons for what I may have said, though it is possible that I may have been influenced by misconception or misinformation. It is also to my ardent wish that I may have been more mistaken than I think I have been, and that he, in his future conduct may show himself worthy of all confidence and esteem, and prove an ornament and blessing to the country.

As well because it is possible that I may have injured Col. B. however convinced myself that my opinions and declarations have been well founded, as from my general principles and temper in similar affairs—I have resolved, if our interview be conducted in the usual manner, to reserve and throw away my first fire, and I have thought even of reserving my second fire, and thus giving a double opportunity to Col. B. to pause and to reflect.

It is not, however, my intention to enter into any explanations on the ground. Apology, from principle. I hope, rather than pride, is out of the question.

To those who, with me, abhorring the practice of duelling, may think that I ought on no account to have added to the number of bad examples, I answer that my relative situation, as well public as private, enforcing all the considerations which constitute what men of the world, denominate honor, imposed on me (as I thought) a peculiar necessity not to decline the call. The ability to be in future useful, whether in resisting mischief or effecting good, in those crisis of our public affairs which seem likely to happen, would probably be inseparable from a conformity with public prejudice in this particular.

A. H.

The occurrences of that interview will appear from the following statement, No. 13, which has been drawn up and mutually agreed on by the seconds of the parties.

NO. 13.

Col. Burr arrived first on the ground, as had been previously agreed; when Gen. H. arrived, the parties exchanged salutations, and the seconds proceeded to make their arrangements. They measured the distance, ten full paces, and cast lots for the choice of position, and also to determine by whom the word should be given, both of which fell to the second of general H. They then proceeded to load the pistols in each others presence, after which the parties took their stations.—The gentleman who was to give the word, then explained to the parties the rules which were to govern them in firing, which were as follows: "The parties being placed in their stations, the second who gives the word shall ask them whether they are ready; answered in the affirmative, he shall say 'present,' after this the parties shall present and fire when they please. If one fires before the other, the opposite second shall say, one, two, three, fire—and he shall then fire or loose his fire." He then asked if they were prepared, being answered in the affirmative, he gave the word present, as had been agreed on, and both parties presented and fired in succession, the intervening time is not expressed, as the seconds do not precisely agree on that point. The fire of Col. Burr took effect, and Gen. H. almost instantly fell. Col. B. then advanced towards Gen. H. with a manner and gesture that appeared to Gen. Hamilton's friend to be expressive of regret, but without speaking turned about and withdrew, being urged from the field by his friend, as has been frequently stated, with a view to prevent his being recognised by the surgeon and bargemen who were then approaching.—No further communication took place between the principals, and the barge that carried Col. Burr immediately returned to the city. We conceive it proper to add that the conduct of the parties in this interview was perfectly proper as suited the occasion.

[The General's pistol was discharged inadvertently, in consequence of the shock he received from his antagonist's fire.]

FASCINATIONS OF THE SNAKE.

The following interesting anecdotes are from Dr. Bird's "Peter Pilgrim."

Walking (says Dr. Todd of Vermont) in a field in Connecticut, near a small grove of walnut trees I saw a sparrow circling in the air, just in the margin of the wood, and making dreadful moans of distress. Immediately the former circumstances occurred (he had seen an instance of charming in his boyhood, but had been frightened away by the charmer,) and I approached with caution within twenty feet of a black snake, about seven feet long, having a whitethroat, and of the kind which the people call runners or choaking snakes.—The snake lay stretched out in a still pasture. I viewed him and the bird near half an hour. The bird, in every turn in its flight descended nearer the object of its terror, until it approached the mouth of the serpent. The snake, by a quick motion of its head, seized the bird by the feathers, and plucked out several. The bird flew off a few feet, quickly returned. The snake continued to pluck the feathers at every flight of the bird, until it could no longer fly. The bird would hop up to the snake and from him, until it had not a feather left, except on its wings and head. The snake now killed it by breaking its neck, by an amazing sudden motion; he did not devour it, but cast it a little off, and continued his station. Now the tragedy was to be again repeated; for another bird of the same kind, which had shown signs of distress during the first tragedy, was fascinated to the jaws of the monster, in the same circling manner as the former, and suffered the loss of some feathers. With indignation I attacked the hated reptile, but he escaped me. The living bird was liberated from his fangs. The dead one I picked up and showed to my friends, destitute of feathers as before mentioned.

The following is a story authenticated by Samuel Beach a naturalist, of two boys in New Jersey who, being in the woods looking for cattle, lighted by chance upon a large black snake, upon which one of them an inquisitive imp, immediately resolved to ascertain by experiment whether the snake so celebrated for its powers, could charm or fascinate him; he requested his companion to take up a stick and keep a good eye on the snake, to prevent evil consequences while he made a trial of its powers. This, says Mr. Beach, the other agreed to do, when the first advanced a few steps nearer the snake and made a stand, looking steadily at him. When the snake observed him in that situation, he raised his head with a quick motion, and the lad says that at that moment there appeared something to flash in his eyes which he could compare to nothing more like than the rays of light thrown from a glass or mirror when turned in the sunshine; he said it dazzled his eyes at the same time the colors appeared very beautiful, and were in large rings circles or rolls, and it seemed to be dark to him every where else, and his head began to be dizzy, much like being over swift running water. He then says he thought he would go from the snake, and as it was dark every where but in the circles, he was fearful of treading any where else; and as they still grew less in circumference, he could not see where to step; but as the dizziness in his head still increased, and he tried to call his comrade for help, but he could not speak; it then appeared to him as though he was in a vortex or whirlpool, and that every turn brought him nearer to the center. His comrade, who had impatiently waited, observing him move forward to the right and left and at every turn approach the snake, making a strange groaning noise, not unlike a person in the night-mare, could stand still no longer, but immediately ran and killed the snake which was of the largest size. He that had been charmed was much terrified and in a tremor, his shirt was in a few moments wet with sweat, he complained much of a dizziness in his head, attended with great pain, and appeared in a melancholy, stupid situation for some days.

Another account is given on the authority of Col. Coghorn, of Rutland, Va. and relates to two men of Salisbury, Conn. named Baker and Nichols. Going towards the Meeting House in the place, they discovered a large rattlesnake in a plain piece of open land.—The snake lay coiled up in a posture of defence. To attack him with safety they procured a long slender pole or switch with which they could reach him without being in any danger from his motions. As the snake could not escape, they diverted themselves by irritating him with their pole without giving him any considerable wound. They had carried on their business some time, the snake had repeatedly attempted to spring upon them from his coils and to escape by running and discovered uncommon appearances of rage and disappointment. Being prevented in all his attempts to escape from or bite his opponents, he suddenly stretched himself at his full length, and fixed his eyes on the man who was tickling him with the end of the pole. The snake lay perfectly still, and Mr. Nichols kept on the same motion with his switch. When this scene had continued for a short time, Mr. Nichols seemed to incline his body more and more towards the snake, and began to move towards him in a very slow and irregular manner. Baker, who stood looking on, noticed these appearances, and called Nichols to desist from the business and despatch the snake. He took no notice of these admonitions, but appeared to have his whole attention fixed on the snake. He was observed to be gradually moving towards him, to have a pale aspect, and to be in a profuse sweat. Alarmed at the prospect, Baker took him by the shoulders, gave him a violent shake, and pulled him away by force, and inquired what was the matter. Mr. Nichols, forced from the scene, made an uncommon mournful noise of distress, appeared to be uncommonly and universally affected, and in a few minutes replied to the inquiries that he did not know what ailed him, that he could not tell how he felt, that he never felt so before, that he did not know what was the matter with him, but felt unwell.

A third case is the fascination of a lady of Lansingburg, on the North River, vouched for by Mr. Watkins, a minister of the gospel, whom she informed of the adventure. The spell was in this case relieved by a passer-by; when the disenchanted lady immediately felt as though she had been among poisonous herbs, itching, &c. which issued in a long fit of sickness, which her physician ascribed to the fascination of the snake; and she had not recovered, says the reverend narrator, when I saw her.

Another case still more interesting:—When I was a boy about 13 years old, (says Mr. Willard) my father sent me into a field to mow some briars. I had not long been employed when I discovered a large rattlesnake, and looked around for something to kill him; but not readily discovering a weapon, my curiosity led me to view him. He had coiled up, with his tail erect, and making the usual singing noise with his rattles. I had viewed him but a short time, when the most vivid and lively colors the imagination can paint, and far beyond the powers of the pencil to imitate, among which yellow was the most predominant, and the whole drawn into a bewitching variety of gay and pleasing forms, were presented to my eyes; at the same time my ears were enchanted with the most rapturous strains of music, wild, lively, complicated and harmonious, in the highest degree melodious, captivating and enchanting, far beyond any thing I ever heard before or since, and indeed far exceeding what my imagination in any other situation could have conceived. I felt myself irresistibly drawn towards the hated reptile; and as I had been used to seeing and killing rattlesnakes, and my senses were absorbed by the gay vision and rapturous music. I was not for some time apprehensive of much danger; but suddenly recollecting what I had heard the Indians relate, (but what I had never before believed) of the fascinating power of those serpents, I turned with horror from the dangerous scene; but it was not without the most violent efforts that I was able to extricate myself. All the exertions I could make with my whole strength were hardly sufficient to carry me from the scene of horrid, yet pleasing enchantment; and while I forcibly dragged on my body, my head seemed irresistibly drawn to the enchanter by an invisible power, and I fully believe that in a few minutes more it would have been wholly out of my power to make an exertion sufficient to get away. The latter part of the scene I was extremely frightened, and ran as fast as possible towards home, my fright increasing with my speed. The first person I saw was my uncle, who discovering my fright, ran to meet me, and asked the occasion of it I told him I had been frightened by a rattlesnake, but was in too great a perturbation to relate the whole. He rallied me for my pusillanimity, took me by the hand, and went to the place where the snake was still lying, but was soon dispatched by my uncle.

Comparison of Speed. A French scientific journal states that the ordinary rate is, per second, of a man walking 4 feet; of a good horse, in harness, 12; of a reindeer, in a sledge, on the ice, 26; of an English race horse 43; of a hare 88; of a good sailing ship 14; of the wind, 82 of a twenty four pounder cannon ball 1300 of the air, which, so divided, returns into space 1,300.

A HIGHWAYMAN'S GRAVE.

As the train of vehicles on the London and Birmingham railway passes over Box-Moor, the passengers have a transient glance of a solitary grave on the adjacent heath. This is the place of burial of Snook, a highwayman, who, under a proper system of penal discipline, might have been reclaimed to the paths of rectitude. The following notice of Snook occurs in a book called Railroadiana, lately published:—

"About the year 1800, during the period of the formation of the canal over Box-Moor, a robbery of the mail bags was effected one night, by a man named Snook, which created a great sensation at the time, from the fact of Snook being afterwards executed near the spot of the robbery, which is now marked by a mound of earth opposite the farm-house at the western end of the moor. The mail bags were in those days carried by horse, and on the night in question the man who had them in charge was stopped by a robber and compelled to carry the bags to a solitary spot, and then told 'to go about his business.' The next morning the bags were found with part of their contents, in a field, by some labourers in the employ of a respectable farmer named Pope. Information was immediately given to the postmaster of the district, Mr. Page of the King's Arms, Berkhamstead, who forthwith proceeded to the Post Office, in London, where he delivered what had been found to Mr. Freeling (the late Sir Francis Freeling), and for the time all clue to the perpetrator of the robbery was lost.

It afterwards transpired that the name of the culprit was Snook. He obtained by this adventure a large booty, having from one letter alone abstracted property to the amount of five hundred pounds. With this he hastened to London, the needy villain's general home, and took up his abode in the borough of Southwark. There one of those incautious acts which commonly follow or accompany crime, had nearly betrayed him into the hands of justice. He sent a servant from the house where he resided, to purchase a piece of cloth for a coat, and gave her what she understood was a five pound note. When this as such was presented in payment for the cloth, the tradesman said there must be some mistake, as what she had tendered, instead of being a five, was a fifty-pound note. The female returned to Mr. Snook, who upon this thought it advisable instantly to decamp, and he then directed his steps to Hungerford in Wiltshire, which was his native place. Here he for sometime eluded pursuit, though the most active exertions were made by the police to discover his retreat, and a reward of three hundred pounds was offered for his apprehension. He was at length taken, in consequence of being recognised by a post-boy who had formerly been his school fellow. Carried to Hertford, he was put on his trial, and found guilty. A severe example was thought necessary, and he was ordered to die. Instructions were then given to Mr. Page, who was high constable of the district, as well as postmaster, to select a place for his execution, as near as possible to the scene of his crime, so as not to give annoyance to the neighborhood, and it was intended that he should be hung in irons; but this being petitioned against by those who resided on or near Box-Moor, the design was abandoned. The criminal conducted himself with great fortitude. He proposed to one whom he had formerly known, to give him his watch, on condition that he should take away his remains! but the party applied to, unwilling to have attention fixed on him as the friend of such a character, declined the offer. It was in consequence determined that he should be buried under the gallows. The place already described having been fixed upon for the closing scene, on the day of execution he was brought from Hertford in a post-chaise; and the apparatus of death, also brought from Hertford, having been previously erected, he was placed in a cart, and launched into eternity. After the corpse was cut down it was then asked if any one would give him a coffin. Nobody came forward, and the hangman having stated that the clothes of the dead man were now his property, proceeded to strip the body for interment. His garments having been removed, with the exception of the lower part of his dress, the executioner was about to seize also on them, when Mr. Page interfered, and insisted that some regard should be had to decency, and that these should not be taken from the defunct malefactor. A hole was then dug beneath the fatal tree, on which he had suffered, and a truss of straw having been procured, half of it was thrown into the grave, and the corpse being placed on it, the other half was thrown on the body, and the earth was without further ceremony filled in. But the people in the neighboring town of Hemel Hempstead, hurt at the manner in which a wretched fellow-creature had thus been entombed, subscribed to purchase a coffin, which on the following day they carried to the place where the miserable robber had paid the last penalty of the law, re-opened the grave, and deposited the lifeless form in the coffin so compassionately subscribed for, and the earth was again immediately closed over him."

AMERICAN MASONIC REGISTER.

ALBANY, SATURDAY, NOV. 30, 1839.

Those Brethren who subscribed the prospectus for the Masonic Register, by me circulated, and who have not paid for the same to me, or Br. Mix, will oblige me much by sending the same to Br. L. G. Hoffman, by mail. The Post Masters, are authorised to send such money free of postage.

BLANCHARD POWERS.

Bennington, Nov. 19, 1839.

FOREIGN.—The British Queen arrived in New York last Saturday, having left Portsmouth, Nov. 4. She brings 180 passengers. The news by her, is in all respects favorable. The suspension of specie payments by the U. S. Bank, had not reached there. The English had taken possession of Passages in Spain, but on remonstrance, had evacuated it. A crazy woman, had thrown a stone into the carriage of the king of France. Russian officers, arrested on the charge of conspiracy, in June last, had made their escape. Lord Brougham narrowly escaped with his life, by the running away of his horses. It created a strong sensation. The British armies have gained signal victories in Afghanistan, and Cabool, and that country is now reduced under their power. The Russians have been defeated in Circassia. The loan on London for £300,000, had not been filled up beyond dispute—and a great controversy had broken out in the press respecting its character. The negotiation for the loan in Holland, had failed. The Liverpool, whose arrival is daily expected, brings out $350,000 in specie, part of which was intended for the U. S. Bank. The Duke of Bedford is dead. The misunderstandings of Bulwer, the novelist, and his lady, have found their way into the newspapers. She appears under her own signature, and the papers ungallantly say, that she exhibits some jealousy, and a good deal of tergiversity.

Sheridan Knowles' new play was to have been produced on the 4th, and Ellen Tree was to have made her first appearance on the British stage, since her return from America. Mr. Wheaton, the agent of the U. S. at Prussia, has been successful in his mission to that country. The intelligence from Paris, gives a favorable account of the corn markets. The London Sun, in allusion to the Queen's marriage, says: Flying rumors begin to ripen into certainty as to the marriage of the Queen; and it seems that Victoria will not, like the former maiden sovereign, be teased with repeated applications from parliament to enter the matrimonial circle. Prince Albert is a guest at the palace, which is likely to be his home; and as our fair readers, at least, may be curious to know something of the form and bearing of the man who can win the hand of a Queen, we may add that he is described as a "fine, noble looking fellow, with blue eyes, hair and whiskers rather sandy, stature tall, of a cheerful disposition, not affected in his manners, and he speaks English well, but with something of a foreign accent."

THE ST. JOHNS' DAY.—We cheerfully comply with the wishes of our brethren in Po'keepsie, by publishing their card. We should be much rejoiced to be enabled to chronicle other cards of the same nature. In our own city, it is intended to remember the advent of our patron Saint, in the same manner. Indeed, we have done so, for several years past. There are other reasons why the days of December and June, should be kept, independent of the "feast of reason and flow of soul," which they are calculated to call forth. The 24th of June in particular, we are anxious to see observed. Two or three celebrations of that day, prudently and properly managed, we believe, would have the happy tendency of concentrating and bringing forth our strength. Will our brethren give it a thought.

We shall be happy to publish the proceedings of our Brethren in Poughkeepsie, as well as elsewhere, if they will send them to us.

IMPORTANT TO PRINTERS.—We observed some time since a paragraph in several of our exchange papers, stating that a postmaster was authorised by his instructions, to remit money to the publisher of a newspaper under his frank. Several of the post offices from whom we have received enclosures, do not appear to be aware of this fact, and to give it an official form, we addressed a note to the Post Master General, on the subject. He very promptly sent us a printed circular of instructions, from which we make the following extract:

"A post master may enclose money in a letter to the publisher of a newspaper, to pay the subscription of a third person, and FRANK the letter, if written by himself."

Our patrons will perceive, that any delicacy they may have had in burthening us with postage, is now entirely removed.

The Courier des Etats Unis, a paper printed in New York, says, that "Chance has just put into our hands a judicial document, the most imposing and interesting to all Christians, that has ever been recorded in human annals, namely, the identical death warrant of our Lord Jesus Christ." We are free to admit that the discovery of such a document, would not only be "interesting to all Christians," but to the world at large. The learned editor would undoubtedly make his fortune should he publish a second edition of Sinbad the Sailor, with his own notes. Locke's learned discoveries in the moon, bear no comparison to his own.

Mobile has been visited by another destructive fire. On the 9th inst. the warehouse of Ellis and Green, took fire in consequence of the spontaneous combustion of some lime, and was consumed, with its contents. Loss $12,000. No insurance.

TO OUR POETICAL FRIENDS.—Our carrier, wishes us to say, that he will stand in need of an address, for the coming New Year, and that he will give a volume of the Register, handsomely bound, when completed, to any of his friends, who will help him out of this difficulty.

A Mr. Graham, is lecturing in this city at the Athenaeum, on courtship and marriage. The most natural "lecturers" on this heart-throbbing science, are the parties themselves. At least we used to think so.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Scio is under consideration. We don't exactly like it, on the cursory glance, we have been compelled to give it.

The following paragraph, copied from the New Yorker, affords a subject for some curious reflection. By the laws of Georgia, to decoy, or secrete a slave is punished with the highest penalties. If then the captain and mate, have committed a felony, known to the laws, is or is not the Gov. of Maine bound by the reciprocal courtesy existing between the States, to give up such "felon to justice"? Is not the violation of the law in carrying off a slave, from the state of Georgia, entitled to as much consideration, and "reciprocal courtesy," from the state of Maine, as the secretion or countenance of a horse-thief would be in Georgia, were Maine the aggrieved party. The abstract question, whether the holding of a slave is right or wrong has nothing to do with it. Both cases presume felony. We are not well enough versed in Blackstone, to answer the enquiry.

The idea of a Georgia legislature passing a law to imprison any man from Maine, who may come within her territory, as a "negro stealer," whether innocent or not, is preposterous, and too barbarous to be thought of.

A SERIOUS MATTER.—Some three or four years since, a slave escaped from Georgia in a Maine vessel by concealing himself secretly on board. He soon disclosed himself, and was landed in freedom when the vessel reached her Northern port. On this state of facts, the Governor of Georgia made a requisition on the Governor of Maine for the surrender of Kellerman and Philbrook, master and mate of the vessel, to be tried for a felony in abetting the escape of a slave. Governor Kent refused to surrender them; and a second application to Gov. Fairfield has met with no better success. Hereupon, a bill is now before the Legislature of Georgia which enacts that whenever a citizen of Maine shall be found within the jurisdiction of Georgia, he shall be considered as being there for no other purpose than to steal negroes, and shall be taken up, and upon proof that he is a citizen of Maine, shall be put into the penitentiary! There is very little doubt, we understand, that this bill will become a law.

THE UNITED STATES MINT.—The following interesting statement of the operations of this establishment from the first formation of the government to the year 1837, is from the Metropolitan:—

Summary of the whole coinage:

	Pieces coined.	Value.
Gold	4,716,325	$22,102,035
Silver	115,421,762	46,739,183
Copper	77,752,965	740,331
Total,	197,891,052	$69,581,548

Sleighting.—The Lewville Journal of Nov. 28 says that snow fell in this quarter, on Monday and Tuesday to the depth of ten or twelve inches. It was preceded by a heavy fall of rain and sleet which laid a good foundation, and we consequently have very fine sleighing.

The New York Catholic Register, is the title of a very neat quarto publication, recently established in the city of New York, by Messrs Gallagher & Smith at $3. per annum. Mr. John T. Gough, is the agent for it, in this city.

The officers and Brethren of St. Simon, and St. Jude Lodge No. 72 of ancient York Masons, intend to celebrate the anniversary of St. John, by a supper on the 27th of Dec. 5839, at the house of Br. JOSEPH BLACKBURN, in Channingville in the Town of Poughkeepsie, Dutchess co. Brethren and friends are respectfully invited.

Samuel Ward Esq. well known as one of the House of Prime, Ward & King died at New York, on Wednesday last. He had been out of health for some time, but was supposed to be recovering.

We commence this week, the publication of the Calender of Communications. Their publication will assist the memory. We shall be happy to add to the list as fast as the Secretaries of Lodges will send them to us, if free of postage.

Br. Hoffman.

A few days since I met an acquaintance who informed me that he had taken three degrees in masonry—that he had not attended a lodge for many years, and did not think much of the institution—that he could not fellowship with any institution—whether political religious or masonic—who venerated so strenuously the existence of a God.* In disgust I left him in the full belief that he imbibed the real sentiments of antimasonry—disbelieving in a God, and turning aside from all the intrinsic principles of Freemasonry.

All who become initiated into this ancient and honorable institution, know full well, that the first great principle of a Freemason,—always strenuously enjoined upon the candidate, is the belief in the existence of a God—and never to desecrate his sacred name,—but to speak of him with that reverential awe which is due from the creature to the great and adorable Creator of his existence.—Thus, when we hear a man (once a Freemason) unblushingly renounce the institution, as a bad one, and give such reasons, we can very readily come to the conclusion that our rules and regulations, are too binding, religious and moral, to be congenial with the corrupt heart, and disorganizing disposition of those who secede from us. It is unpleasant in the extreme to all good and true masons, to learn that our lodges embody men who imbibe such impure and forbidding principles; but they will have as great reason to rejoice, when they are convinced that all such have gone from among us; and those of the household who remain faithful to their trust, will enjoy the happy reflection consequent on a well spent life, and die in the hope of a glorious immortality.

XENOPHON.

*This was probably the reason why Giddens became an Anti-Mason.—Ed.

Death by Carelessness.—The body of John G. Deane esq., was brought to Portland, Me., from Cherryfield on Saturday, and interred from his house. There was quite an attendance of the gentlemen of the bar and other citizens on the mournful occasion. Mr. Deane was 54 years old, the immediate cause of his death was a powerful dose of tartar emetic administered to him by his nurse by mistake for magnesia.—[N. Y. Star.]

MASONIC HYMN.

Sung at the conclusion of an Address delivered before Olive Branch Lodge, No 39, June 24th 1839.

BY COMPANION BLANCHARD POWERS.

Farewell Communion, Brethren dear,
With you I've spent the festive night,
"Oft honour'd with supreme command,
Presiding o'er the Sons of light"

But now my glass is almost run,
The sands how swift they pass away;
O; let us bow before the throne;
Our Grand High Priest, the Mystic Three.

The christian faith, the gift of God,
Freemasonry her sister twin,
'Tis love unites the sisterhood,
And makes the twain one in Him.

Soon they will reach the throne of God,
Where angels worship and adore.
The great mysterious Three in One
And praise his name forever more.

There Masons free will join the song,
And sing of Moses and the Lamb,
With loud hosannas to the King
Whose mystic NAME is Three in One.

Then let us strive to live in love,
O Forgive and forgiven be,
And praise the mystic Three above
The mystic NAME is One in Three.

May charity, that peerless maid,
Preside in all your feasts of Love,
And the Silken Scarlet braid
Hang pendent from the courts above.

And when the silver trumpet shall sound,
Awake ye dead from land and sea,
We rise from earth's remotest bound
To praise I AM, the mystic Three.

Relieve the stranger in distress,
And Set the mourning captive free,
The widow and the fatherless,
These are thy feasts sweet charity.

None but the worthy, just, and true,
Can associate with the free,
None can our sacred treasure view,
That would blaspheme the Mystic Three.

THE SABBATH MORN.

BY CHARLES SWAIN.

Light of the Sabbath—soul awakening morn,
Thou mirror of the mystery above!
Oh sainted day! on prophet pinions borne,
How waits the heart thy solemn rest to prove;
How longs the soul with Deity to move,
And drink thy deathless waters! and to feel
Thy beauty—and thy wisdom—and thy love,
Sublimely o'er the soaring spirit steal,
Till ope the heavenly gates JEHOVAH to reveal!

Whilst, mounting and expanding, the Mind's wings
Thus like a seraph's reach eternal day;
Futurity its starry mantle flings
And shrinks the past an atom in its ray!
So mighty—so magnificent—the way
Which leads to God!—so endless—so sublime!
The skies grow dark, their grandeur falls away
Before the worldless glory of that clime
Which feeds with light the suns and thousand worlds of Time!

Light of the Sabbath—soul awakening morn;
Take me, Religion, on thy holy quest:
Lead me 'mid desert hills, the wild and lorn,
To mark the lowly shepherd hail his guest
And bless the voice which ever leaves him blessed!
Makes his rude cot an altar to God's praise!
Where 'neath a mother's pious bosom prest,
His child, with little hands, and upward gaze,
Pleads for its parents' health and happy length of days!

Sun of the Sabbath—lead me to the vale—
Whose verdant arms unfold you village fair;
Afraid from towns where passions stern prevail,
Afraid from commerce and her sons of care,
Guide me where maidens young for church prepare
In cottage grace—and garments Sunday-white!
With reverent step, and mild submissive air,
Oft let me hear their tuneful lips unite
To hail with humble hearts the Sabbath's sacred light!
Morning of worship!—with thy beams arise
Devotions sanctified by memories dear:
With thee the hymns of nations wake the skies!
The broken prayer;—the sinner's contrite tear;
Hail, blessed morn, that brings the distant near;
Bids kindred meet the hallowed page around:—
Pours comfort in the friendless widow's ear,
For Who the wild birds fed whilst winter frowned,
Will succor her poor babes when she sleeps in the ground.

Some hand, she prays, an Infant school may raise
And learn—oh, task divine!—their lips to bless!
Teach them that hope the book of Christ conveys,
To be their consolation in distress!
And He—the Father of the fatherless—
The sheltering wing of the poor orphan dove,—
God,—more than words may show, or thought express,—
Shall aid them with his own almighty love!—
For angels plead for these—the motherless!—above!

Hail Sabbath hour!—hail comforter and guide!
Hour when the wanderer home a blessing sends;
Hour when the seaman o'er the surges wide
To every kindred roof his heart extends!—
Hour when to all that mourn thy peace descends,
When e'en the captive's bonds less sternly lower:—
Hour when the Cross of Christ all life defends;—
Hour of Salvation—God's redeeming hour—
Eternity is thine—and heaven exalting power.

MY BROTHER'S GRAVE.

From the Etonian.

Beneath the chancel's hallowed stone,
Exposed to every rustic tread,
To few, save rustic mourners, known,
My brother, is thy lowly bed.
Few words, upon the rough stone graven,
Thy name—thy birth—thy youth declare—
Thy innocence—thy hopes of Heaven—
In simplest phrase recorded there.
No'scutcheons shine, no banners wave,
In mockery o'er my Brother's Grave.

No sound of human toil or strife.
To death's lone dwelling speaks of life,
Nor breaks the silence still and deep
Where thou, beneath thy burial stone
Art laid in that unstartled sleep
The living eye hath never known,
The lonely sexton's footstep falls
In dismal echoes on the walls,
As slowly pacing through the aisle,
He sweeps th' unholy dust away,
And cobwebs, which must not defile
Those windows on the Sabbath-day;
And passing through the central nave,
Treads lightly on my Brother's Grave.

But when the sweet-toned Sabbath clime,
Pouring its music on the breeze,
Proclaims the well-known holy time
Of prayer, and thanks, and bended knees;
When rustic crowds devoutly meet,
And lips and hearts to God are given,
And souls enjoy oblivion sweet
Of earthly ills, in thought of Heaven;
What voice of calm and solemn tone
Is heard above the burial stone?
What form in priestly meek array
Beside the altar kneels to pray?
What holy hands are lifted up
To bless the sacramental cup?
Full well I know that reverend form,
And if a voice could reach the dead,
Those tones would reach thee, though the worm,
My brother, makes thy breast his bed;
That Sire who thy existence gave,
Now stands besides thy lowly grave.

NATURAL REVELATION.

BY H. W. ROCKWELL.

No, heartless Atheist!—hear'st thou not
A mighty eloquence in every groan
Of the storm-riven pine wood, and a deep
And dread divinity in every crash
Of the hoarse midnight thunder! Sec'st thou not
The footsteps of thy God upon the sky,
What time the dreadful lightning's glare reveals
The spectral mountains, the snarl-smitten cliffs,
And the quick darkness makes them black again?
Be thou a man?—fling thy foul deed aside,
And forth with me into the dim old woods,
Where the strong trees are fighting with the storm,
And the loud torrents shake the misty hills,
With their great acclamations! Lo, behold!
It is the tempest's lordly tournament!
And the dark heralds of the storm have called
The mad winds to their mighty festival;
Whether they hear, on the Norwegian shore,
The death-cry of the drowning mariner,
Or toss the life-boat on the southern seas,
Or dance their war-dance round the icy pole!

Oh let your heart be willing to be taught
By these great ministers!—sea, wind, and sky,
And the black clouds that pilot in the storm:
The o'erflowing stream, the bald and time-worn rocks,
That dash the growling wave in fury back;
The blue hills gleaming in the lightning's glare,
And the deep thunder's awful requiem!
Yes! enter into Nature's glorious fame,
Whether the storm raves, or the soft winds sigh,
And in that beautiful humility
Which wakes a better nature in the heart,
Kneel down before her altars: make the birds,
In dell and rocking mountain wood, your friends;
And while they stir the dark green drapery
Of the old forests, or in harmony
With the soft sighing of the evening breeze,
And the sweet voice of waters, bear their part
In the great vesper anthem which rolls up
At night-fall from the fragrant wilderness,
Let their glad carolling glide from your ear
Down to the dim chambers of your heart,
And from your heart ascend in thankfulness,
To Him who made, and loves, and governs all!

From the Fredonia Censor.

"A landscape of Poussin's represents a group of Shepherdesses dancing to the music of the pipe. In the back-ground is seen a tomb, with this inscription: "I also lived amid the delights of Arcadia!"

[Diderot upon Dramatic Poetry.]

Time was when this mouldering form
Led first the joyous dance,
And when this pulseless heart beat warm
To sunny smile and glance.

When a magic charm was o'er me thrown
With strains of music heard,
In pipe's shrill note and wind's low tone,
And song of forest bird.

When Fancy, with her radiant wings,
Enfolded coming days,
And Mem'ry's store of treasured things
Was open to my gaze.

And earth was fair with its brilliant sky
In sapphire field outspread,
And Fame, with laurel wreath stood by,
And Hope my pathway led.

Oh, what are now the spells of glee
O'er souls of mortal's cast,
And what is pleasure's voice to me,
The dream of life is past! S. J. C.

THE HISTORY OF FREEMASONRY, DRAWN FROM AUTHENTIC SOURCES OF INFORMATION.

No. IV.

Such is the nature of that association of architects, who erected those splendid edifices, in Ionia, whose ruins afford us instruction, while they excite our surprise. If it be possible to prove the identity of any two societies, from the coincidence of their external forms, we are authorised to conclude, that the Fraternity of the Ionian architects, and the Fraternity of Freemasons, are exactly the same; and as the former practised the mysteries of Bacchus and Ceres, several of which we have shown to be similar to the mysteries of Masonry; we may safely affirm, that, in their internal, as well as external procedure, the Society of Freemasons, resembles the Dionysiasts of Asia Minor.(a)

The opinion, therefore, of Freemasons, that their Order existed and flourished at the building of Solomon's temple, is by no means so pregnant with absurdity, as some men would wish us to believe. We have already shown, from authentic sources of information, that the mysteries of Ceres and Bacchus, were instituted about four hundred years before the reign of Solomon;(b) and there are strong reasons for believing that even the association of the Dionysian architects existed before the building of the temple. It was not, indeed, till about three hundred years before the birth of Christ, that they were incorporated at Tros, under the Kings Pergamus; but it is universally allowed, that they arose long before their settlement in Ionia, and, what is more to our present purpose, that they existed in the very land of Judea.(c) It is observed by Dr. Robinson,(d) that this association came from Persia into Syria, along with that style of architecture, which is called Grecian: And since we are informed by Josephus,(e) that that species of architecture was used at the erection of the temple; we are authorised to infer, not only that the Dionysiasts existed before the reign of Solomon, but that they assisted that monarch in building that magnificent fabric, which he reared to the God of Israel. Nothing, indeed, can be more simple and consistent than the creed of the Fraternity, concerning the state of their Order at this period. The vicinity of Jerusalem to Egypt; the connection of Solomon with the royal family of that kingdom;(f) the progress of the Egyptians in architectural science; their attachment to mysteries and hieroglyphic symbols; and the probability of their being employed by the king of Israel, are additional considerations, which corroborate the sentiments of Freemasons, and absolve them from those charges, of credulity and pride, with which they have been loaded.

To these opinions, it may be objected, that if the Fraternity of Freemasons flourished during the reign of Solomon, it would have existed in Judea, in after ages, and attracted the notice of sacred or profane historians. Whether or not this objection is well founded, we shall not pretend to determine; but if it can be shown, that there did exist, after the building of the temple, an association of men, resembling Freemasons, in the nature, ceremonies and object of their institution; the force of the objection will not only be taken away, but additional strength will be communicated to the opinion which we have been supporting. The association here alluded to, is that of the Essenes, whose origin and sentiments, have occasioned much discussion among ecclesiastical historians: They are all of one mind, however, respecting the constitution, and observances of this religious order.

When a candidate was proposed for admission the strictest scrutiny was made into his character.(g) If his life had hitherto been exemplary; and if he appeared capable of curbing his passions, and regulating his conduct according to the virtuous, though austere maxims of their order, he was presented, at the expiration of his novitiate, with a white garment, as an emblem of the regularity of his conduct, and the purity of his heart.(h) A solemn oath was then administered to him, that he would never divulge the mysteries of the Order: that he would make no innovations on the doctrines of the society; and that he would continue in that honorable course of piety and virtue, he had begun to pursue.(i) Like Freemasons they instructed the young member in the knowledge which they derived from their ancestors:(j) They admitted no women into their Order.(k) They had particular signs for recognizing each other, which have a strong resemblance to those of Freemasons.(l) They had colleges or places of retirement,(m) where they resorted to practise their rites, and settle the affairs of the society; and, after the performance of these duties, they assembled in a large hall, where an entertainment was provided for them by the president, or master of the college, who allotted a certain quantity of provisions to every individual.(n) They abolished all distinctions of rank; and, if preference was ever given, it was to piety, liberality, and virtue.(o) Treasurers were appointed in every town, to supply the wants of indigent strangers.(p) The Essenes pretended to higher degrees of piety and knowledge, than the uninitiated vulgar; and though their pretensions were high, they were never questioned by their enemies. Austerity of manners was one of the chief characteristics of the Essenian Fraternity: They frequently assembled, however, in convivial parties; and relaxed for a while the severity of those duties, which they were accustomed to perform.(q) This remarkable coincidence, between the chief features of the Masonic and Essenian Fraternity, can be accounted for, only by referring them to the same origin. Were the circumstances of resemblance either few or fanciful, the similarity might have been merely casual. But when the nature, the object and the external forms of two institutions, are precisely the same, the arguments for their identity, are something more than presumptive. There is one point, however which may at first sight seem to militate against this supposition. The Essenes appear to have been in no respects connected with architecture; nor addicted to those sciences and pursuits, which are subsidiary to the art of building. That the Essenes directed their attention to particular sciences, which they pretended to have received from their fathers, is allowed by all writers; but, whether or not these sciences were in any shape connected with architecture, we are, at this distance of time, unable to determine. Be this as it may, uncertainty upon this head, nay, even an assurance that the Essenes were unconnected with architecture, will not affect the hypothesis which we have been maintaining. For there have been, and still are, many associations of Freemasons, where no architects are members, and which have no connection with the art of building. But if this is not deemed a sufficient answer to the objection, an inquiry into the origin of the Essenes will probably remove it altogether, while it affords additional evidence, for the identity of the Masonic and Essenian associations.

The opinions both of sacred and profane historians, concerning the origin of the Essenes, have been widely different. They all agree, however, in representing them as ancient associations, originating from particular fraternities, which formerly existed in the land of Judea.(r) Pliny refers them to such a remote antiquity,(s) that they must have existed during the reign of Solomon; and even Basnage, who is the only writer that seems disposed to consider them as a recent association, confesses that they existed under Antigonus, about three hundred years before the Christian era.(t) Scaliger contends, with much appearance of truth, that the Essenes were descended from the Kasikeans, who make such a conspicuous figure in the history of the Maccabees.(u) The Kasikeans were a religious fraternity, or an order of the Knights of the Temple of Jerusalem, who bound themselves to adorn the porches of that magnificent structure, and to preserve it from injury and decay.(v) This association was composed of the greatest men in Israel, who were distinguished for their charitable and peaceful dispositions;(w) and always signalized themselves by their ardent zeal for the purity and preservation of the temple. (x) From these facts it appears that the Essenes were not only an ancient fraternity, but that they were originated from an association of architects, who were connected with the building of Solomon's temple: Nor was this order confined to the Holy Land. Like the fraternities of the Dionysians, and Freemasons, it existed in all parts of the world and though the Lodges in Judea were chiefly, if not wholly, composed of Jews, yet the Essenes admitted into their order men of every religion, and every rank in life. (z) They adopted many of the Egyptian mysteries; (aa) and, like the priests of that country, the Magi of Persia, and the Gymnosophists, in India, they united the study of moral, with that of natural philosophy. (bb) Although they were patronised by Herod, and respected by all men for the correctness of their conduct, and the innocence of their order; (cc) they suffered severe persecutions from the Romans, till their order was abolished, about the middle of the fifth century. (dd) a period extremely fatal to the venerable institutions of Egypt, of Greece, and of Rome.

(a) Dr. Robinson, who will not be suspected of partiality to Freemasonry, ascribes their origin to the Dionysian artists. It is impossible, indeed, for any candid inquirer to call in question their identity.

(b) According to Playfair's Chronology, the temple of Solomon was begun in 1016, and finished in 1000, B. C. The Essenian mysteries were introduced into Athens in 1344, B. C. a considerable time after their institution.

Connected with the Essenian and Masonic Fraternities, was the institution of Pythagoras at Crotona. After this philosopher, in the course of his travels through Egypt, Syria, and Ionia had been initiated into the mysteries of these enlightened kingdoms, he imported into Europe the sciences of Asia, and offered to the inhabitants of his native soil, the important benefits which he himself had received. (ee) The offers of the sage having been rejected by his countrymen of Samos, (ff) he settled at Crotona, in Italy, where more respect was paid to his person, and more attention to his precepts. (gg) When the kindness of the Crotonians, and their solicitude to obtain scientific information, had inspired Pythagoras with some hopes of success, he selected a number of his disciples, who, from the similarity of their characters, the mildness of their dispositions, and the steadiness of their conduct, seemed best adapted for forwarding the purposes he had in view. (hh) He formed these into a fraternity, or separate order of men, whom he instructed in the sciences of the east, and to whom he imparted the mysteries and rites of the Egyptian, Syrian, and Ionian associations. (ii) Before any one was received into the number of his disciples, a minute and diligent inquiry was made into his temper and character. (jj) If the issue of this inquiry was favorable to the candidate, he bound himself, by a solemn engagement, to conceal from the uninitiated, the mysteries which he might receive, and the sciences in which he might be instructed. (kk) The doctrines of charity, of universal benevolence, and especially of affection to the Brethren of the Order, were warmly recommended to the young disciples; (ll) and such was the influence which they had upon their minds, that discord seemed to have been banished from Italy; (mm) and the golden age to have again returned. Strangers of every country, of every religion, and of every rank in life, were received, if properly qualified, into the Pythagorean association. (nn) Like Freemasons, they had particular words and signs, by which they might distinguish each other, and correspond at a distance. (oo) They wore white garments as an emblem of their innocence. (pp) They had a particular regard for the East. (qq) They advanced from one degree of knowledge to another. (rr) They were forbidden to commit to writing their mysteries, which were preserved solely by tradition. (ss) The Pythagorean symbols and secrets were borrowed from the Egyptians the Orphic and Eleusinian rites, the Magi, the Iberians, and the Celts. (tt) They consisted chiefly of the arts and sciences, united with theology and ethics, and were communicated to the initiated, in cyphers and symbols. (uu) To those who were destitute of acute discernment, these hieroglyphic representations, seemed pregnant with absurdity, while others, of more penetration, discovered in them hidden treasures, calculated to inform the understanding, and purify the heart. (vv) An association of this nature founded upon such principles, and fitted for such ends did not continue long in obscurity. In a short time it extended over the kingdoms of Italy, and Sicily, and was diffused even through ancient Greece, and the Islands of the Egean sea. (ww) Like other secret societies, it was vilified by malicious men, who were prohibited from sharing its advantages, from the weakness of their minds and the depravity of their hearts. (xx) Chagrined with disappointment, and inflamed with rage, they often executed vengeance upon the innocent Pythagoreans, and even set fire to the lodges in which they were assembled. (yy) But the disciples of the sage persisted in that honorable cause in which they had embarked; and, though the persecution of their enemies drove them from their native land, they still retained for each other the sympathy of brothers, and often suffered death in its most agonizing form, rather than violate the engagements into which they had entered. (zz) An attempt, like this, against the society of Freemasons has been witnessed in our own day. It has not, indeed proceeded to such an extremity of violence. The spirit of extirpation, however, existed in sentiment, though it had not the courage to display itself in action. Disaffection to government, and disrespect to religion, were charged upon them with all the confidence of truth: And, had the governments of Europe been childish enough to swallow the dreams of a few nervous philosophers, their subjects might, at this moment, have been armed against each other, and the nations of the world embroiled in discord.

From the London Masonic Magazine of 1794. MASONIC ANECDOTE.

In a town in the West of England, and at an inn, where several people were sitting round the fire in a large kitchen, through which there was a passage to other apartments in the house, among the company there was a travelling woman and a tailor. In this inn there was a Lodge of Free and Accepted Masons held, and, it being Lodge night, several of the members passed through in their way to the Lodge; this introduced observations on the principles of Masonry, and the occult signs by which Masons could be known to each other. The woman said that there was not so much mystery as people imagined, for that she could shew any person the Mason's sign: "What," said the tailor, "that of the Free and Accepted?" "Yes," she replied, "and will hold you a half-crown bowl of punch to be confirmed by any of the members whom you please to nominate." "Why," said he, "a woman was never admitted, and how is it possible you could procure it?" "No matter for that," added she, "I will readily forfeit if I do not establish the fact." The company urged the tailor to accept the challenge, to which he consented, and the bet deposited. The woman got up, took hold of the tailor by the collar. "Come," says she, "follow me," which he did, tremblingly alive, fearing he was to undergo some part of the discipline in the making a Mason, of which he had heard such a dreadful report. She led him into the street, and pointing to the Lion and Lamb, asked him, "whose sign it was?" he answered, "Mr. Loder's, the name of the innkeeper." "Is he a Freemason?" "Yes." "Then

I have shewn you the sign of a Free and Accepted Mason."—"The laugh was so much against the poor tailor for being taken in, that it was with some difficulty he, could be prevailed on to partake of the liquor.

ANIMAL HEAT.

Animal heat is that property of all animals, by means of which they preserve a certain temperature, which is quite independent of that of the medium by which they are surrounded, and appears rather to be in proportion to the degree of sensibility and irritability possessed by them. It is greatest in birds. The more free and independent the animal is, the more uniform is its temperature. On this account, the human species preserves a temperature nearly equal, about 36—100° Fahr., in the frozen regions at the pole, and beneath the equator: and on this account, too, the heat of the human body remains the same when exposed to the most extreme degrees of temperature: in fact, cold at first rather elevates, and extreme heat rather depresses the temperature of the human body. Fordyce and Blagden endured the temperature of an oven heated almost to redness, and two girls in France entered a baker's oven heated to 269° Fahr., in which fruits were soon dried up, and water boiled. A Spaniard, Francisco Martinez, by name, exhibited himself, a short time since, at Paris, in a stove heated to 279° of Fahr., and threw himself, immediately after, into cold water. Blagden was exposed in an oven to a heat of 257°, in which water boiled, though covered with oil. There is also a remarkable instance of a similar endurance of heat by the convulsionnaires, as they were called, upon the grave of St. Medardus, in France. A certificate signed by several eye-witnesses, among whom were Armand, Arouet, the brother of Voltaire, and a Protestant nobleman from Perth, states that a woman named la Sonet, surnamed the salamander, lay upon a fire nine minutes at a time, which was repeated four times within two hours, making, in all, 36 minutes during which time fifteen sticks of wood were consumed. The correctness of the fact stated is allowed even by those opposed to the abuses in which it originated. The flames sometimes united over the woman, who seemed to sleep; and the whole miracle is to be attributed to the insensibility of the skin and nerves, occasioned by a fit of religious insanity. These facts are the results of a law of all living substances, viz., that the temperature of the living body cannot be raised above certain limits, which nature has fixed. There is also an increased flow of perspiration, by means of which the heat of the body is carried off. The extreme degrees of cold which are constantly endured by the human frame without injury are well known, and are to be explained only by this power in the living body to generate and preserve its own heat. The greater the irritability of individuals whether from age, sex, peculiarity of constitution the greater the warmth of the body: it seems also to depend, in part, upon the quickness of the circulation of the blood; thus children and small animals, whose circulation is lively, feel the cold least. The heat and the power of preserving it differ also in the different parts of the body: those appearing to be warmest in which there is the most copious supply of blood, as the brain, the head and neck, the lungs and central parts of the body. We see also, that when the irritability of the body, or of any part of it, is particularly increased, the heat of the part undergoes a similar change. Increased activity and motion of the body, as in walking, running, &c. and diseases of increased excitement, as fever and inflammation, produce a similar increase in the temperature of the body. All this justifies the conclusion, that animal heat depends chiefly upon the irritability of the body, and is thus most intimately connected with the state of the nervous system. The view is confirmed by the late experiments of Brodie, who ascribed this power of the living body to the influence of the brain. He destroyed the brain of a rabbit, and kept up the respiration by artificial means; but the rest of the animal regularly diminished.

SUBSCRIBING TO LECTURES.—A gentleman being called on to subscribe to a course of lectures, objected "because," said he, "my wife gives me a gratuitous lecture every evening."

VARIETY.

A RECEIPT FOR DESTROYING FLIES.—To one pint of milk and a quarter of pound of raw sugar, add two ounces of ground pepper; simmer the same together for eight or ten minutes, and place it about in shallow vessels; the flies attack it greedily and in a few minutes they are suffocated. By this method you may keep every part of your house, even your kitchen, clear of flies all summer, without the danger that may attend the use of poison.

COPERNICUS.—Copernicus was a cannon and physician, and occupied himself in directing buildings.—The aqueducts which he constructed at Grandenz, Thorn, and Dantzic still exist. He took twenty-four years to produce his famous astronomical system, against which the thunders of Vatican were hurled, when the author was dead. Copernicus died 1583.—The sentence of condemnation was repealed in 1824. Prussia claims Copernicus as one of her sons, although Thorn at this period, did not belong to Prussia.

CLASSICAL SWEARING.—The style of swearing at Florence, is most laughable classical. I hear the vagabonds in the streets, adjuring Venus and Bacchus; and my shoemaker swore by the aspect of Diana, that he would not take less than ten paoles, for work worth three—yet was the knave foresworn.

A young lady looking into the family Bible, and observing the date of her birth, took her pencil and wrote—"Above the age of 21, and not yet given in marriage." This induced her father to write beneath—"He who giveth in marriage doeth well, but he who giveth not in marriage doeth better." To which she made the following reply—"Dear father, I love to do well; let those do better who can."

GOOD ADVICE.—Swift, in a letter to a young lady says, I think you ought to be well informed how much your husband's revenue amounts to, and be so good a computer as to keep within it that part of the management which falls to your share, and not to put yourself in the number of those political ladies who think they gain a great point when they have teased their husbands to buy them a new equipage, a laced head, or a fine petticoat, without once considering what a long score remained unpaid to the butcher.

WESTERN HELP.—The Author of "A New Home" says she once had a damsel living with her, who used to put her head at the door, with—"Miss Clavers, did you holler? I thought I heered a yell."

NOT AT HOME.—A servant being asked if his master was at home, replied, "No." "When will he return?"—"Oh! when master gives orders to say he is not at home we never know when he will come in."

HARAM OF THE MOGUL.—As the climate obliges the ladies of the harem to wear only very light dresses, there are some manufactured of silk of so fine a texture, that the whole dress does not weigh more than an ounce! They repose in these dresses, which they change in the morning, casting aside the former as of no further use. Every day they assume a dress of a different colour. They are adorned besides with an immense quantity of jewels; the collar of their robe is bordered with two bands of diamonds encased in the centre of two rows of pearls, crossing upon the stomach. Their ear-rings and bracelets are of surprising beauty. The fingers, and also their toes, which are bare (the feet being covered with sandals only) are ornamented equally with the most beautiful rings. All the wives of the Mogul, and all the princesses, his daughters, carry on the thumb of the left hand, in the form of a ring, a small looking-glass bordered with pearls. They cast their eyes incessantly upon this mirror; it is with them the occupation of every moment. Their most becoming ornament is a golden girdle of the breadth of two fingers, enriched with jewels. Mantles of the same metal are suspended to it, sewn with diamonds, whose points are terminated by knots of pearls. What is very surprising is, that each of these ladies has a change of six or eight sets of these pearls.

In old times children drew upon their fathers, but now we are living in the utmost extravagance and leaving the bill for our children so pay. Verily, "we are wiser than our father's were."

CARLINI was the first comic actor on the stage of Padua: a single glance of his eye would diffuse smiles over the most rigid countenance.

A gentleman, one morning, waited on the first physician in that city, and requested he would prescribe for a disease to which he was not merely a subject, but a victim—melancholy. "Melancholy," repeated the doctor: "you must go to the theatre, and Carlini will soon dissipate your gloom and enliven your spirits." "Dear sir, (said the patient, seizing the doctor by the hand) excuse me—I am Carlini himself. At the moment I convulse the audience with laughter, I am the prey of the disease which I came to consult you upon."

THE CORPORAL.—During the American revolution, an officer, not habited in military custom, was passing by where a small company of soldiers were at work making some repairs upon a small redoubt. The commander of a little squad was giving orders to those who were under him, relative to a stick of timber which they were endeavoring to raise to the top of the works. The timber went up hard, and on this account the voice of the little great man was often heard in his regular vociferations of "heave away! there she goes! heave ho!" &c. The officer before spoken of, stopped his horse when arrived at the place, and seeing the timber scarcely move, asked the commander why he did not take hold and render a little aid. The latter appeared to be somewhat astonished, turning to the officer with the puz of an Emperor said "Sir, I am a Corporal." "You are not though, are you?" said the officer, "I was not aware of it." And taking off his hat and bowing, "I ask your pardon Mr. Corporal." Upon this he dismounted from his elegant steed, flung the bridle over a post, and lifted till the sweat stood in drops on his forehead. When the timber was elevated to its proper station, turning to the man clothed in brief authority, "Mr. Corporal Commander," said he, "when you have another such a job, and have not men enough send to your Commander-in-chief, and I will come and help you a second time." The corporal was thunder-struck. It was Washington!

MAKING BRONZE. The best method of making bronze is to take spelter, and let it stand in spirits of wine for 24 hours; then pour off the solution, and boil it with three ounces, by measure, of sinitum senez, for two hours. Then take it off, and strain it through a fine ray, which will detain the powder, to be well washed with clear water, previous to using. The method of darkening the bronze, is by simply adding chloride of ammonia, mixed with asphaltum, applied while hot to the brass or copper. It has been successfully applied to iron or steel.

Importance of a single vote.—The tremendous results which may ensue from a thing so apparently unimportant as the casting of one vote, were never more fully shown than in the election of Oliver Cromwell to a seat in the Long Parliament. That singular man was chosen to represent Cambridge by a majority of only one vote. Cleveland, the royalist poet, said when the result of the election was declared, "That single vote hath ruined both church and kingdom." It is not, for a moment, to be supposed that a man like Cromwell would, under any circumstances, having remained quiet during the great Civil War; but it is equally undeniable, that but for his Parliamentary standing, he would have entered on his military career under very unfavorable auspices, and consequently could never have attained to that vast influence, which ultimately made him one of the most potent of English sovereigns "in all but name a king."

HUMAN LIFE HOW GENERALLY EMPLOYED.

The longest life of man consists of about 96 years. One third of the whole is devoted to sleep, viz. 32 years. Sickness, law-suits and a thousand other accidents, takes up at least one-fourth, that is, 24 years. Add those two numbers, and the sum is, 56 years.

Item—2 hours of study, and various other occupations, per day, makes about 8 years; and 4 hours of idleness, melancholy and corroding cares, 16 years; 4 an hour per day for projects, castles in the air, &c. will give 2 years; 1 hour and 4 for shaving, dressing, &c. 5 years; and these three sums added together, amount precisely to the 32 years.

Item—2 hours per day to eat and drink, make eight years; which being added to the different portions of time already mentioned, will make about 95 years. One year remains to be disposed of. How shall it be employed? This lovers can best tell.

A THEATRICAL STRIKE.

"Come in. What is it?"

"Can you see Mr. Fatton?"

"What Mr. Fatton?"

"The master of the supernumeraries."

"Send him in. Now, Mr. Fatton, what is the matter? Make haste, for I am busy."

"Sir, there's a strike with the children in the theatre."

"So there ought to be, Mr. Fatton, if you did your duty properly, and kept a birch rod."

"Yes, Sir; but all their fathers and mothers come on me, and threaten to punch my head; now you know it is not my fault."

"Well, what is this strike, as you call it?"

"The girls who are to fly in the new ballet won't have the wires affixed to them unless they are raised to eighteen pence a night; their mothers won't let them endanger their lives under that sum! Now, sir, we should be in a scrape at night, if this were to happen; worse than they were in at the other houses with the boys in the storm."

"What was that, Fatton?"

"Didn't you hear of that, Sir? Oh, there were sixty boys, who stood on the stage under a very large canvass, painted to represent the sea. Now, these boys were placed alternately, and were to rise and fall, first gradually and then violently, to represent the motion of the waves in a storm; and in the first three nights of the piece it had a powerful effect; but after that, the manager reduced the water-rate, that is to say, he lowered the salary of each wave to sixpence per night. The boys took their place under the canvass sea; and when the word was given, the water was stagnant—instead of the ship striking, it was the waves that struck. The Sub-manager, in a fury, enquired the cause; when the principal billow said, 'We won't move a peg unless you pay us a shilling a-night, for it wears out our corderoys so.'"

"Gad, I think that must have been the deep, deep sea! Well, I promise the girls the eighteen-pence; but I will be even with them; I will keep them dangling in the sky-borders in a thorough draught all the night. Tell them so."—Exit Fatton.

TAKE CARE OF YOUR TRUNKS.—A man of genteel appearance, who calls himself John Jones, was arrested on Wednesday evening by officer Moody, charged with stealing the trunk of Hon. Judson Allen, now on his way to Washington. He came from New-York on Wednesday in the rail road line, and got into the omnibus at the depot, and proceeded down Third to Market street, where he (Jones) stopped, and calling a porter, ordered him to take charge of his trunk, at the same time pointing out the trunk of Mr. Allen, which was delivered to the porter. On arriving at the Marshall house, Mr. Allen found that his trunk was gone, and upon enquiry, learned that it had been delivered to a gentleman, who appeared to be in a great hurry, at the corner of Third and Market st. An officer was soon procured, and the porter found, who stated that hotel in Bank street; thither they went, and were told that the gentleman had got another porter and taken the trunk to a house in south Front street; but before the party had got there, the gentleman in a great hurry had broken open the trunk and torn off the plate, on which was the name of the owner. Jones, who is also known by the name of Bond, was taken before Alderman Badger, who after hearing the facts, committed him to Moyamensing prison, where it is to be hoped that he will be allowed to remain until his hurry is over.

Mr. Allen was fortunate enough to recover all the contents of the trunk. On the top of the omnibus was another trunk, very similar in appearance and size to Mr. Allen's which contained securities to the amount of upwards $100,000 in the care of one of the passengers, for a South Western Bank; and there is no doubt but that Jones had come on from New York in company, and with a view of obtaining it instead of Mr. Allen's.—Phil. Herald.

POPULAR TALES.

A NIGHT IN THE CATACOMBS.

In one of my lonely rambles about the wonderful and interesting capital I was now visiting, I joined a crowd of twenty or thirty persons, waiting at the outer door that leads to the upper entrance of the catacombs. I had heard of these extraordinary vaults, but not having passed before the Barriere d'Enfer, I had not inspected them in person. Though I could not help conjecturing that a subterraneous cemetery, where the relics of ten centuries reposed, must be a sight too congenial with the morbid temper of my mind, I had no notion of the actual horrors of that mansion for the dead, or in my then distempered state of feeling, I should not have trusted my nerves with the spectacle to be expected. How will the curious tourist of the present day smile as he peruses this confession! but a few, perhaps will understand and pity what were my follies. As it was, I provided myself, like the rest, with a waxen taper, and we waited with impatience for the appearance of the guide from below, with the party that had preceded us. It was about three o'clock of a sultry afternoon, and we were detained so long, that when the door opened at last, we all rushed in, and hurried old Jerome to the task of conducting us, without giving him time for the necessary precaution of counting our number. I was an utter stranger to all present, and felt at first, as if I should have wished to view the sight, towards which we hurried our conductor, with him alone, or at least with fewer and less vociferous companions; but when we had descended many steps into the bowels of the earth, and the cold air from the dwellings of mortality smote my brow, I owned a sensible relief from the presence of the living around me, and was cheered by the sound of their various exclamations. Even with these accompaniments, however, it was with more than astonishment that I gazed upon the opening scene, and ever and anon, wrapped up in my thoughts, I anticipated with secret forebodings, the horrors I was doomed to undergo.

It would be superfluous to describe what has been described so often, yet none can have received, from a survey of the Catacombs, such impressions as my mind was prepared to admit; and few can have retained so vivid and distinct a picture of their appearance, as has been branded on my soul in characters not to be effaced. Alas! I entered them with little of that fine exalting spirit so divinely eulogized by Virgil, in the motto that is inscribed upon their walls.

The interminable rows of bare and blackening skulls—the masses interposed of gaunt and rotting bones, that once gave strength and symmetry to the young, the beautiful, the brave, now mildewed by the damp of the cavern, and heaped together in indiscriminate arrangement—the faint mouldering and deathlike smell that pervaded these gloomy labyrinths; and the long recesses in the low-roofed rock, to which I dared not turn my eyes except by short and furtive glances, as if expecting something terrible and ghastly to start from the indistinctness of their distance—all had associations for my thoughts very different from the solemn and edifying sentiments they must rouse in a well-regulated breast, and, by degrees, I yielded up every faculty to the influence of an ill-defined and mysterious alarm. My eyesight waxed gradually dull to all but the fleshless skulls which were glaring in the yellow light of the tapers—the hum of human voices was stifled in my ears, and I thought myself alone, already with the dead. The guide thrust the light he carried into a huge skull that was lying separate in a niche; but I marked not the action or the man, but only the fearful glimmering of the transparent bone, which I thought a smile of triumphant malice from the presiding spectre of the place, while imagined accents whispered, in my hearing, "Welcome to our charnel house, for this shall be your chamber!" Dizzy with indescribable emotions I felt nothing but a painful sense of oppression from the presence of others, as if I could not breathe for the black shapes that were crowding near me, and turning, unperceived, down a long and gloomy passage of the catacombs, I rushed as far as I could penetrate, to feed in solitude the growing appetite for horror, that had quelled for the moment, in my bosom the sense of fear, and even the feeling of identity. To the rapid whirl of various sensations that had bewildered me ever since I left the light of day, a season of intense abstraction now succeeded. I held my burning eyeballs full upon the skulls in front, till they almost seemed to answer my fixed regard, and claim a dreadful fellowship with the being that beheld them. How long I stood motionless in this condition I know not—my taper was calculated to last a considerable time, and I was awakened from my trance by the scorching heat of it's expiring in my hand. Still insensible of what I was about, I threw it to the ground; and, gleaming once more, as if to show the darkness and solitude to which I was consigned, it was speedily extinguished. But, by the strong impression on my brain, the whole scene remained distinct, and it was not for some time that my fit of abstraction passed away, and the horrific conviction came upon me, that I was left deserted, as I fancied in my first confusion, by faithless friends, and abandoned to the mercy of a thousand demons. All the ideal terrors I had cherished from my childhood, exalted to temporary madness by the sense and certainty of the horrid objects that surrounded me, rushed at once upon my soul; and in an agony of impatient consternation, I screamed and shouted, loud and long, for assistance. Not an answer was returned, but the dreary echoes of this dreadful tomb. I saw that my cries for succour were hopeless and in vain, and my voice failed me for very fear—my jaws were fixed and open, my palate dry—a cold sweat distilled from every pore, and my limbs were chill and powerless as death. Their vigour at length revived, and I rushed in a delirium through the passages, struggling through their every step in more inexplicable error, till running with the speed of lightning along one of the longest corridors, I came with violence in full and loathsome contact with the skelton relics at the end. The shock was like fire to my brain—I wept tears of rage and despair; and thrusting my fingers in the sockets of the empty skulls, to wrench them from the wall, I clutched their bony edges, till the blood sprung from my lacerated hand. In short, I cannot paint to you the extravagancies I acted, or the wild alternation of my feelings that endured for many hours. Sometimes excited to frenzy, I imagined I knew not what of horrid and appalling, and saw, with preternatural acuteness, through the darkness as clear as noon—while grisly visages seemed glaring on me near and red and bloody haze enveloped the more fearful distance. Then, when reason was on, the point of going, an interval of terrible collection would succeed. I felt in my very soul how I was left alone—perhaps not to be discovered at any rate for what appeared to me an endless period, in which I should perhaps expire of terror, and I longed for deep, deep sleep, or to be as cold and insensate as the things around me. I tried to recollect the courage, that only on one point had ever failed me, but judgment had ever missed her stays, and the whispers of the subterraneous wind, or the stealthy noises I seemed to hear in concert with the audible beatings of my heart, overcame me irresistibly. Sometimes I thought I could feel silence palpable like a soft mantle on my ear—I figured dreadful hands within a hair-breadth of my body, ready to tear me if I stirred, and in desperation flung myself upon the ground. Then would I creep close to the mouldering fragments at the bottom of the wall, and try to dig with my nails, from the hard rock, something to cover me. Oh! how I longed for a cloak to wrap and hide me, though it had been my mother's winding-sheet, or grave flannel animated with worms. I buried my head in the skirts of my coat, and prayed for slumber; but a fearful train of images forced me again to rise and stumble on, shivering in frame with unearthly cold, and yet internally fevered with a tumult of agonizing thoughts. Any one must have suffered somewhat in such a situation; but no one's sufferings could resemble mine, unless he carried to the scene a mind so hideously prepared. Part of these awful excavations are said to have been once haunted by banditti; but I had no fears of them, and should have sworn with transport to have come upon their fires at one of their turnings in the rock, though my appearance had been the instant signal for their daggers.

In my wanderings I recovered for a moment the path taken by the guides, and found myself in a sort of cell within the rock, where particular specimens of mortality were preserved. My arm, rested on the table, where two or three loosened skulls, and a thigh-bone of extravagant dimensions, were lying, and a new fit of madness seized me. My heart beat with redoubled violence, while I brandished the enormous bone, and hoarsely called for its original possessor to come in all the terrors of the grave, and there would I wrestle with him for the relic of his own miserable carcass. I struck repeatedly, and hard, the hollow-sounding sides of the cell, shouting my defiance; then throwing myself with violence towards the opening, I missed my balance and, snatching at the wall round the corner to save myself, I jammed my hand in an aperture among the bones, and fancied that the grisly adversary I invoked had grasped my arm in answer to my challenge. My shrieks of agony rang through the caverns, and, staggering back into the cell, I fell upon my face, hardly daring to breathe, and expecting unimagined horrors or speedy dissolution.

How my feelings varied for a space of time, I know not: but sleep insensible fell upon me. In my dream, I did not seem to change the scene, but still reclining in the cell. I fancied the skulls upon the wall the same in number, but magnified to a terrific size, with black jetty eyes imbedded in their naked sockets, and rivetted with malicious earnestness on me. A dim recess seemed opened beyond one side of the cell, and each spectral eye turning with a sidelong glance towards it, drew mine the same direction by an unconquerable fascination. Still appearing to gaze determinedly upon them I had power, as I dreamed, to obey their impulses simultaneously, and to perceive a dreadful figure, black, bony, and skull-headed, with similar terrific eyes, whom they seemed to hail as their minister of cruelty, while with slow and silent paces, it drew near to clasp me in its hideous arms. Closer and closer it advanced; but, thanks and praises to the all-gracious Power that stills the tempest of the soul! the limit of suffering was reached, and the force of terror was exhausted. My nerves so long weak, and prone to agitation, were recovered, by the over violence, of their momentum; and, instead of losing reason in the shock, or waking in the extremity of fear, the vision was suddenly changed—the scenery of horror melted into light, and a calm and joyful serenity took possession of my bosom. My animal powers must have been nearly worn out, for long—long I slept in this delightful tranquillity; and when I awakened, it was, for the first time of my life in a peaceful and healthy state of mind, unfettered, and released for ever from all that had enfeebled and debased my nature. I had passed in that celestial sleep from death to life, from the dreams of weakness and lapse of insanity, to the full use and animation of my faculties; and I felt as if a cemented load had broken and crumbled off my soul, and left me fearless and serene. I was never happy—I was never worthy the title of Man, till then; and, as I lay, I faltered out my thanks in ecstasy to Heaven, for all that had befallen me.

My limbs were numbed by the cold and damp of the floor on which I had been lying; but, rising from it, a new being in all that is essential to existence, I entered the passage, and walked briskly up and down, to recover the play and vigour of my frame. I found the thigh-bone on the ground where I had dropped it—and no longer tortured by the fears that were gone for ever, replaced it quietly in its former situation. I kept near the entrance of the cell, that the first guide who descended might not miss; and it could not be more than two hours, before Jerome, whose hair stood on end when he heard where I had passed the night, came down with an early party of visitors, and freed me from my dungeon.

A BUSY FELLOW.

The New Era says there is an editor down east who is not only his own compositor, pressman, and devil, but keeps a tavern, is village schoolmaster, captain in the militia, mends his own boots and shoes, makes patent Brandreth pills, peddles essence and tinware two days in the week, and always reads sermons on the Sabbath, when the minister happens to be missing. In addition to all this, he has a wife and sixteen children. The Boston Morning Post says this is not all, he owns a schooner, and came to Boston with a cargo of potatoes and onions, last fall, raised by himself, and gave notice to his subscribers, when he left, that the issuing of the next number of his paper would depend upon the wind atmospheric and financial, we suppose.

CHARACTER.

For the American Masonic Register and Literary Companion.

There is no time so important in the biography of man as the morning of his life. For, then it is that the character receives its inception, then that the mind is formed and its propensities established; and then to that the business or professions of life is chosen. Which latter act, as it fixes the sphere in which a man must move, is always durable in its consequences. A short account therefore of the choosing of a profession may not be unentertaining.

Uncle Duty G——, as he was familiarly called, was a fine farmer and an excellent man. His family was large, and owning, as he did, an extensive farm, he was greatly respected by the whole town, in which he lived. He was an easy, and a good natured man. I do not however mean to be understood that he wanted energy or decision, or that he was in any degree careless, either in business, or to the course his children might pursue. On the contrary it was his settled resolution to educate and leave them to choose for themselves what course of life they would adopt. Accordingly when Marcus advanced to the age at which boys wish most to be men, he began to look around upon the various avocations in which all are engaged and to consider which of them would best suit him, or which would afford the most leisure and sport. At first a dry goods clerk was his beau ideal of a man; the fine dress, lively appearance and apparent happiness of whom were to his unpracticed eye really enviable. He therefore observed to his father his predilection in favor of that employment. (Now by my intimacy with Marcus, I heard some and knew all of the discussions that took place on this subject.) His father in reply, spoke with firmness, not unmixed with contempt, and asked if he really wished to become a clerk? To which he, much disconcerted answered that he had the privilege of choosing an employment. Indeed you have replied the father; but you will certainly choose for yourself the business of a man? At which Marcus, greatly pleased that his right of choice was still preserved, recovered his confidence and ventured to suggest many weighty considerations for his novel inclination; for he himself was not yet fully resolved. But in vain did he attempt to convince uncle Duty of the wisdom of the choice he was about to make, by representing the politeness and delicacy of a clerk. His only answer was that delicacy was not the quality of a man, and that politeness consisted not in the vain and idle show of the fop, but in the genuine feelings of a kind heart, kindly expressed. With which the son apparently satisfied, yielded the point, and for the present, gave up his idle notion.

Time rolled on; and Marcus pursued his studies, stopping but occasionally to discuss the merits of the various occupations of men. Partaking in which his father never failed to contrast the dependence of the legal and medical professions with the dignity of the self-sustaining farmer, depending for his support on aught, but the labour of his hands and the smiles of Heaven. Indeed, whenever he spoke of the professions or callings of men, he failed not to bring them all into an invidious comparison with the cultivation of the soil. Now Mr. G's inclinations were naturally opposed to the favourite scheme of his father; whose fixed determination he well understood was to infuse into his mind an utter contempt for every thing else but agricultural pursuits. Being therefore upon his guard, he readily suggested arguments to oppose whatever might be said, and when his father spoke of the dignity and independence of the farmer, omitted not to intimate that in this respect, at least, he much resembled the Indian. To be sure more was implied than expressed; and though the father was far from being pleased with the insinuation, he replied boldly that with the independence and open frankness of the Indian, the agriculturalist might and actually did possess all the refined and social feelings of the highest civilization, that ignorance is not the necessary portion of any class, or condition of men, but the result of fortuitous circumstances, that the most dignified of all the Romans were farmers; that her senators cultivated the soil; that Cincinnatus the deliverer and preserver of his country, went from the plough into the field and cabin; to restore the declining fortunes of Rome; in fine, that it was esteemed the greatest honor among that remarkable people to be skilled in horiculture; that, with them, the field, the garden and nursery were the most honorable as they are the most pleasant of possessions; that sowing lands and dressing orchards did not demean the loftiest intellects the world ever saw.—He turned also to the father of our own country retiring from public stations with a halo of honor shed around him of unparalleled brightness, to the quiet and peaceful abode of the farm. The force of these arguments were irresistible, and Marcus immediately admitted that there was nothing in the business in any wise low or demeaning. Still however he had an antipathy towards the employment stronger than reason itself. It was not therefore to be expected that he would easily be induced to abandon an opinion that was chiefly a matter of taste, supported by prejudice which grows with the growth and strengthens with the strength of manhood.

To account for this prejudice though in some degree prevalent, I shall not attempt, for the very plain reason that it is utterly unaccountable. Suffice it then to say that Marcus had mingled with that class of the "genteel" of whom all useful and productive labour is totally unworthy.

Having now finished his collegiate course, it was natural to expect, he would soon make choice of a profession for life and proceed to the discharge of those duties, which are incumbent on every member of a well regulated society. Natural however as this expectation may have been, it was, in this instance totally unfounded. For, as Marcus had none of those lofty notions of honor and high aspirations after fame which are so common among some of our educated young, he possessed no stimulus adequate to spur him on to great exertions, or even to any decisive action. And this recreant spirit of the son greatly annoyed the father; who though he wished not to see any herculean deeds performed, nor any mighty exploits accomplished, nevertheless hoped that his family might be free from dishonor. The hoary headed old man, however, for a time, was destined to be exceedingly grieved. Marcus chose no profession, engaged himself in no occupation. But at last, uncle Duty vexed in spirit at the unfruitful behaviour of his son, and gathering courage from irritation, adopted the maxim "there is a point beyond which even forbearance ceases to be a virtue," and decisively informed his froward son, that as it was the duty of every man to be engaged in some employment beneficial to society, so to an idle son he should afford no home. This was bringing things to a focus. And Marcus began to deliberate, or I should rather say, to act, for the term of deliberation, was now passed. He therefore determined to adopt the medical profession as the business of his life.—He did so; and began the study of medicine—a circumstance the more remarkable from the situation in which he was placed. For, on one hand, was gratuitously offered a most fertile farm situated in the most delightful region of our country; where the society was the most pleasant and highly cultivated, where literature and science shed a benign influence; dispelling the discords and dissensions produced by the violent changes in the atmosphere of politics, and where the mighty revolutions of the currency and commerce destroying the bright hopes and fair expectations of thousands, are scarcely felt. On the other, was a profession already filled with the strongest, most enterprising and persevering intellects of the age; in which if he entered he must expect an eternal competition.

Marcus, however, nothing moved at either the flowers or the thorns that might be strewn in his path. He proceeded onward in his medical course. At first his success was flattering. But while attending a course of lectures at G——, he chanced to meet a beautiful young Miss, whose charms his youth and inexperience were little able to resist. He accordingly sued for favor; and his suit being favourably entertained, he soon found himself bound by those silken cords, to break which man never had inclination. For a while of course, as two objects cannot at the same time engage supreme attention, his studies languished, and it was evident he had found an employment far more delightful than any with which he had before been acquainted. Nor was his enjoyment in the least lessened, by ascertaining the object of his affections to be the daughter of a wealthy farmer, from home like himself to finish her education. Which being done, he did not even anticipate an obstacle to the consummation of his most ardent anticipations. What then must have been his astonishment to find the father of his lady fair, uncompromisingly opposed to the medical profession?

For, as a Thompsonian he was utterly opposed to the principles of the established medical system, and could not consent to affianc his daughter to one engaged in practice, in his estimation, so detrimental to the interests, and health of community. Confounded at this unexpected opposition, our hero remonstrated with him for the rigidity of his principles or rather for the rigid manner in which he carried them into effect.—But finding remonstrance vain, he for a time "hesitated between two opinions." His firmness, however, was not sufficient to overcome the ruling passion of his heart. And he accordingly determined to abandon a profession assumed against his father's wishes, and which bid fair to defeat his fondest hopes. Thus the silent but powerful eloquence of the heart was able to accomplish what neither the kind expostulations of an indulgent father, nor the yet stronger teachings of self-interest, could effect. And thus too was a froward son brought at once into paternal favour, the possession of a splendid bride and the most delightful country seat in all the Western land.

MISCELLANY.

A CAUTION TO PEDESTRIANS.

The following advice from the Picayune will answer as well for the meridian of New York as of New Orleans. It cannot fail to be peculiarly interesting to housewives who are particular as to the neatness of their domestic arrangements:—"It is sometimes very muddy in this city, and, therefore, some rule ought to be adopted for entertaining a house at such a time. The following, if not a good one, is very generally practised upon. Avoid mats and scrapers; none but people whom nobody knows use those things. The entry and stair-carpet, especially if they are very costly, will get a good deal of mud off your boots by the time you reach the drawing room, particularly if you lig your feet well into them every step you go, which you ought to do; because it makes people think that rich carpets are every-day things to you at home, and should any mud still stick to your boots after you have reached the drawing room, you may easily get rid of it upon the hearth rug, by a little dexterity in handing your feet while forking your locks before the chimney glass.

SAVING TIME.

A clergyman who had considerable of a farm, as was generally the case in our father's days went out to see one of his labourers who was ploughing in the field, and he found him setting upon his plough, resting his team: "John" said he, "would 't not be a good plan for you to have a stub scythe here, and be hubbing a few bushes while the oxen are resting?" John, with a countenance which might well have become the divine himself, instantly returned, "would it not be well, sir, for you to have a swin' ling lo'rl in the pulpit, and when they are singing, to swingle a little flax?" The reverend gentleman turned on his heel, laughed heartily, and said no more about hubbing bushes.

INCLEDON AND THE LOIN OF PORK

In the course of travelling to ether, Mr. Incledon and my husband differed in few things more than in their tastes in eating. Mr. Mathews liked the simplest fare; Mr. Incledon was always in search of an appetite, and therefore was very fastidious about the wherewithal to tempt it. On one occasion, at some town where they stopped only to change horses, Incledon, according to a habit in which he indulged, sought out the landlord, and seeing a small undressed loin of pork displayed through a glass window with other delicacies, he fell deeply in love with it, and immediately applied coaxingly to the landlord (a portly independent sort of a person, with his hands in his waistcoat pockets,) to be allowed to purchase it to carry onwards. Mine host abruptly refused; "he could not sell it—he should want it for his dinner customers, &c.; but in proportion as the land ord seemed unrelenting, Incledon's anxiety became stronger. He asked what the joint would be charged to his dinner customers, and then held out the sum with an addition; but the sulky landlord was inexorable. The epichure increased his temptation, until at last he offered double the worth of it, and Mr. Mathews, ashamed of the childish behavior of his chum, left him with the lord to settle the important matter as they might, and walked on, telling the servant to wait for Mr. Incedon with the carriage, and overtake him on the road. In a short time he saw it approaching with Mr. Incedon, who after my husband had seated himself, and the horse were proceeding, took out a handkerchief from a pocket of the carriage with some appearance of mystery, and deliberately placing it upon his knees with evident satisfaction, opened it, and revealed the coveted little loin of pork! "Well," said his friend coolly, "what you prevailed at last; how did you manage to coax that surly fellow out of it?" Incedon twinkled his eyes: "Charles Mathews," said he, with something of solemnity, "I did not prevail. My dear boy, the man was a brute. I offered him all the silver in my pocket. I had set my heart upon the thing, my dear Charles Mathews. I couldn't have ate any thing else, my dear boy; so what do you think I did? Don't be angry, Charles (and here he looked like a child who knew he had done wrong, and dreaded the punishment for his fault), don't be angry: a man like yourself can have no idea what I feel, who want little delicacies to keep up my stamina. My dear Charles, the man was unfeeling." In this way did Incedon prepare his companion for the truth, and deprecate his wrath. The fact was, he had watched the lord's absence, entered the larger unperceived, and bore away the tempting prize, leaving the already proffered double its value in its place.—Life of Charles Mathews, by his widow.

AFFECTING ANECDOTE.—A circumstance of a very interesting kind occurred some time since at one of the Greek isles. A number of the islanders, terrified at the approach of a Turkish force, hurried on board a large boat, and pushed off from land. The wife of one of them, a young woman of uncommon loveliness, seeing her husband departing, stood on the shore, stretching out her hands towards the boat, and imploring, in the most moving terms, to be taken on board. The Greek saw it without concern or pity, and, without aiding her escape, bade his companions hasten their flight.

This unfortunate woman, left unprotected in the midst of her enemies, struggled through scenes of difficulty and danger, of insults and suffering, till her failing health and strength, together with a heart broken by sorrow, brought her to her deathbed. She had never heard from her husband; and when wandering among the mountains, lying down in some wretched habitation, or compelled to urge her flight amidst cruel fatigues, her affection for him and the hope of meeting him again, bore up her courage through all.

He came at last, when the enemy had retreated, and the Greeks had returned to their homes again; and hearing her situation, was touched with deep remorse. But all hope of life was then extinguished—love had changed to aversion, and she refused to see or forgive him. There is at times, in the character of a Greek woman, as more than one occasion occurred of observing, a strength and sternness that is remarkable. Her sister and relations were standing round her bed; and never in the days of health and love did she look so touchingly beautiful as then. Her fine dark eyes were turned on them with an expression as if she mourned not to die, but still felt deeply her wrongs; the natural paleness of her cheek was crimsoned with a hectic hue, and the rich tresses of her black hair fell disheveled by her side. Her friends with tears entreated her to speak to and forgive her husband; she turned her face to the wall, and waved her hand for him to begone. Soon the last pang came over her, and affection conquered; she turned suddenly round, raised a look of forgiveness to him, placed her hand in his, and died.

FRENCH GAIETY.

In the campaign of 1812 a distinguished general officer of the French army was severely wounded in the leg. The surgeon on consulting declared that amputation was indispensable. The general received the intelligence with much composure. Among the persons who surrounded him he observed his valet-de-chambre, who showed by his profound grief the deep share which he took in the melancholy accident. "Why dost thou weep, Germain?" said his master, smilingly to him: "it is a fortunate thing for thee; you will have only one boot to clean in future."

THE DUNKERS.

This is a denomination which took its rise in the year 1724. It was founded by a German, who, weary of the world, retired to an agreeable solitude within fifty miles of Philadelphia, to the more free exercise of religious contemplation. Curiosity attracted followers, and his simple and engaging manners made them proselytes. They soon settled a little colony, called Euphrate, in allusion to the Hebrews, who used to sing psalms on the borders of the river Euphrates. This denomination seem to have obtained their name from their baptizing their new converts by plunging. They are also called Tumblers, from the manner in which they performed baptism, which is by putting the person while kneeling, head first under water, so as to resemble the motion of the body in the action of tumbling. They use the trine immersion, with laying on the hands and prayer, even when the person baptized is in the water.

Their habit seems to be peculiar to themselves, consisting of a long tunic, or coat, reaching down to their heels, with a sash or girdle round the waist, and a cap, or hood, hanging from the shoulders, like the dress of the Dominican friars. The men do not shave the head or beard. The men and women have separate habitations and distinct governments. For these purposes they have erected two large wooden buildings, one of which is occupied by the brethren, the other by the sisters of the society; and in each of them there is a banqueting room, and an apartment for public worship; for the brethren and sisters do not meet together, even at their devotions. They live chiefly upon roots and other vegetables, the rule of their society not allowing them flesh, except on particular occasions when they hold what they call a love-feast; at which time the brethren and sisters dine together in a large apartment, and eat mutton; but no other meat. In each of their little cells they have a bench fixed, to serve the purpose of a bed, and a small block of wood for a pillow. The Dunkers allow of no intercourse between the brethren and sisters, not even by marriage. The principal tenets of the Dunkers appear to be these: that future happiness is only to be attained by penance and outward mortification in this life; and that, as Jesus Christ by his meritorious sufferings, became the Redeemer of mankind in general, so each individual of the human race, by a life of abstinence and restraint, may work out his own salvation. Nay, they go so far as to admit of works of supererogation, and declare that a man can do much more than he is in justice or equity obliged to do, and that his superabundant works may therefore be applied to the salvation of others. This denomination deny the eternity of future punishment and believe that the dead have the Gospel preached to them by our Saviour, and that the souls the just are of employed to preach the Gospel to those who have had no revelation in this life. They suppose the Jewish sabbath, sabbatical year, and year of jubilee, are typical of certain periods, after the general judgment, in which the souls of those who are not then admitted into happiness are purified from their corruption.

If any within these smaller periods are so far humbled as to acknowledge the perfection of God, and to own Christ as their only Saviour, they are received to felicity; while those who continue obstinate are received in torments until the grand period typified by the jubilee arrives, in which all shall be made happy in the endless fruition of the Deity. They also deny the imputation of Adam's sin to his posterity. They disclaim violence even in cases of self-defence, and suffer themselves to be defrauded or wronged rather than go to law.

Their church government and discipline are the same with the English Baptists, except that every brother is allowed to speak in the congregation; and their best speaker is usually ordained to be the minister. They have deacons and deaconesses from among their ancient widows and exhorters, who are all licensed to use their gifts statelily.

WHISKERS AND LONG HAIR.

A letter from Paris states, that to be a fashionable young man in that metropolis, you must wear your hair falling in massive locks upon your shoulders—your beard must be in the style of Francis I., whilst your hand must be tightly squeezed into a canary-yellow glove; part of the costume as decidedly characteristic of an exquisite aristocrat of the present day, as a red heel was in the time of Henry IV. He addressed, you may present your address to the Jockey-Club, the address of the present day. Our distant readers will be fully aware that these delectable costumes are much in vogue among our Brethren, and that they are in France. Long hair, whiskers, and a beard a la Francis I., are all the rage. The derivation of this fashion of long hair is somewhat amusing. A young Parisian established himself a few years since in Cairo, in a business in which industry and perseverance would infallibly have led to competence. But our hero was impatient, and resolved to take a shorter cut to fortune. Thinking it no harm to cheat the infidels, he was in the daily practice of frauds, which, while they filled his coffers, were of little advantage to his character. At last his dishonest practices became so notorious, that the pacha was compelled to punish him in a manner in which all similar offenders had been punished in Cairo, from time immemorial. The youthful Shylock was nailed up to a pillory by the ear, and this punishment was repeated as often as his offences were discovered, until at length both his auricular organs were pierced with as many holes as a cylinder. Indeed, so obnoxious did he become at last that the cadi, placing the gentleman's head between his knees, cut off both his ears with a razor. But the Parisian, in the meanwhile, had managed to transfer a large property to his native metropolis, and thither he followed it soon after the loss of his ears. But how should he conceal his disgrace!—After much reflection he leagued himself with half a dozen individuals suffering under a similar inconvenience, and they introduced the elf-locks, now so fashionable, and which effectually concealed their losses. Nothing could have been more fortunate. They all made excellent matrimonial speculations, and it was not until their wives undertook to comb their hair, that they discovered, to their horror, that their husbands had no ears! Our fair readers must make their own application of the moral of the story.

AMERICAN MASONIC REGISTER.

ALBANY, SATURDAY, DEC. 6, 1839.

Those Brethren who subscribed the prospectus for the Masonic Register, by me circulated, and who have not paid for the same to me, or Br. Mix, will oblige me much by sending the same to Br. L. G. Hoffman, by mail. The Post Masters are authorised to send such money free of postage.

BLANCHARD POWERS.

Bennington, Nov. 19, 1839.

"A post master may enclose money in a letter to the publisher of a newspaper, to pay the subscription of a third person, and FRANK the letter, if written by himself."

Our patrons will perceive, that any delicacy they may have had in burdening us with postage, is now entirely removed.

TO OUR POETICAL FRIENDS.—Our carrier, wishes us to say, that he will stand in need of an address, for the coming New Year, and that he will give a volume of the Register, handsomely bound, when completed, to any of his friends, who will help him out of this difficulty.

A SERIOUS MATTER.—For the last six or eight days, our city has been a theatre of "war and rumors of war," on account of apprehended and actual resistance to the laws of the land. Difficulties have for some time existed between the heirs of the late Patroon's estate, on account of the collection of quarter sales, back rents, &c. The particular merits of which we are unacquainted with. Some time since, processes were issued against the dissatisfied tenants, who we believe constitute a large number from several towns in the county. On attempting to serve these processes, the Sheriff was resisted, and after suffering insult, was finally driven back, the mob declaring their determination to resist any attempt on his part to enforce the collection of rents. Under this state of things, the Sheriff on Saturday last issued a general notice, calling on the citizens to appear at his office on the Monday following, and assist him in the due execution of the law. Accordingly, agreeable to his notice, a large body of people assembled at his office, estimated at from 600 to 1000, and marched to the scene of strife, unarmed, where they met about an equal number of the belligerents; and after a parley of an hour or two, the Sheriff, returned with his posse without having been able to effect his object. Thus stands the case at the present moment.

Where this unhappy state of things will end, no one can tell. It appears to us that it would have been more judicious, if the Sheriff, instead of taking so large a body of men, had made a selection of some 50 or 100, from them and met these disaffected individuals with exposition. If it had been found that they would not have listened to persuasion, then a thousand men, armed if necessary, should force them into obedience. We are fearful that the present step has had rather a bad tendency; for from what we can learn, this matter which we are fearful will involve human life, was viewed more in the light of a frolic, than as a matter of grave import. We are told that these disaffected individuals are rather encouraged in their opposition, than otherwise—that they are sanguine of at least the sympathy of their fellow citizens. We trust it is not so, for it will be a fatal error. The laws must be enforced though it be at the expense of life. When we cease to be a GOVERNMENT OF LAWS, better that we had never been called into existence. We understand that one of the members, elect of the legislature, is a leader in this disaffection. If it is so, we trust the legislature will expel him. A man who will not observe the laws, should never be placed where he can help make them.

Since putting the above in type, we perceive by the Evening Journal, Mr. Van Rensselaer's version of the cause of the difficulties. Before reading this exposition of the affair, we must confess, that our feelings and sympathies were with the disaffected. The general impression was that while Mr. V. R. was only urging his legal rights, that there were peculiar hardships in the case which required a leniency, which was denied the tenants. The reverse, however is the fact. The heirs and trustees are fully authorised by the late Patroon's will, to give all that is reasonable. Mr. V. R.'s only fault appears to be in holding a large estate, which many of his tenants want to wrest from him without the colour of law or justice. We again repeat, that these anarchists, must be taught obedience to the law.

THE ANNUAL THANKSGIVING. On Thursday the 28th was observed our annual Thanksgiving, in conformity with the recommendation of the Governor. It gives us pleasure to notice the general feeling throughout the community as to the propriety of observing this custom of the Primitive Fathers. There is something beautiful in the thought, that one day at least in the year the whole population of the State are willing to lay aside the cares and turmoils of business, and let their thoughts dwell upon the innumerable blessings with which their path in life has been strewn,—to reflect upon the kindness that has "watched over the interests of their country,—preserved to them the enjoyment of civil and religious Liberty, and kept in full play the energies of society, by the ceaseless action, of which the general good of all results.

Surely the moral tendency of the observance of this custom cannot be otherwise than happy. Whilst alive with a grateful sense of the manifold blessings of which we have been the hourly recipients, we cannot pass by unthankfully the giver of them all—nor fail to have our benevolent feelings excited towards the less favoured of our fellow-beings. Our devotional feelings cannot but be quickened, and we be better prepared to engage in the every day pursuits of life. There were religious services in the several churches of this city—and a very general attendance of our citizens.

BENNETT, of the New York Herald, is a queer fellow, with all his rascality. He has a particular regard for the brokers. Take the following:

JOHN Q. ADAMS, the venerable Ex-President, took a walk in Wall street on the morning of Thanksgiving day. There was a fine looking lady on his arm, to whom he was pointing out the names of the several banks. As John Q. entered at the upper end of the street the devil escaped at the other, thinking, probably, that the sight of an honest man and a respectable woman in Wall street, betokened an earthquake, a hurricane, or the day of judgment.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—The poetical effusions of Eugene, and B. W. C. shall have a place next week.

"DEATH IN THE POT."—The blue writing ink, which is now being generally used, is said to be composed of deadly ingredients, no less than a solution of Prussic blue, having all the deleterious qualities of Prussic acid. If this is true, it should be banished from use, as many grown up, as well as young children, are apt to cleanse their pens with their mouth. One drop of pure Prussic acid, is said to be capable of destroying a cat or dog. Parents should look to it.

The Knickerbocker for November has just come to hand. The present number is a rich one, and compensates us in part for the disappointment in not receiving it earlier. The London Monthlies, reprinted in this country were received several days before. The editors would oblige their patrons by observing a little more punctuality.

MELANCHOLY ACCIDENT.—As the canal boat Champion, of the Troy and Ohio Line, was entering the lock about a mile east of Syracuse, on Monday night, the 18th inst. the captain, Mr. Luther Babcock, formerly of this village, and son of the late Mr. B. of Hopewell, in attempting to step from the top of the boat on to the lock, fell backwards and had his head crushed between the boat and lock, and instantly killed. Mr. B. was a respectable citizen, aged 35 years. His remains were brought to this village for interment.—Ont. Freeman.

POETRY.

CHRISTMAS.

SELECTED FROM SIR WALTER SCOTT.

The wind is chill,
But let it whistle as it will,
We'll keep our Christmas merry still.
Each age has deemed the new born year
Fit time for festival and cheer;
E'en heathen yet, the savage Dane
At fol more deep the mead did drain,
High on the beach his galleys drew,
And feasted all his pirate crew;
Then in his low and pine-built hall,
Where shields and axes decked the wall,
They gorged upon the half-dressed steer;
Caroused in seas of sable beer;
While round, in brutal jest were thrown
The half-gnawed rib, and marrow-bone;
Or listened all, in grim delight,
While scalds yelled out the joys of fight
Then forth, in frenzy, would they hie,
And wildly loose their red locks fly;
And dancing round the blazing pile,
They make such barbarous mirth the while,
As best might to the mind recall
The hoisterous joys of Onin's hall.
And well our Christian sires of old
Loved when the year its cours had rolled,
And brought blithe Christmas back again,
With all its hospitable train.
Domestic and religious rite
Gave honor to the holy night:
On Christmas eve the bells were rung;
On Christmas eve the mass was sung
That only night, in all the year,
Saw the stole priest the chalice rear.
The damsel donned her kirtle sheen:
The hall was dressed in holly green:
Forth to the wood did merry-men go
To gather in the mistletoe,
Then opened wide the baron's hall
To vassal, tenant, serf, and all:
Power laid his rod of rule aside,
And Ceremony doffed his pride.
The heir, with roses in his shoes,
That night might village partner choose;
The lord, undergating, share
The vulgar game of "post and pair."
All hailed, with uncontrolled delight,
And general voice, the happy night,
That to the cottage as the crown,
Brought tidings of salvation down.
The fire, with well-dried logs supplied,
Went roaring up the chimney wide;
The huge hall-table's oaken face,
Scrubbed till it shone the day to grace,
Bore then upon its massive board
No mark to part the squire and lord.
Then was brought in the lusty brawn,
By old blue-coated serving man;
Then the grim boar's-head frowned on high,
Crested with bays and rosemary.
Well can the green-garbed ranger tell,
How, when, and where, the monster fell;
And all the baiting of the boar;
While round the merry wassel bowl,
Garnished with ribands, blithe did trowl.
There the huge sirloin reeked; hard by
Plum-porridge stood, and Christmas pie;
Nor failed old Scotland to produce,
At such high-tide, her savoury goose.
Then came the merry masquers in,
And carols roared with blithesome din;
If unmelodious was the song,
It was a hearty note, and strong.
Who lists may in their mumming see
Traces of ancient mystery;
White shirts supplied the masquerade,
And smutted cheeks the visors made;
But, O! what masquers richly dight
Can boast of bosoms half so light!
England was merry England, when Old Christmas brought his sports again.
'Twas Christmas broached the mightiest ale;
'Twas Christmas told the merriest tale;
A Christmas gambol oft could cheer
The poor man's heart through half the year.

THE FARWELL TO THE DEAD.

The following poem is founded on a beautiful part of the Greek funeral service, in which relatives and friends are invited to embrace the deceased, (whose face is uncovered) and to bid their final adieu.

'Tis hard to lay into the earth
A countenance so benign! a form that walk'd
But yesterday so stately o'er the earth!

Come near!—ere yet the dust,
Soil the bright paleness of the settled brow,
Look on your brother, and embrace him now,
In still and solemn trust!
Come near!—once more let kindred lips be press'd
On his cold cheek; then bear him to his rest!

Look yet on this young face!
What shall the beauty, from among us gone,
Leave of its image e'en where most it shone,
Gladd'ning its hearth and race?
Dim grows the semblance on men's heart impress'd,
Come near, and bear the beautiful to rest!

Ye weep and it is well!
For tears befit earth's parting! Yesterday,
Song was upon the lips of this pale clay,
And sunshine seem'd to dwell
Where'er he moved—the welcome and the bless'd!
—Now gaze! and bear the silent unto rest!

Look yet on him, whose eye
Meets yours no more, in sadness or in mirth!
Was he not fair amidst the sons of earth,
The beings born to die?
—But not where death has power may love be bless'd—
Come near! and bear ye the beloved to rest!

How may the mother's heart
Dwell on her son, and dare to hope again?
The spring's rich promise hath been given in vain,
The lovely must depart!
Is he not gone, our brightest and our best?
Come near! and bear the early-call'd to rest!

Look on him! is he laid
To slumber from the harvest or the chase?
—Too still and sad the smile upon his face,
Yet that, ev'n that, must fade!
Death holds not long unchain'd his fairest guest,—
Come near! and bear the mortal to his rest!

His voice of mirth had ceased
Amidst the vineyards! there is left no place
For him whose dust receives your vain embrace,
At the gay bridal feast!
Earth must take earth to moulder on her breath;
Come near! weep o'er him! bear him to his rest!

Yet mourn ye not as they
Whose spirit's light is quench'd!—for him the past
Is seal'd. He may not fall, he may not cast
His birthright's hope away!
All is not here of our beloved and bless'd—
Leave ye the sleeper with his God to rest!

THE INVOCATION.

BY MRS. HEMANS

Answer me, burning Stars of night!
Where is the spirit gone,
That, past the reach of human sight
Even as a breeze hath flown?
—And the Stars answered me—"We roll
In light and power on high,
But of the never dying soul,
Ask things that cannot die!"
O, many a toned and changless Wind!
Thou art a wanderer free;
Tell me if thou its place can find,
Far over mount and sea!
—And the wind murmured in reply—
"The blue deep I have crossed,
And met its bark's and billows high,
But not what thou hast lost."
Ye clouds that gorgeously repose
Around the setting sun,
Answer! have ye a home for those Whose earthly race is run?
The bright clouds answered—"We depart,

We vanish from the sky;
Ask what is deathless in thy heart,
For which that cannot die!
Speak, then, thou Voice of God within,
Though of the deep low tone!
Answer me through life's restless din,
Where is the spirit flown?
—And the voice answered—"Be thou still!
Enough to know is given;
Clouds, Winds, and Stars, their task fulfil
Thine is to trust in Heaven!"

When cold in the earth lies the friend thou hast loved,
Be his faults and his follies forgot by thee then;
Or if from their slumber the veil be removed,
Weep o'er them in silence and close it again.
And oh! if 'tis pain to remember how far
From the pathway of fight he was tempted to roam,
Be it bliss to remember that thou wert the star
That arose on his darkness, and guided him home.

From thee and thy innocent beauty first came
The revealing, that taught him true love to adore—
To feel the bright presence, and turn him with shame
From the idols he darkly had knelt to before,
O'er the waves of a life long benighted and wild,
Thou cam'st like a soft golden calm o'er the sea;
And, if happiness purely glowingly smiled,
On his evening horizon, the light was from thee.

And tho' sometimes the shade of past folly would rise
And tho' falsehood again would allure him to stray,
He but turn'd to the glory that dwelt in those eyes,
And the folly, the falsehood soon vanish'd away.
As the priest of the Sun, when their altar grew dim,
As the day-beam alone could its lustre repair;
So if virtue a moment grew languid in him,
He but flew to that smile, and rekindled it there!

LOVE.

True love's the gift which God has given
To man alone beneath the heaven.
It is not fantasy's hot fire,
Whose wishes, soon as granted, fly;
It liveth not in fierce desire,
With dead desire it doth not die;
It is the secret sympathy,
The silver link, the silken tie,
Which heart, and mind to mind,
In body and in soul can bind.

PATRIOTISM.

Breathes there the man, with soul so dead,
Who never to himself hath said,
This is my own, my native land.
Whose heart hath ne'er within him burned,
As home his footsteps he hath turned,
From wandering on a foreign strand!
If such there breathe, go, mark him well,
For him no Minstrel raptures swell;
High though his titles, proud his name,
Boundless his wealth as wish can claim;
Despite those titles, power, and pelf,
The wretch, concentrated all in self,
Living, shall forfeit fair renown,
And, doubly dying, shall go down
To the vile dust, from whence he sprang,
Unwept, unhonored, and unsung.

A LECTURE,

Setting forth the origin, and tracing the progress of the orders of MASONIC CHRISTIAN KNIGHTHOOD. And exhibiting the connexion of those orders with ancient Freemasonry. Derived from authentic ancient and modern, sacred and profane history.

By EBERHARD MIX, Esq. M. E. Grand Commander of Genesee Encampment, No. 10, holden, at Lockport, Niagara County N. Y.

Sir Knights, Companions and Brethren,

Permit me to attempt to lay before you, the origin, and trace the progress of the orders of Masonic Christian Knighthood, and to exhibit the connexion of those orders, with ancient Freemasonry, and should you discover, that any of my statements or remarks, in this effort, have been heretofore expressed and published to the world, accuse me not of plagiarism, for I here freely admit, that by far the greater portion of what I shall now communicate, is composed of extracts almost verbatim, from a great number of historians, both ancient and modern, sacred and profane, wherein, according to my view of the subject, consists its merit, if merit it possesses. In an undertaking like the present, although originality in manner, that is, the manner of collecting, arranging and condensing from many authorities, so as to make the production exhibit one connected, continued and unbroken detail of events, might be entitled to some credit; but originality as to matter, must necessarily be sheer fiction, and should meet the frowns of every lover of Truth. To name each authority however, in support of every extract, would encumber the delivery with so many digressions, that it would perplex and obscure the thread of the narration in the mind of the recipient, therefore I shall omit such references altogether.

In tracing the rise and progress of the orders of Masonic Christian Knighthood, to have a right understanding of the subject, it will be necessary in the first place to examine what is meant in ancient as well as modern history, by the terms of knight and knighthood.

Knight originally signified servant, but from usage the term became more particularly attached to those servants of ancient Sovereigns, kings and lords, whose duty it was to bear arms, and defend the persons and property of their masters. At length the term was applied, in some cases, to such chivalrous persons as volunteered their services, in arms, to the public, in cases of emergency, and in such cases only.

At as early a period, as the days of Romulus, the founder of Rome, he selected three hundred athletic young men, from the best families of patrician rank and had them trained, to serve their country on horseback, forming the highest grade of soldiers, in his power to organize, whom he designated as knights, or servants of the public, being a corps not on constant duty, but required and expected to appear at a moment's notice, ready to execute, to the utmost of their ability, those services which the state demanded; afterwards all persons of patrician rank, and of good character were admitted into this order. But it does not appear, that any other forms were observed in admitting a member, than enrolling his name, and presenting him with a ring and a horse provided at the public expense. Nor does it appear that there were any fraternal ligaments to bind the order together.

This kind of knighthood was early introduced into

England and France, by the sovereigns of those nations, as a conventional bond between the sovereigns and subject, to secure the services of the wealthy and aristocratical class of subjects, at all times and in all cases to the sovereign. During the reign of Edward the II. of England a law was passed by the British parliament requiring all persons possessed of a certain income, to appear before the King and be knighted.—From this time until the year 1630 in the reign of Charles the I., there appears to be a continual controversy between the King and his subjects, on this point, the Kings insisting on the subjects being knighted, or paying a commutation therefor, and the subjects endeavouring to evade either.

In the year 1630 Charles took strong and arbitrary grounds to enforce this prerogative of the crown, but becoming alarmed at the general expression of abhorrence created by his conduct, he published "a proclamation for the ease of his subjects in making their compositions for not receiving the order of knighthood according to law." Before this time however the ardent desire felt, and strong measures taken, by the Sovereigns of Europe to environ their force by enlisting knights in their service, the number of knights had so swollen that it became necessary to invent different orders of knighthood to render some of the number, at least, of importance in the estimation of the community. Therefore, the new orders of knights of the Garter, knights of Bath, knights of the Golden fleece &c. were instituted.

But even these exclusive orders, formed from the best of the general mass, partook of the general principles of the old order, they owing fealty to one head, and being governed by officers and associated with members in the selection of whom they had no choice, and among whom no mutual ties existed, as in most, if not all, certain lords, officers or ecclesiastical dignitaries, who occupied their stations, either by birth or appointment by other and disconnected powers were ex-officio officers and members of the orders. As an instance to support this position, I will refer to the order of knights of the Garter, which is claimed to be an order the most noble and ancient of any lay order in the world—it was instituted by Edward the III. in the year 1349.

This order consists of twenty-six knights, generally Princes and Peers, whereof the king of England is Sovereign or chief. The officers are a Prelate, Chancellor, Register, Garter or King-at-arms and Usher of the Black rod. They have also a Dean and twelve Canons and petty Canons, Vergers and twenty-six Pensioners or poor knights. The Prelate is the head. This office is vested in the Bishop of Winchester and ever has been so. Next to the Prelate is the Chancellor, which office is vested in the Bishop of Salisbury, who keeps the seals &c. All these offices except the Prelate have fees and provisions.

There are many other exclusive and separate orders, scions from the same stock, now established throughout all Europe, but as that of the Garter is considered the most ancient and honorable; it becomes unnecessary to particularize those of an inferior standing. The ancient ceremony of making a knight, consisted of giving the party a blow on the ear, and striking him on the shoulder with a naked sword, after which he had a sword girded round him, and spurs attached to his heels, and being otherwise completely armed as a knight, he was conducted in solemn procession to hear the offices of religion. Since the year 1630 Feudal Military Knighthood, other than the high exclusive orders, has been considered by the Potentates of Europe, as a proper method of rewarding persons who have rendered slight services to the state. (Sir Allan M'Nab of Canada, for instance.)

This species of knighthood in all its phases and throughout all its branches, may properly be denominated feudal knighthood, the fundamental principles of which are, that each subordinate member is bound, and owes all his allegiance to one head, and that not of his own choosing, without being under any fraternal, benovolent or philanthropic obligations to their own companions, any order of society or mankind in general, and except the Roman knights, not even to the state under whose protection they reside.

Thus far I have followed through the historic account of feudal knighthood, not to show, what the characteristics of knight templers and the appendant orders are—but what they are not—and to enable us to draw the contrast between feudal knighthood and what I shall take the liberty to denominate masonic christian knighthood. I shall now proceed to give an historic account of the latter, to perform which I shall be under the necessity of beginning with a cursory view of the history of ancient Freemasonry.

Not but that, the principles of Freemasonry have been coeval with time, and that the wise, and the good in all ages have acted as near in conformity to those principles as human nature would admit, but that the institution of the order, so far as it is embraced in the first six degrees, took place during the building of Solomon's Temple in Jerusalem or are predicated on events which there took place is admitted by all masons. The first Temple was completed and dedicated one thousand and four years before the birth of Christ, and was destroyed by Nebuchadnezer, King of Babylon, about four hundred years after its completion; at which time the Princes, Elders, Rulers and chief men of the Jewish nation were taken captive, and together with the holy vessels and other treasures found in the Temple carried to Babylon.

About seventy years after the captivity of the Jews, they were released from bondage and suffered to return to Jerusalem, by Cyrus king of Persia, to whom Babylon at that time was subject. Cyrus also gave the Jews liberty to rebuild their city and Temple, and promised to return the holy vessels, although he still held the country in vassalage.

The Samaritans and others in and about Jerusalem, holding offices under the king of Persia, and who were enemies to the Jews, endeavoured to thwart their intention of rebuilding their Temple; to effect which they, in the first place offered to build with them, but they not being masons, the Jews refused to let them join in their labors.

Then the Samaritans wrote unto Artixerxes who had succeeded Cyrus in his reign and procured from him a mandate, directing the Jews to cease from their undertaking, which caused that great work to be suspended until the second year of the reign of Darius, king of Persia, when a prince of the house of Judah visited the Persian king and obtained his liberty and sanction to proceed in the rebuilding, which they persevered in without hindrance until they had finished and dedicated the second Temple, during the accomplishment of which certain circumstances took place, whereon was founded the seventh degree of Masonry, but before the Jews had finished rebuilding the walls of the city, their old enemies again persecuted them and threatened to drive them from their work by force and power, and the Jewish masons being untaught in the use of arms, even for self-defence, were under the necessity of instituting a new order, to wield the sword and exercise themselves in the use of arms. This new order was founded on circumstances attending their obtaining the consent and patronage of Darius to proceed in their great and glorious undertaking until it should be completed. Wherein it is recorded in the holy scriptures that—"it came to pass from this time forth, that the half of my servants (the Jewish masons at work on the walls of Jerusalem) wrought in the work, and the other half of them held both the sword, the spear, the shield, the bows, and the habergeon, and the rulers were all behind the house of Judah. They which builded on the wall, and they that bear burdens, and those that laded, every one with one of his hands, wrought in the work, and with the other hand held a weapon. For the builders, every one had his sword girded by his side and so builded, and he that sounded the trumpet was by me."

THE HISTORY OF FREEMASONRY,

DRAWN FROM AUTHENTIC SOURCES OF INFORMATION.

No. V.

From these observations, it is manifest, that the Pythagorean and Masonic institutions, were similar in their external forms, as well as in the objects which they had in view; and that both of them experienced, from contemporaries, the same unmerited reproach. Mr. Clinch, in his Essays on Freemasonry,^a has enumerated, at great length, all the points of resemblance between these two institutions. He attempts to prove that Freemasonry took its rise from the Pythagorean Fraternity; but though he has been successful in pointing out a remarkable coincidence between these associations, he has no authority for concluding, that the former originated from the latter. In a Masonic manuscript, preserved in the Bodleian library, in the hand writing of King Henry VI. it is expressly said, that Pythagoras learned Masonry from Egypt and Syria, and from those countries where it had been planted by the Phenicians; that the Pythagoreans carried it into France, and that it was, in the course of time, imported from that country into England.^b This, indeed, is no direct proof of our opinion; it shows us, at least, that the same sentiments have been entertained about four hundred years ago by the Fraternity in England. It has been supposed by some philosophers, that Pythagoras derived his mysteries chiefly from the Essenes, who were, at that time, much respected, and very numerous, in Egypt and Syria.—The wonderful similarity, indeed, between these societies, both in the forms which they in common with Freemasonry, and in those lesser customs and ceremonies, which were peculiar to themselves, render such a supposition extremely probable. It is remarked by all ecclesiastical historians, that the Essenes were Pythagoreans, both in discipline and doctrine; without ever considering that the former existed some hundred years before the birth of Pythagoras.^c The Pythagoreans, therefore, were connected with the Essenes, and the Essenes with the Kandeans, who engaged to preserve, and adorn the temple of Jerusalem.^d

There is one objection to the view which we have taken of this subject, which, though it has already been slightly noticed, it may be necessary more completely to remove. Although it will be acknowledged by every unbiassed reader, that Freemasonry has a wonderful resemblance to the Eleusinian and Dionysian mysteries, the fraternity of Ionian architects, and the Essenian and Pythagorean associations; yet some may be disposed to question the identity of these institutions because they had different names, and because some usages were observed by one, which were neglected by another. But these circumstances of dissimilarity arise from those necessary changes, which are superinduced upon every institution, by a spirit of innovation by the caprice of individuals, and by the various revolutions in civilized society. Every alteration or improvement in philosophical systems, or ceremonial institutions, generally produce a corresponding variation in their name, deduced from the nature of the improvement, or from the name of the innovator. The different associations, for example, whose nature and tendency we have been considering, received their names from circumstances merely casual, and often of trifling consideration; though all of them were established for the same purpose, and derived from the same source. When the mysteries of the Essenes were imported by Pythagoras into Italy, without undergoing much variation, they were there denominated the mysteries of Pythagoras, and, in our own day, they are called the secrets of Freemasonry, because many of their symbols are derived from the art of building and because they are believed to have been invented by an association of architects, who were anxious to preserve, among themselves, the knowledge which they had acquired.^e The difference in the ceremonial observances of these institutions, may be accounted for, nearly upon the same principles. From the ignorance or superior sagacity of those, who presided over the ancient fraternities, some ceremonies would be insisted upon more than others, some of less moment would be exalted into consequence, while others of greater importance would be depressed into obscurity. In process of time, therefore, some trifling changes would be effected upon these ceremonies, some rites abolished, and some introduced. The chief difference, however, between the ancient and modern mysteries, is, in those points which concern religion. But this arises from the great changes which have been produced in religious knowledge. It cannot be supposed that the rites of the Egyptian, Jewish, and Grecian religions, should be observed by those, who profess only the religion of Christ; or that we should pour out libations to Ceres and Bacchus, who acknowledge no heavenly superior, but the true and the living God.

It may be proper here to take notice of an objection urged, by M. Barruel, against the opinion of those, who believe that the mysteries of Freemasonry are similar to the mysteries of Egypt and Greece.^f From the unfairness with which this writer has stated the sentiments of his opponents on this subject; from the confidence and triumph with which he has proposed his own; and, above all, from the disingenuity with which he has supported them, many inattentive readers may have been led to adopt his notions, and to form as despicable an idea of the understanding, as he would wish them to form of the character of Masons. He takes it for granted, that all who embrace the opinion which we have endeavoured to support, must necessarily believe that a unity of religious sentiments, and moral precepts, was maintained in all the ancient mysteries; and that the initiated entertained just notions of the unity of God, while the vulgar were addicted to the grossest Polytheism. Upon this gratuitous supposition, which we completely disavow, because it has no connection with our hypothesis, does Barruel found all his declamations, against the connection of our order with the Pythagorean and Eleusinian institutions. If this supposition, indeed, were true, his opinion would

(f) Along with these fraternities, the Druids might have been mentioned, as resembling Freemasons in the object, as well as in the ceremonies of their Order. But the learned are so divided in their sentiments, concerning the nature and opinions of this Fraternity, that it is difficult to handle the subject, without transgressing the limits of authentic history. The most probable of all the hypotheses concerning the origin of the Druids, is that which supposes them to have learned their mysteries from the Pythagoreans. For in the 57th Olympiad, about 540 B.C. a colony of Phocians imported into Gaul the philosophy and the arts of Greece, (Justin, lib. 43. cap. 4.) and prior to this period, fraternities of Pythagoreans had been established in Greece. Ammianus Marcellinus, (lib. 15. cap. 9) informs us that "the Druids were formed into fraternities as the authority of Pythagoras had decreed;" and, indeed the similarity of their philosophical tenets, as detailed in Henry's History of Great Britain, vol. 2. b. 1. chap. iv. § 80. To those of the Pythagoreans, authorizes us to conclude, that they borrowed from this philosopher, their forms and mysteries, as well as their religious and philosophical opinions. This supposition will appear more probable when we reflect that Abaris, a native of Britain, travelled into Greece, returned by the way of Crete, was instructed in the Pythagorean mysteries, and carried back into his native country, the knowledge which he had acquired. Compare this note with the facts, in p. 44. supra.

(g) Symbols derived from the art of building, were also employed by the Pythagoreans, for conveying instruction to those, who were initiated into their fraternity. Vid. Proclus in Eucl. lib. xi. def. 2. &c.

be capable of proof. But he is all the while combating the dogmas of Warburton, while he thinks he is overturning the antiquity of our order. There is, perhaps in no language, such a piece of downright sophistry as this portion of Barruel's work. He seems to scruple at no method, however base or dishonourable, that can bring discredit upon Freemasonry, and every thing connected with it. After having overturned the opinion of Warburton, he then attacks us on our ground, and stiles us the children of sophistry, deism, and pantheism, who deduce our origin from associations of men that were enemies to Christianity and followed no guide but the light of nature. But this writer should recollect, that the son is not accountable for the degeneracy of his parents; and, if the ancient mysteries were the nurseries of such dangerous opinions, as this writer, in opposition to authentic history, lays to their charge, it is to the glory of their posterity, that they have shaken off the yoke, and embraced that heavenly light which their ancestors affected to despise.

It is unfortunate for Freemasonry, that it should have to encounter such objections as these, stated by a writer, like Barruel, qualified to adorn fiction in the most alluring attire, and impart to sophistry the semblance of demonstration. Many careless readers have been misled by the elegance and animation of his diction; many religious men have been deceived by his affectation of piety and benevolence; and all have been imposed upon, by the intrusion of numerous, and, apparently wilful fabrications. But, though the name of Jesus sounds in every period; though a regard for individual happiness, and public tranquillity, are held forth as the objects of his labours; yet that charity and forbearance, which distinguish the Christian character, are never exemplified in the work of Barruel; and the hypocrisy of his pretensions are often betrayed by the fury of his zeal. The tattered veil, behind which he attempts to cloak his inclinations, often discloses to the reader, the motives of the man, and the wishes of his party. The intolerant spirit of a Romish priest bursts forth in every sentence, and brands with infamy every order of men, whom he supposes to have favoured that fatal revolution, which demolished the religious establishment of France, and forced a catholic to fly, for refuge, to our hospitable isle. i

Having finished what may properly be denominated the ancient history of Freemasonry, we are now to trace its progress from the abolition of the heathen rites, in the reign of Theodosius, to the present day; and, though the friends and enemies of the order, seem to coincide in opinion, upon this part of its history, the materials are as scanty as before, and the incidents equally unconnected. In those ages of ignorance and disorder which succeeded the destruction of the Roman empire; the minds of men were too debased by superstition, and contracted by bigotry, to enter into associations for promoting mental improvement, and mutual benevolence. The spirit which then reigned, was not a spirit of enquiry. The motives which then influenced the conduct of men, were not those benevolent and correct principles of action which once distinguished their ancestors, and which still distinguish their posterity. Sequestered habits, and unsocial dispositions characterized the inhabitants of Europe, in this season of mental degeneracy; while Freemasons, actuated by very different principles, inculcate on their brethren the duties of social intercourse, and communicate to all within the pale of their order, the knowledge which they possess and the happiness which they feel. But, if science had existed in these ages, and if a desire of social intercourse had animated the mind of men, the latter must have languished for want of

(i) Vid. Barruel, v. 2. p. 357. I do not find in any system of chronology, that Christianity existed in the time of Pythagoras, or at the establishment of the Eleusinian mysteries!

(k) These remarks, upon the memoirs of Jacobinism, may be reckoned by some too general and acrimonious; especially as Barruel has culminated the Masons in England from those enormities, with which he has charged his brethren on the continent. It is evident, however, though denied by the author, that this exception was intended merely as a compliment to the English nation; for many of his allegations against Freemasonry are so general, that they necessarily involve in guilt every class of Masons, whether British or continental. The falsehood of all these accusations is manifest, not only from their being unsupported by evidence, but from the mild and generous conduct of the British legislature of these secret societies. For, if the government of this country were silly enough to believe one half of what Barruel has said, it would be called upon by every motive, not only to dissolve, but to expropriate such villainous associations.

gratification, as long as the former was imprisoned within the walls of a convent, by the tyranny of superstition, or the jealousy of power. Science was in those days synonymous with heresy; and had any bold and enlightened man ventured on philosophical investigations, and published his discoveries to the world, he would have been regarded as a magician by the vulgar, and punished as a heretic, by the church of Rome.—These remarks may be exemplified and confirmed by an appropriate instance of the interfering spirit of the Romish church, even in the sixteenth century, when learning had made considerable advancement in Europe. The celebrated Baptista Porta having, like the sage of Samos, travelled into distant countries for scientific information, returned to his native home, and established a society which he denominated the academy of secrets. He communicated the information which he had collected to the members of this association, who, in their turn, imparted to their companions, the knowledge which they individually obtained. But this little fraternity, advancing in respectability and science, soon trembled under the rod of ecclesiastical oppression; and experienced in its dissolution, that the Romish hierarchy was determined to check the ardour of investigation, and retain the human mind in its former fetters of ignorance and superstition. How then could Freemasonry flourish, when the minds of men had such an unfortunate propensity to monkish retirement; and when every scientific and secret association was overawed and persecuted by the rulers of Europe? CHARACTER.

From Raynor's Life of Jefferson.

THE LAST HOURS AND DEATH OF THOMAS JEFFERSON.

When the morning of that day came, he appeared to be thoroughly impressed, as if preternaturally, that he could not live through it, and only expressed a desire that he might survive until mid-day. He seemed perfectly at ease, being willing to die. When the doctor entered his room, he said, "Well doctor, you see I am here yet." His disorder being checked, a friend expressed a hope of amendment. His reply was, that the powers of nature were too much exhausted to be rallied. On a member of his family observing that he was better, and that the doctor thought so, he listened with impatience, and said, "Do not imagine for a moment that I feel the smallest solicitude for the result." He then calmly gave directions for his funeral, expressly forbidding all pomp and parade, when, being answered by a hope that it would be long ere the occasion would require their observance, he asked with a smile, "Do you think I fear to die?" A few moments after, he called his family and friends around his bedside, and uttered distinctly the following sentence: "I have done for my country and for all mankind, all that I could do, and I now resign my soul without fear to my God, and my daughter to my country." These were the last words he articulated—his last solemn declaration to the world—his dying will and testament, bequeathing his most precious gifts to his God and his country. All that was heard from him afterwards was a hurried repetition, in indistinct and scarcely audible accents, of his favourite ejaculation. Nunc Domitas Domine—Nunc Domitas Domine. He sunk away imperceptibly, and breathed his last, without a struggle or a murmur, at ten minutes before one o'clock, on the great JUBILEE of American liberty—the day, and hour too on which the declaration of independence received its final reading, and the day and hour on which he prayed to Heaven that he might be permitted to depart.

In a private memorandum, found among some other obituary papers of Mr. Jefferson, was the suggestion, that in case any memorial of him should be ever thought of, a small granite obelisk should be erected with the following inscription.

Here lies buried
THOMAS JEFFERSON,

Author of the Declaration of Independence,
Of the Statutes of Va. for Religious Freedom,
And father of the University of Virginia.

Volumes of panegyric could never convey so adequate an idea of unpretending greatness as is contained in this brief and modest epitome of all the splendid achievements of a long, and ardent incessantly useful life.

THE GATHERER.

A SALOR BISHOP.

Doctor Wm. Lyons, Bishop of Cork, in the latter end of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, was originally a Captain in the navy, who greatly distinguished himself in several actions against the Spaniards. On being introduced afterwards at Court, her Majesty told him that he should have the very first vacancy that occurred. The See of Cork soon after became vacant, and the honest seaman, who understood the Queen literally, immediately claimed the royal promise. Elizabeth was astonished at the request; but after some delay, finding him a strictly moral man, as well as an intrepid commander, she gave him the Bishopric, saying at the same time, "She hoped he would take as good care of the Church as he had done of the State." The date of his appointment, 1583, is on record in the Consistorial Court of Cork. He enjoyed the See above twenty years with great reputation, but never attempted to preach except once, and that was to pay the last honors to his royal mistress. The prelate's picture, in his Captain's uniform the left hand wanting a finger, it is still to be seen in the Bishop's Palace at Cork.

A DEFINITION.—A school boy, in the Literary Emporium, being asked to define the word 'admission,' said it meant twenty-five cents. "Twenty-five cents," echoed the master, "what sort of a definition is that? I don't know sulkily replied the boy, 'but I'm sure it says so on the advertisement down here at the show.' "Yes said another boy, and children, half-price!"

THE DARK SIDE OF MATRIMONY.—Lately a slave in the West Indies, who had been married to another slave by one of the commissioners, at the end of three weeks brought his wife back to the clergyman, and desired him to take her again. The clergyman asked what was the matter with her? "Why massa, she no good." The book says she obey me. She no do what I want her to do." The minister. "But the book says you were to take her for better or for worse."—"Yes, massa, but she all worse and no better. She hath too much worse and no good at all."

SINGULAR TENURES.—King John gave several lands at Keppertown and Atterton, Kent, to Solomon Attefield, to be held by this singular service: "That, as often as the King should be pleased to cross the sea, the said Solomon, or his heirs, should be obliged to accompany him to hold His Majesty's head, if there should be occasion for, that is, if he should be seasick; and it appears, by the record in the Tower, that this office of head holding was actually performed in the reign of Edward the First.

FEMALE COURTSHIP IN ROME.

The women of Rome know nothing of those restraints which delicacy, modesty and virtue impose upon the sex in Northern Europe. A Roman lady, who takes a liking to a young foreigner, does not cast down her eyes when he looks at her, but fixes them upon him with evident pleasure; nay, she gazes at him alone whenever she meets in company, at church, at the theatre, or in her walks. She will say without ceremony, to a friend of the young man's, "Tell that gentleman I like him." If the man of her choice feels the like sentiments, and asks, "Are you fond of me?" she replies with the utmost frankness, "yes, dear." In this simple and unembellished manner commence connexions which last for years, which, when they are dissolved plunge the men into despair. The Marchese Gatti, lately shot himself, because on his return from Paris, he found that his mistress, had been false to him.

EARLY RISING.

Some people have an idea that early rising is better than late rising. It is a false idea altogether.—Early rising puts color into the cheek, to be sure, and elasticity into the step. But what of that? It makes you strong, beautiful and rosy cheeked, and gives you many long years to live. But for all that, early rising is decidedly vulgar, merely mechanical, and suited to the common people, who have to earn their meals before they eat them. We like to see people lie a bed till ten o'clock at least, especially the women. We admire a woman who sleeps till ten, and then gets up with a pale face and fevered pulse—it looks so genteel.

ODDS AND ENDS.

We called to see a sick friend the other day—he was very low—so weak, he said, that he could not raise a dollar. We know many well persons similarly weak.

Miss Maria Chapman, a distinguished abolition lady of Massachusetts, received so many scattering votes from the joking Benedicts of the Bay State, that she is said to be actually one of the four highest candidates, from whom the legislature will have to choose a Governor!

A lady passing through New Hampshire, observed the following notice on a board:—"Horses taken into grass. Long tails three shillings and sixpence, short tails two shillings." The lady asked the owner of the land the reason for the difference of price. He answered, "You see, ma'am, the long tails can brush away the flies; but the short ones are so tormented by them that they can hardly eat at all.

"Which you tink, massa Cesar, de most beautifullest part ob Miss Dinah's face?" "Why, by de lunar observation, Sambo, I tink de neck is."

A boy at school was upbraided for always being last, replied, "Never mind, somebody must be last, you know."

He who receives a good turn; should never forget it—he who does one should never remember it.

In some of the western states money has become so scarce that the people have forgotten the color of it.

The farmers in New Hampshire have resolved rather than sell their pork for less than 5 cts. a pound, they will fall to eat it themselves, if they have to set up all night to do it.

A shopkeeper in recommending a piece of goods to a lady, remarked, "madam, it will wear forever and make you a first rate petticoat afterwards."

A gentleman, at a late fashionable assembly, being asked which of the ladies of the company he thought the most beautiful, replied—"Why, madam, they are all beautiful; but that lady, (pointing to Miss C. who was dressed in the extreme of fashion) I think out-strips them all."

Crowle was a noted punster. Once, on a circuit with Page, a person asked him if the Judge was not just behind. He replied, "I don't know; but I am sure he was never just before."

A negro woman at the south was relating her religious experience to a gaping congregation of darkies; among other things, said she had been to heaven. One of the brethren said to her, "Sister, you see any black folks in heaven?" She replied, "Oh gow way Sam—don't put a body out. Do you tink I was in de kitchen?"

By the way, Christmas is close at hand. How may observe Christ's birth day! How few his precepts!—Oh 'tis easier to keep a holiday than commandments.

A country farmer told a friend of his, who had come from town for a few days, shooting that he once had so excellent a gun that it, went off immediately upon a thief coming into the house, although not charged.—"How the deuce is that?" said his friend, "Why," replied the farmer, "because the thief carried it off, and what was worse, before I had time to charge him with it."

"You are from the country, are you not sir?" said a dandy clerk in a bookstore to a homely dressed Quaker who had given him some little trouble. "Yes."—"Well, here's an Essay on the Rearing of Calves."—"That," said Aminidab, as he turned to leave the store "thee had better present it to thy mother."

PRESIDENT BOYER.—A correspondent of the N. Y. Observer, writing from France, says: "I was seated in the diligence beside a well dressed man of very respectable appearance, who after some conversation asked me if Boyer was still President of the United States."

POPULAR TALES.

CHRISTIAN WOLF.

Christain Wolf was the son of an innkeeper at Bielsdorf, who, after the death of his father, continued to his twentieth year to assist his mother in the management of the house. The inn was a poor one, and Wolf had many idle hours. Even before he left school he was regarded as an idle lad; the girls complained of his rudeness, and the boys, when detected in any mischief, were sure to give up him as the ringleader. Nature had neglected his person. His figure was small and unpromising; his hair was of a coarse greasy black; his nose was flat; and his upper lip, originally too thick, and twisted aside by a kick from a horse, was such as to disgust the women, and furnished a perpetual subject of jesting to the men. The contempt showered upon his person was the first thing which wounded his pride, and turned a portion of his blood to gall.

He was resolved to gain what was every where denied him; his passions were strong enough; and he soon persuaded himself that he was in love. The girl he selected treated him coldly, and he had reason to fear that his rivals were happier than himself. Yet the maiden was poor; and what was refused to his vows might perhaps be granted to his gifts; but he was himself needy, and his vanity soon threw away the little he gained from his share in the profits of the Sun. Too idle and too ignorant to think of supporting his extravagance by speculation; too proud to descend from Mine Host into a plain peasant, he saw only one way to escape from his difficulties—a way to which thousands before and after him have had recourse—theft. Bielsdorf is, as you know, situated on the edge of the forest; Wolf commenced deer-stealer, and poured the gains of his boldness into the lap of his mistress.

Among Hannah's lovers was one of the forester's men, Robert Horn. This man soon observed the advantage which Wolf had gained over her, by means of his presents, and set himself to detect the sources of so much liberality. He began to frequent the Sun; he drank there early and late; and sharpened as his eyes were, both by jealousy and poverty, it was not long before he discovered whence all the money came. Not many months before this time a severe edict had been published against all trespasses on the forest laws.—Horn was indefatigable in watching the secret motions of his rival, and at last he was so fortunate as to detect him in the very fact. Wolf was tried and found guilty; and the fine which he paid in order to avoid the statutory punishment amounted to the sum total of his property.

Horn triumphed. His rival was driven from the field, for Hannah had no notion of a beggar for a lover. Wolf well knew his enemy was the happy possessor of his Hannah. Pride, jealousy, rage, were all in arms within him; hunger set the wide world before him, but passion and revenge held him fast at Bielsdorf. A second time he became a deer-stealer, and a second time by the redoubled vigilance of Robert Horn, was he detected in the trespass. This time he experienced the full severity of the law; he had no money to pay a fine, and was sent straightway to the house of chastisement.

The year of punishment drew near its close, and found his passions increased by absence, his confidence buoyant under all pressure of his calamities. The moment his freedom was given to him, he hastened to Bielsdorf, to throw himself at the feet of Hannah.—He appears, and is avoided by every one. The force of necessity at last humbles his pride, and overcomes his delicacy. He begs from the wealthy of the place; he offers himself a day labourer to the farmers, but they despise his slim figure, and do not stop for a moment to compare him with his sturdier competitors. He makes a last attempt. One situation is yet vacant—the last of honest occupations. He offers himself as herdsman of the swine upon the town's common; but even here he is rejected; no man will trust any thing to the jail-bird. Meeting with contempt from every eye, chased with scorn from one door to another, he becomes yet the third time a deer-stealer, and for the third time his unhappy star places him in the power of his enemy.

This double backsliding goes against him at the judgment seat; for every judge can look into the book of the law, but few into the soul of the culprit. The forest edict requires an exemplary punishment, and Wolf is condemned to be branded on the back with the mark of the gallows, and to three year's hard labour in the fortress.

This period also went by, and he once more dropt his chains; but he was no longer the same man that entered the fortress. Here began a new epoch in the life of Wolf. You shall guess the state of his mind from his own words to his confessor:

'I went to the fortress,' 'an offender, but I came out a villain. I had still something in the world that was dear to me, and my pride had not totally sunk under my shame. But here I was thrown into the company of three and twenty convicts; of murderers, the rest were all notorious thieves and vagabonds. They jeered at me if I spoke of God; they taught me to utter blasphemies against the Redeemer. They sang songs whose atrocity at first horrified me, but which I a shamed-faced fool, soon learned to echo. No day passed over, wherein I did not hear the recital of some profligate life, the triumphant history of some rascal, the concoction of some audacious villany. At first I avoided as much as I could, these men and their discourse.—But my labor was hard and tyrannical, and in my hours of repose I could not bear to be left alone, without one face to look upon. The jailors had refused me the company of my dog, so I needed that of men, and for this I was obliged to pay by the sacrifice of whatever good there remained within me. By degrees I grew accustomed to every thing; and in the last quarter of my confinement I surpassed even my teachers.

From this time I thirsted, after freedom, after revenge with a burning thirst. All men had injured me, for all were better and happier than I. I gnashed my fetters with my teeth, when the glorious sun rose up above the battlements of my prison, for a wide prospect doubled hell of duration. The free wind that whistled through the loop-holes of my turret, and the swallow that poised itself upon the grating of my window, seemed to be mocking me with the view of their liberty and that rendered my misery more bitter. It was then that I vowed eternal glowing hatred to every thing that bears the image of man—and I have kept my vow.

'My first thought, after I was set at liberty, was once more my native town. I had no hopes of happiness there, but I had the hope of revenge. My heart beat quick and high against my bosom, when I beheld, afar off, the spire arising from out the trees. It was no longer that innocent hearty expectation which preceded my first return. The recollection of all the misery, of all the persecution I had experienced there, aroused my wounds a-bleeding, every nerve a-jarring within me. I redoubled my pace, I longed to startle my enemies with the horror of my aspect—I thirsted after new contempts as much as I had ever shuddered at the old.

'The clocks were striking the hour of vespers as I reached the market-place. The crowd was rushing to the church-door. I was immediately recognized; every man that knew me shrank from meeting me. Of old I had loved the little children, and even now, seeking in their innocence a refuge from the scorn of others, I threw a small piece of money to the first I saw. The boy stared at me for a moment, and then dashed the coin at my face. Had my blood boiled less furiously, I might have recollected that I still wore my prison beard, and that was enough to account for the terror of the infant. But my hard heart had blinded my reason, and tears, such as I had never wept leaped down my cheeks.

'The child, said I to myself, half aloud, knows not who I am, nor whence I came, and yet he avoids me like a beast of prey. Am I then marked upon the forehead like Cain, or have I ceased to be like a man, since all men spurn me? The aversion of the child tortured me more than all my three years slavery, for I had done him good, and I could not accuse him of hating me.

'I sat down in a wood-yard over against the church; what my wishes were I knew not; but I remember it was wormwood to my spirits, that none of my old acquaintances should have vouchsafed me a greeting—no, not one. When the yard was locked up, I unwillingly departed to seek a lodging; in turning the corn-ner of a street, I ran against my Hannah: 'Mine Host of the Sun,' cried she, and opened her arms as if to embrace me—'You here again, my dear Wolf, God be thanked for your return!'—Hunger and wretchedness here expressed in scanty raiment; dire disease had marred her countenance; her whole appearance told me what a wicked creature she had become. I saw two or three dragoons laughing at her through a window, and turned my back, with a louder laugh than theirs, upon the soldier's trull. It did me good to find that there was something yet lower in the scale of life than myself I had never loved her.

'My mother was dead. My small house had been sold to pay my creditors. I asked nothing more. I drew near to no man. All the world fled from me like a pestilence, but I had at last forgotten shame. Formerly I hated the sight of men, because their contempt was insufferable to me. Now I threw myself in the way, and found a savage delight in scattering horror around me. I had nothing more to lose, why then should I conceal myself? Men expected no good from me, why should they have any? I was made to bear the punishment of sins I had never committed. My infamy was a capital, the interest of which was not easy to be exhausted.

'The whole earth was before me; in some remote province I might perhaps have sustained the character of an honest man, but I had lost the desire of being, nay, even of seeming such. Contempt and shame had taken from me even this last relic of myself,—my resource, now that I had no honor, was to learn to do without it. Had my vanity and pride survived my infamy, I must have died by my own hand.

'What I was to do, I myself knew not. I was determined, however, to do evil; of so much I have some dark recollection. I was resolved to see the worst of my destiny. The laws, said I to myself, are benefits to the world, it is fit that I should offend them; formerly I had sinned from levity and necessity, but now I sinned from free choice, and for my pleasure.

'My first step was to the woods. The chase had by degrees become to me as a passion; I thirsted, like a lover after thick brakes and headlong leaps, and the mad delight all rushing along the bare earth beneath the pines. Besides, I must live. But these were not all. I hated the prince who had published the forest edict, and I believed, that in injuring him, I should only exercise my natural right of retaliation. The chance of being taken no longer troubled me, for now I had a bullet for my discoverer, and I well knew the certainty of my aim. I slew every animal that came near me, the greater part of them rotted where they died; for I neither had the power, nor the wish, to sell more than a few of them beyond the barriers. Myself lived wretchedly; except on powder and shot, I expended nothing. My devastations were dreadful, but no suspicion pursued me. My appearance was too poor to excite any, and my name had long since been forgotten.

'This life continued for several months. One morning, according to my custom, I had pursued a stag for many miles through the wood. For two hours I had in vain exerted every nerve, and at last I had begun to despair of my booty, when, all at once, I perceived the stately animal exactly at the proper distance for my gun—my finger was ready on the trigger, when of a sudden, my eye was caught with the appearance of a hat lying a few paces before me on the ground. I looked more closely, and perceived the huntsman Robert Horn, lurking behind a massy oak, and taking deliberate aim at the very stag I had been pursuing—at the sight, a deadly coldness crept through my limbs. Here was the man I hated above all living things here he was, and within reach of my bullet. At this moment, it seemed to me as if the whole world were at the muzzle of my piece, as if the wrath and hatred of a thousand lives were all quivering in the finger that should give the murderous pressure. A dark fearful unseen hand was upon me: the figure of my destiny pointed irrevocably to the black moment. My arm shook as with an ague, while I lifted my gun, my teeth chattered—my breath stood motionless in my lungs. For a minute the barrel hung uncertain between the man and the stag—a minute—and another and yet one more. Conscience and revenge struggled fiercely within me, but the demon triumphed and the huntsman fell dead upon the ground.

'My courage fell with him—Murderer!—E stammered the word slowly. The wood was silent as a church-yard, distinctly did I hear it—Murderer!—As I drew near, the man yielded up his spirit. Long stood I speechless by the corpse; at last I forced a wild laugh, and cried, 'No more tales from the wood now my friend!' I drew him into the thicket with his face upwards! The eyes stood stiff, and stared upon me. I was serious enough, and silent too. The feeling of solitude began to press grievously upon my soul.

'Up to this time I had been accustomed to rail at the over severity of my destiny; now I had done something which was not yet punished. An hour before, no man could have persuaded me that there existed a being more wretched than myself. Now I began to envy myself for what even then I had been.

'The idea of God's justice never came into mind, but I remembered a bewildered vision of ropes, and swords, and the dying agonies of a child-murderess, which I had witnessed when a boy. A certain dim and fearful idea lay upon my thoughts that my life was forfeit. I cannot recollect every thing. I wished that Horn were yet alive. I forced myself to call up all the evil the dead man had done when in life, but my memory was sadly gone. Scarcely could I recollect one of all those thousand circumstances, which a quarter of an hour before had been suffered to blow my wrath into phrenzy. I could not conceive how or why I had become a murderer.

'I was still standing beside the corpse—I might have stood there for ever—when I heard the crack of a whip, and the creaking of a fruit wagon passing through the wood. The spot where I had done the deed was scarcely a hundred yards from the great path. I must look to my safety.

'I bounded like a wild deer into the depths of the wood; but while I was in my race, it struck me that the deceased used to have a watch. In order to pass the barriers, I had need of money, and yet scarcely could I muster up courage to approach the place of blood. Then I thought for a moment of the devil, and, I believe, confusedly, of the omnipresence of God I called up all my boldness, and strode towards the spot, resolved to dare earth and hell to the combat. I found what I had expected, a dollar or two besides in a green silk purse. At first I took all, but a sudden thought seized me. It was neither that I feared, nor that I was ashamed to add another crime to murder. Nevertheless, so it was, I threw back the watch, and half the silver. I wished to consider myself as the personal enemy, not as the robber of the slain.

'Again I rushed towards the depth of the forest. I knew that the wood extended for four German miles (about twenty English measure) northwards, and there bordered upon the frontier. Till the sun was high in heaven I ran on breathless. The swiftness of my flight had weakened the force of my conscience, and its vigor. A thousand dismal forms floated before my eyes; a thousand knives of despair and agony were in my breast. Between a life of restless fear, and a violent death, the alternative was fearful, but choose I must. I had not the heart to leave the world by self-murder, yet scarcely could I bear the idea of remaining in it. Hesitating between the certain miseries of life, and the untold terrors of eternity, alike unwilling to live and to die, the sixth hour of my flight passed over my head—an hour full of wretchedness, such as no man can utter, such as God himself in mercy will spare to me, even to me, upon the scaffold.

'Again I started on my feet. I drew my hat over my eyes, as not being able to look lifeless nature in the face, and was rushing instinctively along the line of a small foot path, which drew me into the very heart of the wilderness, when a rough stern voice immediately in front of me cried, 'Halt!' The voice was close to me, for I had forgotten myself, and never looked a yard before me during the whole race. I lifted my eyes, and, and saw a tall savage-looking man advancing towards me, with a ponderous club in his hand. His figure was of gigantic size, so at least I thought, on my first alarm; his skin was of a dark mulatto yellow, in which the white of his fierce eyes were fearfully prominent. Instead of a girdle, he had a piece of sailcloth twisted over his green woollen coat, and in it I saw a broad bare butcher's knife, and a pistol. The summons was repeated, and a strong arm held me fast. The sound of human voice had terrified me,—but the sight of an evil-doer gave me heart again in my condition, I had reason to fear a good man, but none at all to tremble at a ruffian.

MISCELLANY.

THE PHILOSOPHIC EPHEMERON.

Letter from Dr. Franklin to a Lady in France.

We copy the following from the London Masonic Magazine, of 1793, which we do not recollect of ever seeing before. Every thing which illustrates Franklin's character, should be treasured up. What is our own "Moulin Joly," but one of a little longer duration.—How little does our own "ephemera" differ from the one he so playfully describes:—

You may remember, my dear friend, that when we lately spent that happy day in the delightful garden and sweet society of the Moulin Joly I stopt a little in one of our walks, and staid some time behind the company. We had been shown numberless skeletons of a little fly, called an ephemera; whose successive generations, we were told, were bred and expired within the day. I happened to see a living company of them on a leaf, who appeared to be engaged in conversation; you know I understand all the inferior animal tongues: my too great application to the study of them, is the best reason I can give, for the little progress in your charming language. I listened through curiosity to the discourse of the little creatures; but as they in their national vivacity, spoke three or four together, I could make but little of their conversation: I found, however, by some broken expressions, that I heard now and then, that they were disputing warmly on the merit of two foreign musicians; one a cousin, the other a muscheto; in which dispute, they spent their time, seemingly as regardless of the shortness of life, as if they had been sure of living a month. Happy people! thought I, you live certainly under a mild government, since you have no public grievances to complain of, nor any subject of contention, but the perfections or imperfection of foreign music. I turned my head from them to an old grey-headed one, who was single on another leaf, and talking to himself. Being amused with his soliloquy, I have put it down in writing, in hopes it will likewise amuse her, to whom I am so much indebted, for the most pleasing of all amusements; her delicious company, and heavenly harmony. "It was," says he, "the opinion of learned philosophers of our race, who lived and flourished long before my time, that this vast world, the Moulin Joly, could itself subsist more than 18 hours: and I found there was some foundation for that opinion, since by the apparent motion of the great luminary, that gives life to all nature, and which in my time, has declined evidently towards the ocean at the end of our earth, it must then finish its course—be extinguished in the waters that surround us—and leave the world in cold and darkness, necessarily producing universal death and destruction. I have lived seven of these hours; a great age, no less than four hundred & twenty minutes of time. How very few of us continue so long! I have seen generations born, flourish, and expire. My present friends are the children and grand-children of the friends of my youth, who are now, alas! no more: and I must soon follow them; for by the course of nature, though stiff in health, I cannot expect to live above seven or eight minutes longer. What now avails all my toil and labor in amassing honey dew on this leaf, which I cannot live to enjoy? what the political struggles I have been engaged in, for the good of my compatriot inhabitants of the bush, or my philosophical studies for the benefit of our race in general! for in politics (what can laws do without morals?) our present race of ephemera will, in a very few minutes become corrupt, like those of other and older bushes, and consequently, as wretched: and in philosophy how small our progress; Alas! art is long and life is short. My friends would comfort me with the idea of a name, they say I shall leave behind me; and they tell me, I have lived long enough to nature and to glory. But what will fame be to an ephemera, who no longer exists? and what will become of all history in the 18th hour, when the world itself, even the whole Moulin Joly, shall come to its end, and be buried in universal ruin?—To me, after my eager pursuits, no solid pleasure now remains, but the reflection of a long life spent in meaning well, the sensible conversation of a few good lady ephemera; and now and then a kind smile, and a tune from the ever amiable brilliant."

TRUTH STRANGER THAN FICTION.

We copy the following detail from the doings of the St. Louis Police Office, as reported in the Bulletin of the 8th ult. We doubt not it is true in every particular:—

George Mortimer Wardwell, a genteel and intelligent young man, of about thirty years of age, was brought up this morning on charge of being drunk in the streets, and disturbing the peace. He pleaded guilty to the charge, and evidently labored under the greatest emotion. When requested to give some account of himself, he replied:—

"Sir—I have now arrived at that extremity of degradation which, long ago, I became satisfied would one day or other become my position. Sir, I do not believe I was born to this. In my youth, when I first started in the world, my prospects and my hopes were as bright as the sky which bent over me. I married a beautiful wife when I was twenty-eight years old, and had acquired a considerable competence. Sir, I need not tell you how I loved her! I see by your countenance that you know something of human nature, and am already satisfied that I am not a common loafer—that I have been driven to the present extremity by some extraordinary circumstances. But I will proceed with my story.

Two years after I was married to my wife—who was a young English lady of handsome expectations—and had a beautiful boy to bless me with his innocent endearments, we received letters from England, announcing the death of my wife's father, and soliciting me to come to England immediately, for the purpose of settling up the affairs of the deceased, and receiving my portion of the estate. I immediately made preparations for my departure, and leaving my wife under the protection of an intimate friend, whose name was Henry Anson Willoughby, (d—n him!) I set sail for England. My business detained me longer than I had anticipated and I began to feel the most intense anxiety in regard to my family. The letters which I received from my wife grew brief and unrequited, sometimes startling me with their abruptness. Just before the final steps in regard to my wife's portion were about to be completed, I received a letter from America, written by an old friend of my father's family, warning me to hasten home if I would preserve my future happiness and the honor of my wife! Imagine my dismay! I hurried home, leaving my business still unsettled, and arrived in time to find my hearth desolate, my wife eloped with my friend Willoughby, and my boy—my darling boy—in the Orphan Asylum—an object of public charity!

Willoughby had represented himself as a rich planter from Alabama, and that he was sojourning at the north for the purpose of regaining his health. Placing my child under proper protection, I flew in pursuit of the destroyer of my peace, with my heart burning for revenge. At Montgomery, Ala., I learned that Willoughby had been there, in company with a lady, who he called his wife—that he had been for years a notorious black-leg and swindler, and had gone to Mobile, leaving his wife (my wife!) behind, in circumstances of destitution. After waiting for some time, she borrowed money of some of the citizens and allowed him.

Mad with rage and disappointment, I pursued. At Mobile I lost all traces of the villain and his wretched victim. I proceeded to New-Orleans; and on making inquiries of the different boats, I was told by the captain of one them engaged in running to St. Louis, that a woman answering the description I gave, had gone up the river on her boat some time since. I immediately embarked for this place, sir; and my money being nearly exhausted, I was compelled to take passage on deck. I arrived here in a state of complete destitution; and being unable to learn any thing of my wife or the villain Willoughby, I became discouraged and disheartened. The bottle was my resort. I mingled with the vilest of the vile; and, last night was persuaded by several others, to visit a house of ill-fame. I entered—and the first object that met my gaze was my wife, resigning her tender cheek, which I had not suffered "even the winds of Heaven to visit too roughly," to disgusting carcases. Sir, sir, I became mad! I can tell no more, but that I rushed from the house, invoking the most impious maledictions upon him who had been the cause of so much misery and anguish, and found myself this morning in the situation which you behold me. Sir, nothing which you can inflict will be a punishment to me, and you can bestow no greater favor than to take my life. I have lived too long—I am ready to die."

He was discharged.

THE PIEDMONTESE SHARPER.

In the year 1695, a Piedmontese, who styled himself count Carassa, came to Vienna, and privately waited on the prime minister, pretending he was sent by the Duke of Savoy on a very important affair, which they two were to negotiate without the privy of the French court. At the same time he produced his credentials, in which the duke's seal and signature were exactly imitated. He met with a very favourable reception, and, without affecting any privacy, took upon him the title of envoy extraordinary from the court of Savoy. He had several conferences with the imperial council, and made so great a figure in the most distinguished assemblies, that once at a private concert at court, the captain of guard denying him admittance, he demanded satisfaction in his master's name, and the officer was obliged to ask his pardon. His first care was to ingratiate himself with the Jesuits, who at that time bore a great sway at court; and in order to this, he went to visit their church, which remained unfinished, as they pretended from the low circumstances of the society, he asked them how much money would complete it. An estimate to the amount of two thousand louis-d'ors being laid before him, Carassa assured them of his constant attachment to their order; that he had gladly embraced such a public opportunity of shewing his esteem for them, and that they might immediately proceed to finishing their church. In consequence of his promise, he sent that very day the two thousand louis-d'ors, at which sum the charge had been computed.

He was very sensible this was a part he could not act long without being detected; and that this piece of generosity might not be at his own expense, he invited a great number of ladies of the first rank to supper and a ball. Every one of the guests had promised to be there; but he complained to them all of the ill returns made to his civilities, adding, that he had been often disappointed, as the ladies made no scruple of breaking their word on such occasions, and, in a jocular way, insisted on a pledge from every lady for their appearance at the time appointed. One gave him a ring, another a pearl necklace, a third a pair of ear-rings, a fourth a gold watch, and several such trinkets, to the amount of twelve thousand dollars. On the evening appointed not one of the guests were missing; but it may easily be conceived, what a damp it struck upon the whole assembly, when it was at last found that the gay Piedmontese was a sharper, and had disappeared. Nor had the Jesuits any great reason to applaud themselves on the success of their dissimulation; for a few days before his departure, the pretended count, putting on an air of deep concern, placed himself in the way of the emperor's confessor, who inquiring into the cause of his apparent melancholy, he intrusted him with the important secret, that he was short of money at a juncture when eight thousand louis-d'ors were immediately wanted for his master's affair, to be distributed at the imperial court. The Jesuits, to whom he had given a recent instance of his liberality by so large a donation, immediately furnished him with the sum he wanted; and with this acquisition, and the ladies' pledges, he thought he had carried his jests far enough, and very prudently withdrew from Vienna.

A CHINESE WITNESS.

A cause was yesterday tried in the Marine Court in which a Chinese was called as a witness. He was objected to on account of his not believing in a God.—Upon being questioned, he replied that he believed in a great many Gods—that in his country the temples are full of them. Our Revised Statutes provide that every witness believing in any other than the Christian religion, shall be sworn according to the peculiar ceremonies of his religion. Upon being asked how he was sworn in China, he said he went into the temple before the gods and read certain passages from a Chinese bible, then took a vessel of salt which he sprinkled on the ground, after which ceremony, he went before the Mandarin and gave his testimony. New York being unprovided with Chinese temples and idols it was of course found impossible to swear the witness according to law, and the party was obliged to lose the benefit of his testimony, until the court consider the matter further.—N. York Sun of Friday.

The Journal of Commerce of Saturday says:

The witness appeared in court again to-day, and on being questioned by Judge Scott, he said that there were various ceremonies attending the taking an oath in China, some of which might be dispensed with, and yet the witness consider himself equally bound to tell the truth. In addition to what he said the day before, he now mentioned that a witness sometimes holds a lighted torch in his hand, but that this omitting to do so, or to use some other ceremonies, such as spitting on the ground, are not necessary to render the oath binding and valid.

It would be sufficient, he said, to have the oath administered in the following manner, which was accordingly done. The plaintiff knelt down, and the witness took in his hand what he called the Chinese Bible, and the Judge, as does the Mandarin in such cases, told the witness to tell the truth. The witness then handed the Bible to the plaintiff. The witness then took a China cup in his hand, and held it while the witness read aloud a small portion of the Chinese Bible. When the witness stopped reading the plaintiff handed him the cup, which the latter dashed against the ground with much vehemence of manner, and of course broke it in pieces. The witness then shut up the book, and witness and plaintiff then kissed it, and the plaintiff stood up. The plaintiff then required the Judge to put his, the plaintiff's name in that part of the Bible which he had read, which the Judge did, and the witness then began to give his evidence. Prior to the oath being administered, the Court had decided that according to the Revised Statutes, the oath could be legally administered as it was the form in which oaths were sometimes sworn in China.

The difficulty in relation to the witness being sworn in a temple was obviated by the witness stating that their Chinese Courts are held in their temples, or as he called them, Churches. So that a Temple and Court of Justice in China is one and the same thing.—What he called a Bible is a small book in the form of a pamphlet containing a portion of the writings of Confucius, in the Chinese language, and having a Mandarin's signature on the cover, to attest its being a genuine copy of the work.

THE QUEEN'S MARRIAGE.—It is now definitely understood that Queen Victoria has plighted her troth to Prince Albert of Saxe Coburg, and that the marriage is to take place in April or May next. The Prince, with his father and brother, has just gone home, after some weeks sojourn at Windsor Castle where he received marked recognition as the favored youth—always at her Majesty's elbow when "walking on the terrace," or said amen in the chapel—when she rode on horseback, or in the pony phaeton—when she dined, and when she danced. Albert is three months younger than the royal spinster, and they say he is a very decent looking lad.

It appears that young Albert's mother died when he was twelve years old, and his father the duke, being acquainted with the dutchess of Kent, placed the young prince under her charge. A residence of three years at Kensington palace, as playmate and fellow-student of Miss Victoria, even to the matter of music lessons under the same teacher, might account for a mutual childish affection if no more—and twas perhaps 'this same,' as Pat says, which induced a refusal on her part of the Prince of Orange, (junior) and him of Cambridge. This chimes too with the policy of declining an alliance with a greater power, which might entangle England in its quarrels—and as for Catholics of any power, they have no chance in the game. If it's a love match then, and the husband worth the having, long life to them and a worthy line of Kings!

According to one of the catchpenny "Memoirs" of Prince Albert, he finished his education at the University of Bonn, where he was under the tutorship of Schlegel, the celebrated Shakespeare critic. The same high authority states that on returning from a tour last autumn, after the coronation at London, he found in his chamber a beautiful portrait of Victoria, painted by Chalon, and forwarded to him by the lady herself!—Happy pair!

AMERICAN MASONIC REGISTER.

ALBANY, SATURDAY, DEC. 14, 1839.

. New Subscribers to the Register, can be furnished, with the back numbers from the commencement.

OURSELVES.—It is our intention occasionally, to send duplicate copies of the Register, with a prospectus, to those of our friends, whom we think will take an interest in circulating the paper. We wish those to whom they may be sent, to enclose them and send them to their friends. By doing so, they will much oblige us.

POSTAGE.—We are glad to perceive, that this Subject is beginning to claim the public attention. The present rates, are unreasonably high, and neither adapted to the actual necessities of the revenue, nor accord with the genius of our government. The post-office department should never be a source revenue. The covering of annual expenditure, is all that can be asked or expected. The whole subject of postage, we understand, is to be brought before Congress, this Winter, and we trust that the people, will unite, by petition, and otherwise, in instructing their representatives, to modify the present exactions.

There is one particular feature, connected with the present post office regulations, which has always appeared to us as impolitic and oppressive. It is that which relates to periodicals, and particularly those received by printers. By the present law, one printer may receive a newspaper in exchange for his own, without being compelled to pay the postage on it.—But if he receive a pamphlet or magazine, although published periodically, he is compelled to pay 14 cent postage per sheet if within 100 miles, and 24 cents, if over that distance. Now the fact is conceded, that the object of giving printers this privilege, is that through them they may communicate the earliest and best intelligence at the cheapest rate, to their various readers. If this, then, is the policy of the Government why put an effectual bar, on this wholesome regulation, by shutting off the the very best matter that the press produces? We all know that the Knickerbocker, Southern Literary Messenger, and many other literary magazines we might mention, are each of more intrinsic worth to an editor, than a bushel of the ordinary exchange papers. Take, for instance the Knickerbocker, which we believe is five sheets. Every printer who receives this work out of the State, must pay fifteen cents postage on it, and if such printer sends his paper, fortunately in exchange the Knickerbocker is compelled to pay the postage, the post master telling him that as he prints a magazine, he has none of the privileges of the newspaper. The tendency of this is to deprive one branch of the public press from the intelligence of the other. For it cannot reasonably be expected that the editor of a magazine, which is chiefly made up of original matter, will send his paper in courtesy to one, of little use to him, and then pay the postage on the one received in exchange. This matter we think is of vital importance to the editors of newspapers, and we trust, they will use their best endeavors to have it remedied. As the law now stands, or is construed, it appears to us, to be giving the press privileges with one hand and taking them away with the other. The spirit of the law never contemplated this paradox.

THE MANOR DIFFICULTIES, which has been the all-engrossing topic, for the last fifteen days, is likely by the appearance of things, to have an end—at least for the present. On Monday last the uniform companies of this city were ordered to the scene of action; on Tuesday three companies came from Troy, and on Thursday 500 troops arrived under the command of Gen. Averill. Orders were likewise sent to New York, directing the commanding general of that place, to hold himself in readiness with two thousand troops, at two hours notice. All these warlike preparations, however are now rendered unnecessary by the last news from the Sheriff, who is permitted to do his duty unmolested. Gen. Averill, and his troops were dismissed yesterday, and the public feeling is fast returning to its quietness.

How long we shall be suffered to remain in this state, is a matter for conjecture. We understand that many, of these "misguided citizens," threaten to enact the same scenes over, on some future occasion; which we suppose means, when another year's rent becomes due. Whether this outrage on the public peace will be suffered to pass unpunished, is for time to determine. If the ringleaders are imprisoned, and the expense of this affair is enforced on all who have participated in it, it will forever put a stop to "manor" rebellions. But if a temporising and pusillanimous policy is to govern, it will add strength and countenance to mob-law throughout the state and we may assuredly expect another affray within the year. We do not wish to be invidious, and we cannot but help as the friends of order, and law, to repudiate in the strongest terms the idea held out to these misguided men, that the legislature can or will give them any redress. If these anarchists "lay this flattering unction to their souls," they will be most grievously disappointed. A legislature dare not abrogate a contract, and such is their case. The laws have been violated, and these men must be punished. We have already too much agrarian principle among us in theory. Do not let us carry it out into practice, unless we are determined to become a nation of anarchists. Do not let us if we have one spark of the love of country, allow our laws to be trodden upon, as they have been in this instance, with impunity. Let the transgressor feel that his punishment is certain. Justice demands it.

EXTRAORDINARY SURGICAL OPERATION.—The last Boston Medical and Surgical Journal, gives an interesting account of the removal of the upper jaw, with a large portion of the molar bone, performed by Dr. Warren of that city. The unfortunate patient was about 60 years of age, and had been affected "with a faugoid disease in the antrum, of a dreadful painful kind. The tumour was of a sugar loaf form, occupying the right side of the face, and had forced its way through the cavities pertaining to the maxillary bone. The right eye was compressed and inflamed, and the cavities of the nostrils partly filled by the tumour." The patient supported the trying operation without a groan, and at the conclusion, undressed himself, before retiring to bed. In a fortnight he was well enough to leave his room. The Journal says, that it was the first operation of the kind ever performed in the U. S.

BEAU BRUMMELL.—We observe an article going the rounds of the newspapers, in which this celebrated personage, is said to be confined in a mad house. Some very amusing things are related of him, in his present situation, illustrative of his character. But unfortunately for Brummell, and his paragraphists, he took it into his head to die some ten years ago, and spoil what otherwise would have been a good newspaper article. Alas! poor Yorick!

The New Orleans papers of the 27th ult. contain advices from Houston and Galveston to the 22nd.—No mention is made of the capture of Matamoras, heretofore reported, and the story is probably untrue.

News.—Pretty much all the news of the late difficulties in the county, were received from New York.—According to those well informed journals, all the bridges have been destroyed, several times, many lives have been lost, some barns burned, with divers other strange things. All this is undoubtedly owing to the present facilities in travelling.

The Address of Companion Mix, on our first page, will occupy a portion of three of our numbers. The Address exhibits a great deal of close research, and will prove acceptable to those of our readers who look above the arch.

CANAL TOLLS.

The amount received on all the New York State canals in the month of November, is as follows:

In 1838	199,964 18
In 1839	187,349 41

Those Brethren who subscribed the prospectus for the Masonic Register, by me circulated, and who have not paid for the same to me, or Br. Mix, will oblige me much by sending the same to Br. L. G. Hoffman, by mail. The Post Masters, are authorised to send such money free of postage.

BLANCHARD POWERS.

NOTICE.

Agreeable to the By-Laws of Mount Vernon Lodge, No. 3, the members thereof, are hereby Summoned to meet at St. John's Hall, on Thursday evening next, at 7 o'clock, for the purposes of election and the payment of annual dues.

By order of the W. M.

JOHN HURDIS, Sec'y.

CHINA.—By latest accounts, we find that the trade between this country and the Celestial Empire is resumed; the captain of each American ship signing a bond, that he brings no opium; and subjecting himself to some unknown pains and penalties in case of any opium being found in his vessel.—All direct trade is stopped with England, until the arrival of dispatches from the British government, when we shall probably have to record the entertainment of "the Bull in the China shop." In the meantime considerable trade will be carried on by means of American vessels.—N. Y. Sunday Atlas.

DYSPEPSIA.

In older times—in days of the revolution—when sons worked willingly in the forest and the fields and partook of the simple but substantial fare of their own farms; when daughters wore thick shoes, loose gowns and labored at the spinning-wheel and loom, such diseases as consumption and dyspepsia were seldom or ever known. Doctors were rare acquaintances then. But, now, if a young man would appear respectable, he must carry a green bag to court rather than a bag to mill; he must wield a yard stick rather than a hoe or shovel; and as for young ladies; alas! their shoes must be of kid, thin as wafers; their chests must be pent up in corsets as closely as a Chinese foot, and their time must be spent in spinning street-yarn, thrumming the piano forte, or discoursing sentimental songs. All these fashions are prejudicial to human life and health. Oh, that fashion would take the right direction, and go upon the maxim of sanctioning nothing which interferes with the laws of health. Then would the hopes of our country brighten, and individuals would enjoy an amount of comfort which is now too willingly but blindly sacrificed to false tastes.—Maine Cultivator.

ZAPHE, the German boy who shot his comrade in the woods near Jeffersonville, Ia., a few weeks since, has been tried and acquitted of intentional murder.—The case is the most singular on record. Four German boys it seems from the testimony, went out a bird hunting with a single gun, which was carried by Zaphe, who was the oldest, and scarce 14. After being in the woods together some time and killing one bird, Zaphe told the other boys he would shoot them 'mouse dead,' and immediately shot down one of them. No motive could be assigned by the surviving boys for the act of Zaphe.

There had been no quarrel or disagreement among them. The comrades of Zaphe bound up the wounds of their fallen companion with handkerchiefs, prayed over the body, in which they were joined by Zaphe. He then dragged the body to some logs, struck his victim on the head with a club, and concealed the corpse under leaves and rubbish, all the time threatening the other boys that he would 'shoot them mouse dead' if they informed of what he had done. He directed the boys to say that their companion had fallen into the river, and such was the terror his threats excited, that the boys, who were quite young, persisted in the story Zaphe had taught them for some days. All the boys were intelligent, and belonged to respectable German families. The trial excited great interest, and was altogether a strange affair.—Cleveland Herald.

POETRY.

For the American Masonic Register and Literary Companion,
TO "MARIETTE."

What joys Earth can give we may call ours—
How lasting are they?
Soon dark sorrow comes like frost on flowers,
And sweeps them away,

Mariette.

Then, when pleasures fly from our embrace,
And our hearts are sad,
Phantoms will oft come and take their place,
But make us not glad,

Mariette.

One many worship, the fiend Despair,
In Hope's garments dressed—
Ah! little think they the spirit there,
Is unblest, unblest,

Mariette.

They dream of pleasures on Earth again,
And die as they dream;
But heavenly Hope can banish all pain,
And Love reigns supreme,

Mariette.

How the heart pants for the bright abode
Of Eternal Love!—
Religion, sweet guide makes bright the road
From Earth to above,

Mariette.

Pure and bright, like a gem of even,
Shine thou Mariette;
So light that thou too wilt in heaven
Be gloriously seen—

For the American Masonic Register and Literary Companion,
TO—

Some, 'tis said, have an Evil Eye;
And they who meet it, droop and die,
Or linger long; but never meet,
Aught in life that the world calls sweet.
Now woe is me; for I have seen
That which to me hath Evil been
'Twas not the Eye of an Evil one—
I fear no witch's malison—
Yet am I bound by witchery,
And vainly struggle to be free:
Alas! I may not break the spell
That hath wrought its work so sure and well;
Flinging dark shadows o'er my mind,
'Till my thoughts are sad. Yes, oft I find
A phantom with me as I rove,
And some do call that spirit love!
I little thought, when pleased the while,
Of witchery in Ella's smile;
As well expect, when skies are fair,
The lightning shaft of death from there!
But oh! the heart is a subtle thing,
And we know not oft when passions spring,
'Till we find them reason mastering.

EUGENE.

Albany. Dec. 1839.

TO ***

BY R. MONTGOMERY.

Oh, Lady! in my boyish hour,
Perchance thou see'st me gay as young,
The happy slave of Pleasure's power,
With rapture in my heart and tongue.

Yet think not thus I ever seem,
As though no grief did e'er annoy;—
There's darkness in the brightest dream,
And sorrow in the sweetest joy!

Alone amid the world I move,
With scarce a smile or tear for me,
And not a heart to share the love
Of unaffected sympathy:

Without it, what can realms bestow
Of all that mingling natures feel!—
It is to kindred mind we owe
The rapture Time delights to steal.

But may no cloudy shade intrude
Upon the sunshine of the lot,
And all that dims my gayest mood
In thy fresh feeling be forgot:

May Heaven attend thee! wheresoe'er
The winging years may waft thee on;
And nothing mar that blissful air
All eyes have loved to look upon!

A MASONIC SONG.

Not the fictions of Greece, nor the dreams of old Rome:
Shall with visions mislead, or with meteors consume,
No Pegasus' wings my short soarings misguide;
Nor raptures detain me on Helicon's side.
All clouds now dissolve; from the East beams the day—
Truth rises in glory and wakens the lay.
The Eagle-eyed Muse—sees the light—fills the grove
With the song of Free Masons, of Friendship and Love!

Inspir'd with the theme, the Divinity flies;
And thron'd on a rainbow—before her arise
PAST, PRESENT, and FUTURE—with splendid array,
In Masonic succession, their treasures display.
She views murder'd Merit by ruffian-hand fall,
And the grave gives its dead up, at fellowship's call!
While the Craft, by their badges, their innocence prove;
And the song of Free Masons is Friendship and Love.

From those ages remote, see the Muse speeds her way.
To join in the glories, the PRESENT display.
In freedom and friendship, she sees the true band,
With their splendor and virtues illumine the land.
Religion's pure beam breaks the vapours of night,
And from darkness mysterious, the Word gives the light!

While the Lodge here below, as the choirs from above,
Join the song of Free Masons in Friendship and Love.

That the FUTURE might keep what the Present bestows
In rapture prophetic the goddess arose,
As she sung through the skies, angels echo'd the sound
And the winds bore the notes to the regions around!
The kind proclamation our song shall retain:
'Twas—That Masonry long may its lustre maintain:
'And till Time be no more, our Fraternity prove,
'That the objects we aim at, are Friendship and Love.

OLD WINTER IS COMING.

Old Winter is coming again—slack!
How icy and cold is he!
He cares not a pin for a shivering back—
He's a sautey old chap to white and black
He whistles his chills with a wonderful knack,
For he comes from a cold countree!

A witty old fellow this Winter is—
A mighty old fellow for glee!
He cracks his jokes on the pretty sweet miles—
The wrinkled old maiden, unfit to kiss,
And freezes the dew of their lips:—for this
Is the way for old fellows like he!

Old Winter's a frolicsome blade I wot—
He is wild in his humour, and free!
He'll whistle along, for "the want of his thought,"
And set all the wrath of our furs at naught,
And ruffle the lores by pretty girls bought—
A frolicsome fellow is he!

Old Winter is blowing his gusts along,
And merrily shaking the tree!
From morning 'till night he will sing his song—
Now moaning, and short—now howling, and long
His voice is loud—for his lungs are strong—
A merry old fellow is he!

Old Winter's a tough old fellow for blows,
As tough as ever you see!
He will trip up our trotters, and rend our clothes,
And stiffen our limbs from our fingers to toes—
He mads not the cries of his friends or his foes—
A tough old fellow is he!

A cunning old fellow is Winter, they say,
A cunning old fellow is he!
He peeps in the crevices day by day,
To see how we're passing our time away—
And marks all our doings from grave to gay—
I'm afraid he is peeping at me!

THE WITHERED ROSE.

I would not give this wither'd flower
For all the garlands you could twine,
It makes me think of many an hour
When love, and hope, and youth were mine.
Its blushes, like my cheeks, are dead;
But, oh! there lingers a perfume,
Like memory of pleasures fled,
That half revives its faded bloom!

This Rose was given me on the day
I first began to know love's power;
It was the fairest Rose of May—
Alas! it was an emblem flower!
So bright, so purely bright it seem'd,
I dreamt not that a canker lay
Within its breast—had I but dream'd
Aright, I should not weep to-day!

I placed it in my bosom, near
The new-found heart exchanged for mine;
The flower methought shed one cold tear;
Which chill'd while its burning shrine;
Day after day I saw it sink,
As Love took wing for newer bowers:
Alas! that there should be such link!
'Twixt fickle hearts and fading flowers!

A LECTURE,

Setting forth the origin, and tracing the progress of the orders of MASONIC CHRISTIAN KNIGHTHOOD. And exhibiting the connexion of those orders with ancient Freemasonry. Derived from authentic ancient and modern, sacred and profane history.

By HENRY MIX, E. Q. M. E. Grand Commander of Genesee Encampment, No. 10, holden, at Lockport, Niagara County N. Y.

This new order at that time was called, that of knights of the East, as the circumstances on which it was founded took place in that direction. There can be no doubt, but that this order including ancient Freemasonry, was sustained and cherished in Jerusalem, from the time of the rebuilding the city and temple, to the coming of the Messiah, at which time the great body of the order was converted to Christianity. In support of which assumption, I would refer to the characters of John the Baptist, John the Evangelist, Paul the Apostle, and Simon Peter, who carried his sword with which he smote off the high Priest servant's ear, at the time of betrayal. But the order, as such, during much of this period, and until the destruction of the second Temple, must have subsisted privately, as Jerusalem and the country round about, had been taken by the Romans and was under the charge of Roman officers, who were very jealous of conspiracies being formed among the Jews, against the Roman Government.

After the destruction of the second Temple, Judea, including Jerusalem, was seized and occupied alternately by different tribes of wandering Arabs, who from habit had become altogether averse to fixed habitations; but in process of time, several of these tribes became partially consolidated under the influence of the Mahometan religion, which they had blindly embraced, and more permanently took possession of the Holy Land. This horde, under the general appellation of Saracens, paid more attention to military enterprises, than to their religion, by which they spread their empire in a few years from the banks of the Ganges to the straits of Gibraltar. So intent on conquest however, were the Saracens that they gave little disturbance to those zealous Pilgrims who daily flocked to Jerusalem, and they allowed every man, after paying a moderate tribute to visit the Holy Sepulchre, to perform his religious duties and to return in peace. During all this time, however, it must be borne in mind, that the Pilgrims were defended against petty marauders and guarded against the impositions of mightier foes, by the vigilant and persevering knights of the East. But the Turcomans or Turks, a tribe of Tartars, who had embraced Mahometanism, having wrested Syria from the Saracens, and having in the year 1065 made themselves masters of Jerusalem, rendered the performance of pilgrimage much more difficult and dangerous. The barbarism of the manners of the Turks and their unsettled government exposed the Pilgrims to many insults, robberies and extortions, from which the knights of the East were unable to defend them. The Pilgrims on their return from Jerusalem, filled all christendom with indignation against the infidels. Peter the Hermit, an indefatigable enthusiast, was one of those Pilgrims who had returned from the Holy Land, fired with zeal in the cause against the Turks and usurpers of the consecrated ground in Jerusalem; and Judea. After consulting the Pope and many of the sovereigns of Europe, and having obtained their consent to attempt to raise a crusade against the infidels, he harangued the subject in every chief city where christianity prevailed. Although the Pope had little faith in the project at first, the success of Peter in inflaming the minds of the people in favor of a crusade, was so great that he espoused the cause with great enthusiasm, but to secure a firm support he summoned many councils of his clergy and secular dependants to take the matter into consideration, at a council held at Plautia, which consisted of four thousand ecclesiastics and thirty thousand seculars, the Pope and Peter himself harangued the assembly, representing the dismal situation of their brethren in the East, and the indignity suffered by the christian name, in allowing the holy city to remain in the hands of the infidels? when they found the minds of the audience so well prepared to second their views and prosecute their designs, that the whole multitude suddenly and violently declared for the war, and solemnly devoted themselves to perform this service, so meritorious as they believed it to God and religion.

At another council summoned by the Pope, near Clermont, in Auvergne, where the greatest prelates, nobles, and princes attended, after the Pope and Peter had made their pathetic exhortations, the whole assembly, as if impelled by an immediate inspiration, and not moved by their preceding impressions, exclaimed with one voice, "It is the will of God" "It is the will of God" on which they adopted "Will of God" for their motto, and a red cross affixed to the right shoulder for a badge. From this time the crusades were enthusiastically adopted and persevered in by all christendom. At this time the knights of the East, or knights of the Eagle as they are called sometimes, having no further duties to perform in Jerusalem, the christians having ceased to perform Pilgrimage to the tomb of their departed Lord, fled to the crusaders, took the appellation of "Knights of the Red Cross," adopted the crusaders badge as a device on one of their banners and "Will of God" as the motto.

After having expelled the infidels from the holy city, the knights of the Red Cross having congregated again at Jerusalem, founded a new order of knighthood, on the thrilling incidents through which themselves, and other devout christians, who had gone before them, had passed. An order much more in accordance with the character of knights or servants of Christ; and as their asylum was situated near the site of the Temple, they took the appellation of Knights Templars. But they still preserved the order of Knights of the Red Cross, in a distinct form, as a beautiful link to connect the degree of ancient Freemasonry with the new order of Knight Templars. The institution of this order, and the location of their asylum near the site of the Temple took place in the year of our Lord one thousand one hundred and eighteen.

The Knights Templars kept up this establishment, and guarded the holy sepulchre and the Pilgrims, who from devotion, or other motives, chose to visit it, until the country and city was again invaded, conquered and taken by the Turks. The territory which they had bound themselves to protect, having been wrested from them by an overwhelming force, they were compelled to leave the Holy Land and to establish the order wherever they found a kind reception, which was in almost every part of the world, then under the influence of the christian religion, as they had double claims on the pious, proceeding from their peculiar profession and their severe sufferings for the cause of the Saviour. During the period in which they depended upon the alms and bounty of the public, they were distinguished for their meek and meritorious conduct, which operated so greatly in their favor, that gifts flowed into their treasuries from all classes in the christian world, from the sovereigns down to the peasant, in every country where a house of Knights Templars existed; and it is asserted that their riches accumulated to such an extent, that the order became possessed of 9,000 rich convents and 15,000 lordships.

The riches of the knights joined to the course of time, by degrees relaxed the severities of their virtue, and they are accused of becoming inflated with pride, and suffering insolence to usurp the place of meekness in their manners, by which they in a great measure lost that popular favor which first raised them to honor and distinction. But however true this accusation may be, (and human nature is prone to such a result) it cannot be supposed that pride alone caused the dissolution of the order. Avarice on the part of their oppressors was the grand agent, and the riches of the knights. Some of the members residing in Paris were accused of causing a riot in that city. Philip the Fair, then on the throne of France, seizing on this opportunity, determined to make use of it, to accomplish the total ruin of the order, therefore procured the evidence of some infamous brethren, either by bribery or other means, who charged the knights generally with murder, robbery and the most shocking enormities. It was pretended that every one, whom they received into their order was obliged to renounce his Saviour and spit on the Cross, and to join to this impiety, the superstition of worshipping a golden head, which was secretly kept. It was also said that they initiated every candidate, by such infamous rites, as could serve to no other purpose than to degrade the order in his eyes, and to destroy forever the authority of all his superiors over him. In the whole of the accusation, so enormous and absurd, were the crimes imputed to them, as to be sufficient of themselves to destroy all the credit of the accusations.

Acting upon this base testimony, the king ordered the arrest of every Templar in his dominions, abolished the order, and even caused fifty-seven of them to be burned to death. Pope Clement probably anxious to partake in the plunder, issued an interdict to the order generally, and sent it to the different catholic kingdoms. Philip of France had already performed his part in this wicked and disgraceful drama. Edward the II. of England, a weak and vacillating prince, wishing to save the knights, endeavored to dispense with his part, but he was crowded on by the Pope and compelled to follow in a great degree the example set by Philip.

The legate in Germany who was charged with the promulgation of the interdict, and causing it to be carried into execution, called all the clergy together, that the publication might be more formal and solemn. Wallgruffer, Count Sauvage, the grand master, with twenty knights of the order, appeared in the assembly, fully armed and equipped—he proclaiming that he came not to do violence, but to preserve the peace, yet he insisted that the bull should not be read, unless it was merely for the purpose of receiving his protest there-to, and having the whole matter referred to the next council. The legate not being inclined to dispute with men thus armed, complied with the demands of the Count. Whereby the Templars of Germany were not deprived of their liberty, and were finally acquitted of all crime, although they were deprived of their large possessions in this country as well as elsewhere. The suppression of the order took place about the year 1330.

After the order of Templars was suppressed, their estates were mostly given to the order of St. John of Jerusalem, and the Templars being liberated from prison, retired to the different Monasteries throughout christendom.

THE HISTORY OF FREEMASONRY,

DRAWN FROM AUTHENTIC SOURCES OF INFORMATION.

No. VI.

But, though the political and intellectual condition of society was unfavourable to the progress of Freemasonry; and, though the secret association of the ancients were dissolved in the fifth century, by the command of the Roman Emperor, yet there are many reasons for believing that the ancient mysteries were observed in private, long after their public abolition, by those enemies of Christianity who were still attached to the religion of their fathers. Some authors even inform us, that this was actually the case, and that the Grecian rites existed in the eighth century, and were never completely abolished. These considerations enable us to connect the heathen mysteries, with that trading association of architects, which appeared, during the dark ages, under the special authority of the See of Rome.

The insatiable desire for external finery, and gaudy ceremonies, which was displayed by the catholic priests in the exercise of their religion, introduced a corruption into the minds of the people. But as the demand for these buildings was urgent, and continually increasing, it was with great difficulty that artificers could be procured, even for the erection of such pious works. In order to encourage the profession of architecture, the bishops of Rome, and the other potentates of Europe, conferred on the fraternity of Freemasons, the most important privileges; and allowed them to be governed by laws, customs, and ceremonies, peculiar to themselves. The association was composed of men of all nations, of Italian, Greek, French, German and Flemish artists, who were denominated Freemasons, and who, ranging from one country to another, erected those elegant churches and cathedrals, which, though they once gratified the pride, and sheltered the rites of a corrupted priesthood, now excite the notice of antiquarians, and administer to the grandeur of kingdoms. The government of this association was remarkably regular. Its members lived in a camp of huts, reared besides the building in which they were employed. A surveyor, or master, presided over, and directed the whole. Every tenth man was called a warden, and overlooked those who were under his charge; and such artificers as were not members of this fraternity, were prohibited from engaging in those buildings which Freemasons alone had a title to rear. It may seem strange, and perhaps inconsistent with what we have already said, that the fraternity of Freemasons should have been sanctioned, and even protected by the bishops of Rome. Secret association, indeed, are always a terror to temporal and spiritual tyranny. But the church of Rome, insisted on approving of the principles of Freemasonry, by the encouragement and patronage which they gave to architects, only employed them as instruments for gratifying their vanity, and gratiating their ambition. For in after ages, when

Masons were more numerous, and when the demand for religious structures was less urgent than before, the bishops of Rome deprived the fraternity of those very privileges which had been conferred upon them without solicitation, and persecuted, with unrelenting rage, the very men whom they had voluntarily taken into favor, who had contributed to the grandeur of their ecclesiastical establishment.

Wherever the catholic religion was taught, the meetings of Freemasons were sanctioned and patronised. The principles of the order were even imported into Scotland, where they continued, for many ages, in their primitive simplicity, long after they had been extinguished in the continental kingdoms. In this manner, Scotland became the centre from which these principles again issued, to illuminate, not only the nations on the continent, but every civilized portion of the habited world. What those causes were which continued the societies of Freemasons longer in Britain than in other countries, it may not, perhaps, be easy to determine; but as the fact itself is unquestionably true, it must have arisen, either from some favorable circumstance in the political state of Britain, which did not exist in the other governments of Europe; or from the superior policy, by which the British Masons eluded the suspicion of their enemies, and the superior prudence with which they maintained the primitive simplicity, and respectability of their order. The former of these causes, had, without doubt, a considerable share in producing the effect under consideration; and we know for certain, that, in our own days, the latter has preserved Freemasonry in a flourishing condition throughout these united kingdoms, while, in other countries, the imprudence and foolish invocations of its members, have exposed it to the severest and justest censure, and, in many cases, to the most violent persecutions. It is a fact, requiring no confirmation, and resulting from the most obvious causes, that Freemasonry never flourishes in seasons of public commotion; and even in Great Britain, though the seat of war is commonly in foreign countries, it has universally declined. But in those lands, which are the theatre of hostilities it will be neglected in a still greater degree; and if these hostilities are long continued, the very name and principles of the order must be soon extinguished. Amid those continual wars, therefore which during the middle ages distracted and desolated the continent of Europe, the association of architects would be soon dissolved while in the humble village of Kilwinning, on the western coast of Scotland, they found a safe retreat from the violent convulsions of continental wars.

Before we detail the progress of Freemasonry, after its importation into Britain, it will be necessary to give some account of the Knights Templars, a fraternity of Freemasons whose affluence and virtues often raised the envy of contemporaries, and whose unmerited and unhappy end must have often excited the compassion of posterity. It would be needless labor to enter into any investigation, in order to prove, that the order of the Knight Templars was a branch of Freemasonry. This fact has been invariably acknowledged by Freemasons themselves; and none have been more zealous to establish it than the enemies of their order. The former have admitted the fact, not because it was creditable to them, but because it was true; and the latter have supported it, because by the aid of a little sophistry, it might be employed to disgrace their opponents.

The order of the Knights Templars was instituted during the crusades, in the year 1118, by Hugo de Paganis, and Geoffrey of St Omers. It received this appellation because its members originally resided near the church in Jerusalem which was dedicated to our Saviour. Though the professed object of this religious association was to protect those Christian pilgrims whose mistaken piety led them to the Holy City; yet it is almost beyond a doubt, that its chief and primary intention, was to practise and preserve the rites and mysteries of Masonry. We know at least, that the Knights Templars, not only possessed the mysteries, but performed the ceremonies, and inculcated the duties of Freemasons; and it is equally certain, that the practising of these rites could contribute nothing to the protection and comfort of the Catholic pilgrims. Had the Templars publicly avowed the real object of their institution, instead of that favour which they so long enjoyed, they would have experienced the animosity of the church of Rome. But as they were animated with sincere regard for the Catholic religion and with a decided abhorrence for the infidel possessors of Judea, it was never once suspected that they transacted any other business at their secret meetings, but that which concerned the regulation of their order, the advancement of religion, and the extirpation of its enemies. The many prodigies of valour which they exhibited against the infidels; the many charitable deeds which they performed towards the distressed pilgrims; and the many virtues which adorned their private character procured them, from the rulers of Europe, that respect and authority to which they were so justly entitled, and which they so long maintained. But respect and authority were not only the rewards which they purchased by their virtues and military prowess. From the munificence of the Popes, the generosity of the pious princes and nobles of Europe, and from the gratitude of those opulent pilgrims who, in the moments of distress, had experienced their kind assistance, the Knights Templars had acquired such immense possessions in every kingdom of Europe, but particularly in France, that their revenues often exceeded those of the secular princes. Thus independent in their circumstances, and being fatigued with those unsuccessful struggles against the infidels, which they had maintained with such manly courage, they returned to their native land to enjoy, in peace and quiet, the recompence of their toils. But, like all men who are suddenly transported from danger and fatigue, to opulence and ease, many of the Templars deviated from that virtuous course, which they had hitherto pursued and indulged too freely in those luxuries and fashionable amusements to which they were invited by opulence, and impelled by inactivity. Thus, from the indiscretion of some of the Knights Templars, a considerable share of those honors, and that celebrity which they had long enjoyed. But this relaxation of discipline, and attachment to luxurious indolence, were the only crimes of which the Templars were guilty; and to men of honor and spirit like them, the forfeiture of popularity which was the consequence of their apostasy, would be a sufficient punishment. This however was not the sentiment of Philip the Fair. That barbarous monarch, instigated by private revenge against some individuals of the order; encouraged by the prospect of sharing in their ample revenue; and spurred on by a spirit which seldom resides in a human breast, imprisoned in one day all the Templars in France, merely at the instance of two worthless members of the order, who had been disgraced and punished by their superiors, for the enormity of their crimes. It was pretended by these bare accusers, that the Templars abjured our Saviour, that they spit upon his cross that they burned their children, and committed other atrocious crimes, from which the human mind recoils with horror, and which could have been perpetrated only by men so completely abandoned as the informers themselves. Under the pretence of discovering what degree of credit might be attached to these accusations the Templars were extended on the rack till they confessed the crimes with which they were charged. Several of the Knights, when stretched on this instrument of agony, made every acknowledgement which their persecutors desired. But others, retaining on the rack that fortitude and contempt of death which they had exhibited on the field, persisted in denying the crimes laid to their charge, and maintained, with their latest breath, the innocence of their order. Many of those, even, who had tamely submitted to their persecutors, retracted those ignominious confessions which the rack had extorted; and maintained their integrity in the midst of those flames, which the barbarous Philip had kindled for their destruction. Fifty-nine of these unhappy men were burnt alive at Paris, by a slow fire, and the same vindictive and inhuman spirit was exhibited in the other provinces of France, and in the other nations of Europe. The fortitude which, was every where displayed by these unfortunate sufferers, could have been inspired by innocence alone;

As Barruel, however, was unacquainted with the ceremonies of the Templars and Masons, he has attributed to both many absurd rites which probably never existed but in his own mind. For the same reason he has omitted many points of resemblance which would have established the common opinion upon an immovable foundation.

and it is a strong proof, that their minds were not so enervated by indolence, nor their bodies so enfeebled by luxury as has been generally believed. The only survivors which parted from their lips, were those which expressed their anguish and remorse, that they had betrayed, in the hour of pain, the interests of their order, and had confessed themselves guilty of crimes, unworthy of a Templar and a man.

THE MORALIST.

The following essay by Miss Mary E. Field, of Stockbridge Massachusetts, was read at the annual exhibition of the Albany Female Academy in July.

For the American Masonic Register and Literary Companion.

THE IMMORTALITY OF MENTAL INFLUENCE.

Time speeds onward in rapid never-weary flight. He pauses not, but bearing on his wing the seeds of death—the fair bright things of earth, wither as he passes. He hath levelled the forest's pride; he hath defaced the chiselling of the sepulchre; the ivy-wreathed tower hath fallen beneath his touch. He has paled the cheek, and dimmed the eye, and stilled the voice.—The warrior's arm is palsied now in death; the dancer's footstep long has ceased to echo in the festive hall; the minstrel's voice is hushed; the poet's laurels have withered on his icy brow; for the breath of the chill destroyer hath been upon them. The costly urn and the proud tomb, mark their long home. A few, fleeting years, and time hath left his impress here. The inscription that commemorated the virtues of the departed is effaced, and the stone totters that bore it.

Has earth no record that may outlive the sculptured marble? no monument for the illustrious dead, that may withstand the ravages of time? Look back on ages past. Where the proud dome; the consecrated pile that marks the resting place of Homer. Are temple-fanes his monument? or mighty cities, with their pillared halls? These would have been swept away long since; but his memory, is as fresh, as though he were of yesterday. Time dares not touch that light, which emanating from the throne of the Eternal, must, like him, exist forever. Mind is too hallowed for his touch, and it is midst that his glorious enduring name. When Homer sung, the fire of patriotism burned brighter, in the bosoms of his countrymen. Was war his theme; they saw the battle field; they heard the trumpet's voice—the clash of steel; they saw the arrow speeding on its death-winged flight; the life blood flowing fast, and then, the shout of victory rang in their ears. Their spirits were roused to action, and they thirsted for glory. No foe might then dare to attack their liberties. Peace, and the joys of home, were also celebrated in his majestic verse. Each listener, turned from the witching harmony, to gaze, with delight, upon the reality it had depicted, and felt that death alone, could deprive him of those blessings.—Now, as then, though long ages have elapsed—the thrilling chords, which that blind old bard rung out from the harp of poesy, have power to quicken the pulse, and to brighten the eye. He sung of Greece when in her glory; and what patriotic heart does not burn with a desire, that his own land may surpass that favored spot. He longs to see her, like Greece of old, the queen and mother of nations; himself, her Achilles. The influence of Homer's genius, must be immortal, for it has thrown a halo round his name that the lapse of ages has not been able to dim. He yet lived, while generations have passed away, unknown and unremembered.

Where is the resting place of Galileo? Amid domes and spires, and proud mausoleums to his memory? where the cypress mourns, and the yew throws its deep shade? Oh! seek ye not for his record, amid tombs, while the page of science glows with the impress of his intellect; while yet the glad jubilee is ringing for the emancipation of mind from its inglorious thralldom; while the astronomer holds converse with the stars in the silent watch of midnight. These are his trophies, and he needs no more.

What monument of proud antiquity has preserved the memory of Demosthenes so pure and unsullied by time? Is it not the lesson which he has taught the world; that difficulties, which seem insurmountable, maybe overcome by the power of exertion? How many an aspiring mind, has been encouraged by his example, to rise superior to circumstances! See the pale care worn student, as he bends over the page, on which is stamped that burning eloquence, which, centuries since, animated every heart that could feel its force, or appreciate its beauties. He feels himself inspired by its lofty tone, or sheds a tear over some sudden strain of feeling. The fixed intensity of gaze—the deep-drawn sigh; breathe forth a touching eulogy, to the departed orator. Then it is, that ambitious longings fill his breast. Is poverty his lot? misfortune his attendant? Demosthenes rose superior to the ills of fortune; and the remembrance cheers his path-way.

The intellect of Shakspeare has exerted a lasting influence upon dramatic poetry. So powerful was the change he effected, that he is often called its father; and well does he deserve the title. Before his day, the dancing buffoon, with his unmeaning trick and coarse jest, was the only occupant of the stage. Nature was the guiding genius of Shakspeare, and from her he has derived those sentiments, which find an echo in the bosom of every individual; who starts to hear what seemed his private thoughts, a public theme. But his portraits of life and manners do not require the aid of external circumstances, in their appeals to the heart. Drapery and colouring may add to the momentary effect; but his unstudied nature and beauty, is better appreciated in the lone wild-wood, with nature's orchestra, than amid a crowded audience, with the combined influence of painting and artificial music. To the inquiring mind, he constantly discloses some new idea, at every step, some new string is touched, of that delicately constituted instrument, the human heart. The characteristic grace and originality of his sentences, have caused them to be taken on the lips, until "those ideas, which thrilled the mighty mind that originated them," have passed into common maxims of life.

Already, may we predict the immortality of that influence, which the great men of our own land, have been called upon to exert. Who struck the harp of liberty, and woke its slumbering chords, to tones of such deep harmony that distant nations paused to catch the sound, and that tuned the hearts of all, to its own holy strain? The kindred names of Washington and Henry burst from every lip. Need they the waving banner, or the sculptured trophy, to preserve their memory? Their price was immortality, and posterity shall pay it.

THE LEGENDARY.

The following, which we copy from a London Magazine, of 1793, forcibly brings to mind the thrilling incident of the fight between the rival clans, so glowingly depicted in Scott's Valentine's Day, if we recollect right. It would appear, that Scott did not always draw his facts from his imagination:—

Combat between the MACPHERSONS and the DAVIDSONS. From the Transactions of the Antiquaries of Scotland.

In the year 1291, Macdonald, lord of the isles, and of part of the high-lands, sent his sister's son, Angus Macintosh, chief of the Macintoshes, to inform Dugal Dall Macgillie Chattan, chief of the clan Chattan, that the lord of the isles intended to do him the honor of a visit.

It was then expected, that when this haughty lord made a visit, the host was to make an offer of his own wife or daughter, according to the situation of his family as a companion for the night to his visitor. Macgillie Chattan knew that this barbarous mark of respect would be rigorously insisted upon: and having an only daughter, and desirous of shunning the disgraceful consequences of the visit, he contrived matters so, as to clap up a marriage between his daughter and Angus Macintosh, who had come as messenger from his uncle the lord of the isles, to announce the intended visit. By this match the estate and chieftainship of the clan Chattan was transferred to Macintosh, who let the greatest part of his new acquired estate to the Camerons. But the Camerons had scarcely got possession than they refused to pay the stipulated rent; and Macintosh, endeavoring to compel them, many severe con-licts happened between the two clans, of which the most remarkable was at Innernahoven, in Badenook. About the year 1296, Macintosh having received advice that the Camerons were assembling their numerous clan and dependents, to drive off his cattle, soon collected a superior force, consisting of several smaller clans, under the general name of clan Chattan. But, when the adverse hosts were in view of one another, an unseasonable difference arose between the Macphersons and Davidsons. Though both agreed that Macintosh should command the whole, Macpherson of Cluny, and Davidson of Innernahoven, contested for the next post of honor, each affirming that he was the eldest branch of the clan Chattan. This dispute being referred to Macintosh, he gave his decision in favor of Davidson, which Cluny resented so much, that he drew off his men, who stood by, idle spectators, while the Camerons overpowered the Macintoshes and Davidsons, a part of them being only saved by the coming on of night. Macintosh, taking advantage of the darkness, sent his own bard towards the camp of the Macphersons, but by a circuitous rout, as if he had come from the camp of the Camerons. There the bard, speaking as if in the person of a Cameron, often repeated the following sarcastic lines:

Tha luchd na failladh air an tom,
'San bolg-shuileach donn na dhraip:
Cha ba bbur cairdeas ruin a bhann,
Ach ba bbur lamhan a bhi tais.

The meaning of this is the false party are on the hillocks, and the man with the big brown eyes (by this expression was marked out Macintosh) in distress: it was not out of friendship to us, but merely your own cowardice. The reproach nettled Macpherson so much, that he called up his men, and, attacking the Camerons that same night, when he was least expected made a great slaughter, pursued them far, and killed their chief Charles Macalonnair, at a hollow place in the hills; which, in memory of that has been ever since known by the name of Coire Thearlaich, i. e. Charles's Caldron.

Though the above conflict terminated the dispute with the Camerons, there arose another between the Macphersons and Davidsons, that filled that part of the highlands with numberless disorders for an hundred years; so that King Robert III. found it necessary to send the Earls Crawford and Dunbar, two of the principal noblemen in Scotland, with an armed force to reconcile or subdue them. This was a difficult, and to reconcile them impossible, brought them at last to submit to the only terms suited to their own distempered dispositions. These terms were, that their future superiority should be determined by the event of a combat of thirty on a each side. They were to fight in presence of the king, with only their broad-swords, on the north inch of Perth.

When the appointed day arrived, the Macphersons wanted one of their number. It was proposed to balance the difference by withdrawing one of the Davidsons; but these were so earnest for a share of the honor of the day that none of them would consent to be the man left out. In this perplexity, one Henry Wynd, a sword-cutler, commonly called An Gobheron, i. e. the Stopping Smith, offered to supply the place of the absent man for a French crown of gold, about seven shillings and sixpence sterling. This point being settled, the combat began with all the fury of enraged enemies; and Henry Wynd contributed much in making victory declare for the Macphersons; of this side, however, besides himself, there survived only ten, and these all grievously wounded. Of the Davidsons, twenty-nine were killed, and only one of them being unhurt, jumped into the Tay, swam across the river, and so escaped. Henry Wynd went home with the Macphersons, and was received as one of their clan.—His descendants are called Sliochd a Ghobheruim, i. e. the Race of the Stopping Smith. Smith of Balhary's motto, Caraid ann am Feum; a friend in Time of Need, seems to allude to this piece of history.

It seems proper here to take notice of two mistakes usual to those who relate the above incident.—First, Henry Wynd is usually said to have been a squire; but the appellation of the Stopping Smith, still continued to his posterity, sufficiently proves what was his occupation. Secondly, What is here said to have been done by the Davidsons, is commonly attributed to the Mackays.

CHRISTIAN WOLF.

'Whom have we here?' said the apparition.
'Such another as yourself,' was my answer—that is, if your looks don't belie you.'

'There is no passage this way. Whom seek ye here.'

'By what right do you ask?' returned I boldly. The man considered me leisurely twice, from the feet up to the head. It seemed as if he were comparing my figure with his own, and my answer with my figure—

'You speak as stoutly as a beggar,' said he at last.

'That may be—I was one yesterday.'

'The man smiled—'One would swear,' cried he, 'you were not much better than one to-day.'

'Something worse, friend. I must on.'

'Softly, friend. What hurries you? Is your time so very precious?'

'I considered myself for a moment. I know not how the words came to the tip of my tongue. "Life is short," said I, at last, "and hell is eternal."

'He looked steadily upon me. "May I be d—d," said he, if you have not rubbed shoulders with the gallows ere now.

'It may be so. Farewell, till we meet again, comrade.'

'Stop, comrade, shouted the man: He pulled a tin flask from his pouch, took a hearty pull of it, and handed it to me. My flight and my anguish had exhausted my strength, and all this day nothing had passed my lips. Already I was afraid I might faint in the wilderness, for there was no place of refreshment within many miles of me. Judge how gladly I accepted his offer. New strength rushed with the liquor into my limbs—with that, fresh courage into my heart, and hope and love of life. I began to believe that I might not be for ever wretched, such power was in the welcome draught. There was something pleasant in finding myself with a creature of my own stamp. In the state in which I was, I would have pledged a devil, that I might once more have a companion.

'The man stretched himself on the ground, and I did the same. "I did the same," said I, "we must get better acquainted."

'He struck his flint, and lighted his pipe. "Are you old in the trade?" said I.

'He looked sternly at me—"What would you say, friend?"—"Has that often bloody?" said I, pointing to the knife in his girdle.

'Who art thou?' cried he fiercely, and threw down his pipe. "A murderer, friend, like yourself—but only a beginner." He took up his pipe again.

'Your home is not hereabouts?' said he, after a pause.

'Some three miles off,' said I; did you ever hear of the landlord of the Sun at Bielsdorf?

'The man sprang up like one possessed—"What, the poacher Wolf?" cried he hastily.

'The same.'

'Welcome! comrade, welcome! and give me a shake of thy hand: this is good, mine host of the Sun. Year and day have I sought for thee. I know thee well. I know all. I have long reckoned upon thee Wolf.'

'Reckoned on me? and wherefore.'

'The whole country is full of you, man; you have had enemies, Wolf; you have been hardly dealt with. You have been made a sacrifice. Your treatment has been shameful.'

'The man waxed warm—"What! because you shot a pair of boars or stags it may be, that the prince feeds here on our acorns: was that a reason for chasing you from house and hold, confining you three years in the castle, and making a beggar of you. Is it come to this that a man is of less worth than a hare? Are we no better than the beasts of the field, brother? and can Wolf endure it? I can't."

'Who can alter these things?'

'That we shall presently see: but tell me, whence come you, and what are you about?'

'I told him my whole story. He would not hear me to the end, but leaped up, and dragged me along with him. "Come, mine host of the Sun," said he, "now you are ripe, now I have you. I shall look for honour from you, Wolf! follow me."

'Whither will you lead me?'

'Ask no questions. Follow.' And he pulled me like a giant.'

'We had advanced some quarter of a mile. The road was becoming every step more thick, wild, and impassable. Neither of us spake a word. I was roused from my reverie by the whistle of my guide. I looked up, and perceived that we were standing on the edge of a rock, which hung over a deep dark ravine. A second whistle answered from the foot of the precipice, and a ladder rose, as if of its own motion from below. My guide stepped upon it, and desired me to await his return. "I must first tie up the hounds," said he; "you are a stranger here, and the beasts would tear you in pieces."

'Then I was alone upon the rock, and I well knew that I was alone. The carelessness of my guide did not escape my attention. With a single touch of my hand I could pull up the ladder, and my flight was secured. I confess that I saw this—I began to shudder at the precipice below me, and to think of that depth from which there is no redemption. I resolved upon flight—I put my hand to the ladder, but then came that to my ear, as if with the laughter of devils, "What can a murderer do?" and my arm dropt powerless by my side. My reckoning was complete. Murder lay like a rock behind me, and barred all retreat for ever. At this moment my guide re-appeared and bade me come down. I had no longer any choice—I obeyed him.

'A few yards from the foot of the precipice the ground widened a little, and some huts became visible. In the midst of these there was a little piece of smooth turf, and there about eighteen or twenty figures lay scattered around a coal fire. Here comrades, cried my guide, leading me into the centre of the group; "here get up and bid the landlord welcome."

'Welcome, good landlord,' cried all at once, and crowded around me, men and women. Shall I confess it? Their joy appeared hearty and honest; confidence and respect was in every countenance; one took me by the hand, another by the cloak;—my reception was such as might have been expected by some old and valued friend. Our arrival had interrupted their repast—we joined it, and I was called to pledge my new friends in a bumper. The meal consisted of game of all kinds; and the bottle, filled with good Rhenish, was not allowed to rest for an instant. The company seemed to be full of affection towards each other, and of good will towards me.

'They had made me sit down between two women, and this seemed to be considered as a place of honour. I expected to find these the refuse of their sex, but, how great was my astonishment, when I perceived, under their coarse garments, two of the most beautiful females I had ever seen. Margaret, the elder and handsomer of the two, was addressed by the name of Miss, and might be five-and-twenty. Her language was free, and her looks were still more eloquent.—Mary, the younger, was married, but her husband had treated her cruelly and deserted her. Her features were perhaps prettier, but she was pale and thin, and less striking, on the whole, than her fiery neighbour. They both endeavored to please me. Margaret was the beauty, but my heart was more taken with the womanly, gentle Mary.

'Brother Wolf,' cried my guide, "you see how we live here; with us every day is alike; is it not so comrades?'

'Every day is like the present," cried they all.

'If you like our way of life,' continued the man, "strike in, be one of us: be our captain. I bear the dignity for the present, but I will yield it to Wolf.—Say I right, comrades?"—A hearty 'Yes yes,' was the answer.

'My brain was on fire, wine and passion had inflamed my blood. The world had thrown me out like a leper—here were brotherly welcome, good cheer, and honour. Whatever choice I might make, I knew that death was before me; but here at least I might sell my life dearly. Women had till now spurned me,—the smiles of Mary were new to my soul. "I remain with you, comrades," cried I, loudly and firmly, stepping into the midst of the band—I remain with you, my good friends, providing you give me my pretty neighbour. They all consented to gratify my wish, and I sat down contented, lord of a courtesan and captain of a banditti.

The following part of the history I shall entirely omit, for there is no instruction in that which is purely disgusting. The unhappy Wolf, sunk to this hopeless depth, was obliged to partake in all the routine of wickedness; but he was never guilty of a second murder; so at least he swore solemnly when upon the scaffold.

The fame of this man, spread in a short time, through the whole province. The highways were unsafe—nocturnal robberies alarmed the citizens—the name of Christian Wolf became the terror of the old and young—justices set every device at work to ensnare him—and a premium was set upon his head.—Yet he was fortunate enough to escape every attempt against his person, and crafty enough to convert the superstition of the peasantry into an engine of defence. It was universally given out that Wolf was in league with the devil—that his whole band were wizards. The province is a remote and ignorant one, and no man was very willing to come to close quarters with the ally of the apostate.

For a full year did Wolf persist in this terrible trade, but at last it began to be intolerable to him. The men at whose head he had placed himself, were not what he had supposed. They had received him at first with an exterior of profusion, but he soon discovered that they had deceived him. Hunger and want appeared in the room of abundance; he was often obliged to venture his life for a booty, which, when won, was scarcely sufficient to support his existence for a single day.—The veil of brotherly affection also passed away, and beneath it he found the lurking paltriness of thieves and harpies. A large reward had been proclaimed for him that should deliver Wolf alive into the hands of justice—if the discoverer should be one of his own gang, a free pardon was promised in addition—a mighty search for the outcast of the earth!—Wolf was sensible of his danger. The honor of those who were at war with God and man seemed but an insufficient security for his life. From this time sleep was agony; wherever he was, the ghost of suspicion haunted him—pursued his steps—watched his pillow—disturbed his dreams. Long silenced conscience again raised her voice, and slumbering remorse began to awake and mingle her errors in the universal storm of his life. His whole nature, was turned from mankind, and concentrated upon his own head. He forgave all nature, and was inexorable only to himself.

This misery of guilt completed his education, and delivered at last his naturally excellent understanding from its shackles. He now felt how low he had fallen; sadness took the place of phrenzy in his bosom. Cold tears, solitary sighs obliterated the past; for him it no more existed. He began to hope that he might yet be a good man, for he felt within himself the awakening power of being such. It may be that Wolf, at this the moment of his greatest degradation, was nearer the right path than he had ever been since he first quitted it.

About this time the seven years' war broke out, and the German Princes were every where making great levies of troops. The unhappy Wolf shaped some slight hope to himself from these circumstances, and at last took courage to pen the following letter to his sovereign.

'If it be not too much for princely compassion to descend to such as Christian Wolf, give him a hearing. I am a thief and a murderer—the laws condemn me to death—justice has set all her myrmidons in search of me—I beg that I may be permitted to deliver up myself. But I bring, at the same time, a strange petition to the throne. I hate my life, I fear not death, but I cannot bear to die without having lived. I would live, my prince, in order to atone, by my services, for my offences. My execution might be an example to the world, but not an equivalent for my deeds. I hate the wretchedness of guilt. I thirst after virtue. I have shewn my power to do evil permit me to shew my power to do good.

'I know that I make an unheard-of request. My life is forfeit; it may seem absurd for me to state any pretensions to favour. But I appear not in chains and bonds before you—I am still free—and fear is the least among all the motives which induces this petition.

'It is to mercy that I have fled. I have no claim upon justice—if I had I should disdain to bring it forward. Yet of one circumstance I might remind my judges—the period of my outrages commenced with that of my degradation. Had their sentence been less severe, perhaps I should have had no occasion to be a supplicant to day.

'If you give me life, it shall be dedicated to your service. A single word in the gazette shall bring me immediately to your feet. If otherwise you have determined—let justice do her part I must do mine.'

CHRISTIAN WOLF.

This petition remained without an answer; so did a second and third, in which Wolf begged to be permitted to serve as a hussar in the army of the prince. At last, losing all hope of a pardon, he resolved to fly from the country, and die a brave soldier in the service of King Frederick.

He gave his companions the slip, and took to his journey. The first day brought him to a small country town, where he resolved to spend the night.

The circumstances of the times, the commencing war, the recruiting, made the officers at every post doubly vigilant in observing travellers. The gate-keeper of the town had received a particular command to be attentive. The appearance of Wolf had something imposing but, at the same time, swarthy terrible, and savage. The meagre bony horse he rode, and the grotesque and scanty arrangement of his apparel, formed a strange contrast with a countenance whereon a thousand fierce passions seemed to lie exhausted and concealed, like the dying and dead upon a field of battle. The gate-keeper started at the strange apparition. Forty years of experience had made the man, grown grey in his office, as sharp-sighted as an eagle in detecting offenders. He immediately bolted his gate and demanded the passport of Wolf. The fugitive was however prepared for this accident; and he drew out, without hesitation, a pass which he had taken a few days before from a plundered merchant. Still this solitary evidence was not able entirely to satisfy the scruples of the practised officer. The gate-keeper trusted his own eyes rather than the paper and Wolf was compelled to follow him to the town house.

The chief magistrate of the place examined the pass, and declared it to be in every respect what it should be. It happened that this man was a great politician,—his chief pleasure in life consisted in canning over a newspaper, with a bottle of wine before him. The passport shewed forth that its bearer had come from the very centre of the seat of war. He hoped to draw some private intelligence from the stranger; and the clerk, who brought back the pass, requested Wolf to step in, and take a bottle of Mark-brunner with his master.

Meantime the traveller had remained on horseback at the door of the town-house, and his singular appearance had collected about him half the rabble of the place. They looked at the horse and his rider by turns,—they laughed,—they whispered,—at last it had become a perfect tumult. Unfortunately the animal Wolf rode on was a stolen one, and he immediately began to fancy that it was described in some of the prints. The unexpected invitation of the magistrate completed his confusion. He took it for granted that the reality of his pass had been detected, and that the invitation was only a trick for getting hold of him alive. A bad conscience stupified his faculties—he clapped spurs to his horse, and galloped off without making any answer to the clerk.

The sudden flight convinced all that had before suspected him. 'A thief, a robber,' was the cry, and the whole mob were at his heels. Wolf rode for life and death, and he soon left his pursuers breathless behind.—His deliverance is near; but a heavy hand was upon him—the hour was come—unrelenting destiny was there.

The road he had taken led to no outlet, and Wolf was obliged to turn round upon his pursuer.

The alarm of this incident had, in the mean time, set the whole town into an uproar; every road was blocked, and a whole host of enemies came forth to receive him. He draws out a pistol; the crowd yields; he begins to make a way for himself through their ranks.

'The first that lays a finger on me—dies,' shouted Wolf, holding out his pistol. Fear produced an universal pause. But a firm old soldier seized him from behind, and mastered the hand which held the weapon. He knocks the pistol from his grasp; the disarmed Wolf is instantly dragged from his horse, and borne in triumph back to the town house.

'Who are you?' said the magistrate, in a stern and brutal tone.

'One who is resolved to answer no questions, unless they be more civilly put.'

'Who are you, sir?'

'What I said I was. I have travelled through all of Germany, and never found oppression, till now.'

'Your sudden flight excites suspicion against you. Why fled you?'

'Because I was weary of being mocked by your rabble.'

'You threatened to fire?'

'My pistol was not loaded.' They examined it and found no ball.

'Why do you carry such weapons?'

'Because I have property with me, and I have heard a great deal of one Wolf that haunts in the woods here.'

'Your answers prove your courage, but not your honesty, friend. I allow you till morning. Perhaps you will then speak the truth.'

'I have already said all.'

'Take him to the tower.'

'To the tower?—I beg you would consider, sir.—There is justice in the country, and I will demand satisfaction at your hands.'

'I shall give you satisfaction, friend, so soon as you find justice on your side.'

Next morning the magistrate began to suspect that, after all, the stranger might be an honest man, and that high words might have no effect in making him alter his tone. He was half inclined to think that the best way might be to let him go. He called together the councillors, however, and sent for the prisoner.

'I hope you will forgive us, if we dealt somewhat harshly with you yesterday evening.'

'Most willingly, since you ask me to do so.'

'Our rules are strict, and your conduct gave rise to suspicion. I cannot set you free without departing from my duty. Appearances are against you. I wish you would say something, which might satisfy us of your good character.'

'And if I should say nothing?'

'Then I must send your passport to Munich, and you must remain here till it returns.'

Wolf was silent for a few minutes, and appeared to be much agitated; he then stepped close up to the magistrate.

'Can I be a quarter of an hour alone with you?'

The councillors looked doubtfully at each other, but the magistrate motioned to them, and they withdrew.

'Now what will you?'

'Your conduct yesterday evening, sir, could never have brought me to your terms, for I despise violence. The manner in which you treat me to-day has filled me with respect for your character. I believe you to be an honorable man.'

'What have you to say to me?'

'I see you are an honorable man. I have long wished to meet with such a man. Will you give me your right hand?'

'What will you, stranger?'

'Your head is gray and venerable. You have been long in the world—you have had sorrows too—Is it not so?—and they have made you more merciful?'

'Sir, what mean you?'

'You are near to eternity—yourself will soon have need of compassion from God. You will not deny it to man. Am I not right? To whom do you suppose yourself to be speaking?'

'What is this?—you alarm me.'

'Do you not guess the truth?—Write to your prince how you found me, and that I have been my own betrayer. May God's mercy to him be such as his shall be to me. Entreat for me, old man—weep for me—my name is WOLF.'

THE AGE.

DECLINE AND FALL OF THE CITY OF DOGTOWN.

BY TIMOTHY TITTERWELL, ESQ.

Dogtown is a beautiful place in the interior of this State. There is plenty of land around it, so that nothing can hinder it from growing in every direction, and thus becoming a great city. In fact, Dogtown has already a one-story church, part of a schoolhouse, and an elegant pound. Nobody can see Dogtown without being reminded of that celebrated town in France, named Grandville, of which we have the following description:

Grandville, grand vilain,
Une église et un moulin
Voilà Grandville tout a plain,

Which we may translate thus:

Grandville, great Grandville
Has a meetinghouse and mill,
Nothing else in all Grandville.

Dogtown is finely and advantageously situated. It stands on Eel River, a stream of water which runs into another stream, and that into a third, which runs into Connecticut River, which running into Long Island Sound, finally reaches the Atlantic; who does not see, therefore, that Dogtown may become a great seaport? The territory in the neighborhood of Dogtown is remarkable for its fertility, bating that part of it which is covered with rocks, the salt meadow, the pine woods, the clay-ponds and the swamps. It is past a doubt, therefore, that the territory, if well cleared, drained, people and cultivated, would become a perfect garden, abounding with the richest productions of nature, and affording a mine of wealth to the country. As to the facilities of communication with the great Atlantic cities and commercial marts, they are admirable. Dogtown has Boston on one side and New York on the other. Montreal and Quebec are in the north, while in the east is the rich and thriving State of Maine, with Bangor and Owl's Head to boot. Railroads can be made to connect Dogtown with all these places, and they will certainly form such a connection, when they are built. That the place will be a great focus of trade when this is done, nobody I think will deny. The neighborhood of Dogtown has all the advantages that can be desired in a young country.—There will be as many large towns within thirty miles of the place, as people choose to build. The population cannot fail to increase rapidly, for a man can get married for seventy-five cents, town clerk's fees included. The attraction for settlers must therefore be considered very great. The Dogtowners are remarkably industrious, for they get a living, although constantly grumbling of hard times. They are moreover ingenious, for they manufacture axe handles, wooden bowls, birch brooms, and white oak cheese, and invent mouse traps and washing machines. Last of all, the inhabitants of Dogtown are literary and intellectual, for they talk a great deal of the march of improvement, and the minister and the lawyer take the Penny Magazine between them.

All these attractions together, form a combination truly wonderful. But the reader will be astonished when I inform him that the inhabitants of this favored spot lived a great many years without the smallest suspicion of what I have here described. They tho't very little of themselves or of the town they lived in, and continued to vegetate from year to year without imagining they were better off than other folks. In fact, the world might have continued to this day in utter ignorance that Dogtown was such a wonderful place, but for an accident: an accident I call it, for the Dogtowners having lived for so many years without opening their eyes, the fact that they did open them of a sudden, on a certain day in the year of grace, 1834, must be considered purely accidental. Some people are inclined to ascribe it to the approach of the comet, which had a powerful influence in opening people's eyes—to say nothing of its effect in driving them stark mad. But that is neither here nor there. The people of Dogtown opened their eyes and saw: that was enough, they saw in an instant their immense advantages, and were astonished that they never had seen them before. They saw their advantages. I say, and were determined to turn them to account.

Straightway Dogtown was all alive; every body was confident that Dogtown must become a great place; and as every body told every body else so, there was no doubt about the matter. Every man went to buying land who could pay for it; and those who could not pay, bought upon credit, sure of selling it at ten times the cost within the year. Nothing was talked of but the immense advantages of the place. The riches of Dogtown were indeed immense, and how they could have been overlooked so long, was a mystery that no one could understand.

The land within the limits of the town was computed at 720,000,000 square feet, which at one cent per foot is cheap enough in all conscience, would amount to 7,200,000,000 dollars. What a sum! But this was not all. Half of this land was covered with trees at the rate of one tree every five feet square, or quadrangle of twenty-five feet: this gave a computation of 10,400,000 trees; and as each tree on an average contained seventy-five cubic feet of timber, it followed that there was actually within the town 780,000,000 feet of timber, worth on the lowest calculation five cts. per foot, which would amount to $39,000,000. This, added to the value of the land as above, made a grand total of forty-six millions two hundred thousand dollars!

The mention of these sums almost drove the good people of Dogtown distracted with joy; they could hardly believe their eyes or ears, but there it was in black and white; figures could not lie. They were amazed to think of their own stupidity and that of their ancestors in letting forty-six millions two hundred dollars lie totally idle and unproductive; but they were determined not to allow their wealth to be neglected any longer. A grand scheme of speculation and improvement was started, and all rushed headlong into it. Every man in Dogtown was now rich, or, what was the same thing, was sure of being so before long. Immense tracts were laid out in building lots, and speculators flocked in from all quarters; from Catsville and Weazletown and Buzzardsborough, and Ganderfield and Crow Corner and Upper Bugbury and Punkinton, and Black Swamp and the Bottomless Bogs. Such a busy time as the Dogtowners had of it. Nothing was talked of but buying land, building houses laying out roads, streets, squares, avenues, rail roads, canals, &c. &c. People left off ploughing and hoeing, because agriculture was too slow a method of making money; for who would think of raising turnips to sell, at twenty cents a bushel, when he could make a hundred times the profit by speculating in land?

First of all, it was determined that Dogtown should be a city. The want of population was found to be a serious obstacle here; the constitution of the state requires ten or twelve thousand inhabitants for a city; and as Dogtown, including the suburbs of Puppyville and Skunk's Misery, contained a population of only six hundred and thirty-one, it was thought there might be some difficulty in getting a charter without anticipating the returns of the next census. However, a city it must be, sometime or other, in this all were agreed, and it might as well have the name first as last; so they concluded to call it a city. It is astonishing what a spirit of enterprise these prospects infused into the people of Dogtown. The schoolhouse door was painted green, uncle Joe Stubbins mended the top of his chimney, and it was voted in town-meeting to purchase three wheelbarrows for the public use; and all in consequence of these projected improvements.—Nay, so widely did their views of business expand, that Amiadab Figgins, the grocer, determined to give up retailing, and declared he wouldn't split crackers nor cut candles any longer.

Such was the thriving condition of the city of Dogtown when I left the place in the autumn of that year. I continued to hear of it through the medium of the Dogtown Daily Advertiser a newspaper established there by an enterprising printer from Connecticut at the first drawing of the commercial prosperity of the city.—It appeared to go ahead rapidly. The newspaperspoke of the Exchange, the town Hall, the bank, the new post office, the rail road, canal, &c. House lots were advertised in Washington Square, Merchant's Row, State street, &c. Contracts were proposed for building churches, manufactories, &c. This was Dogtown in all its glory.

Last August I determined to make a visit to this celebrated place in order to feast my eyes with the splendor of a city that had sprung up as it were by enchantment.

When I reached the foot of Blueberry Hill, which overlooks the whole place, I walked eagerly to the top, in order to catch a view, at a single glance, of the city, in all its magnificence. To my utter astonishment, instead of spires and domes, I saw nothing but Deacon Stumpy's old mansion, with five other ragged and dingy looking edifices, which stood exactly where I had always known them. I entered the city through State street, but discovered nothing new except a small house without a chimney. Not a living thing was to be seen in Washington Square, but three geese, who were lazily picking a mouthful of grass among the mud-puddles. I inquired for the Exchange, and found it in use by the Deacon as a cow-pen. The new church, however, I was told had actually proceeded as far as the raising of the timbers; but it was subsequently sold by auction to pay for digging the cellar.

I had a check upon the Dogtown Bank for three dollars, and wishing to draw the money, I was directed to No. 19. Tremont street. This turned out to be the identical building formerly occupied by old Kit Cobble, the shoemaker. It was bank hours, but the bank was shut, and there was not a soul to be seen. Just as I was going away, I spied a tin horn hanging by the door, with a paper over it, on which was written, "Persons having business at the bank, are requested to blow the horn." I put the horn to my lips and blew a blast both long and loud. After waiting about ten minutes, I spied Isaac Thumper coming slowly down the road: he proved to be the cashier of the Dogtown Bank, and after some difficulty I convinced him of the safety of cashing the check.

Upon inquiring of Isaac what use had been made of the forty-six millions two hundred thousand dollars, he informed me that most of it remained in notes of hand. Money was scarce, and was expected to continue so until the onion crop had been got in. It was easy to see that the city had sadly declined from its meridian splendor. In fact, Dogtown has suffered a complete downfall, for hardly anybody now speaks of it as a city.—They have as much land as ever, and so long as it continued to be valued at their own price, they were as rich as Jews; but, unfortunately, it fell in value the moment they expected the purchasers to pay for it.—The Dogtowners are poor enough at present, but they are not the first, and probably will not be the last people who have ruined themselves by building a city on speculation.

MISCELLANY.

DON CARLOS.

[A correspondent of the Evening Star furnishes the following interesting particulars of the life of Don Carlos, the Spanish usurper.]

As the history of royalty has been, within the memory of the men around us, in great reverses and misfortunes, seldom has it a more constant tale of sorrow to relate than in the instance of Don Carlos. When his father and his brother, (the late Ferdinand VII.) were taken prisoners by Napoleon, he accompanied them into captivity. In this condition he remained for some years. His brother became king, and Don Carlos was viewed with suspicion by that selfish, sensual, bigoted brute. Ferdinand altered the line of succession, against Don Carlos, by a decree which abrogated the Salique law. On his death Don Carlos treating the decree as illegal, (and it looks very like it, for the monarch's simple decree never could abrogate a law in Spain,) took up arms. He was beaten, and in May, 1834, sought and obtained a hospitable asylum in England. The good natured king, William IV., offered him royal honors, but he declined them. If his scheme was to draw public attention from him, it was admirable. He landed at Portsmouth, (where he buried his wife as "Queen of Spain,") and he had been a very short time in England ere he was waited upon by one of Zumalacarregui's agents, with whom he arranged a plan for immediately returning to Spain.

Early in July, 1835, Don Carlos secretly quitted Gloucester Lodge, Brompton, where Canning had lived, and escaping by the garden gate, went into a hackney coach, and drove to London. Here he was received by some of his adherents, and underwent the operation of having his grey hairs dyed brown. This was performed for him by a lady, who could not help weeping. He asked why she wept, and the lady said it was because of the dangers he was about to undergo. "Fear not," said he "I have a presentiment of success. My enemies have never known my true character, and the very daring of the exploit will baffle and dismay them!" At midnight he quitted London, posted to Brighton, sailed to Dieppe, passed on to Paris, and put up at Meurice's Hotel. He dined with M. Jauge, the banker, and then went to the opera to see Robert le Diable. In a day or two he quitted Paris for Bordeaux, and passed Louis Philippe on the road, but was not recognized, for his dyed hair had much changed his appearance, and he had also shaven off his moustachios. "I am going," said he to his companion, "to destroy the Quadruple Treaty with my sword. What would Louis Philippe give to arrest my progress?"

What has happened since, we all know. The wonder is how he could, during five years, have held out. He might have done so for as many years more, if Marotto had not betrayed him. I suppose that, after all, he will come back to England, but he may give more trouble to the Christino party. Even now, a fugitive and almost a prisoner, he claims to be king de jure. What will be the end?

EDUCATION OF THE PEOPLE.

It has been observed, that if the French had been an educated people many of the atrocities of their revolution would never have happened, and I believe it.—Furious mobs are composed, not of enlightened men—of men in whom the passions are dominant over the judgment, because the judgment has not been exercised, and informed, and habituated to direct the conduct. A factious declaimer can much less easily influence a number of men who acquired at school the rudiments of knowledge, and who have subsequently devoted their leisure to a mechanics' institute, than a multitude who cannot read or write, and who have never practised reasoning or considerate thought. And as the education of a people prevents political evil, it effects political good. Despotism well know that knowledge is inimical to their power.

ODDS AND ENDS.

CONVENIENT CRITICISM.—Sheridan had a very convenient formula as a reply to the new publications that were constantly sent to him, viz: "Dear sir, I have received your exquisite work, and I have no doubt I shall be highly delighted after I have read it."

There are many pumps in the vicinity of this city possessing the surprising power of converting one quart of milk into three pints, and some of them will make half a gallon of one quart!

Thomas Jefferson said truly:—"Bankers receive a profit on what they owe, from those to whom they owe, and for a thing containing within itself, no intrinsic value."

"What is the cause of the present pecuniary embarrassments?" This question was put to a shrewd old merchant a short time since, who answered, "The right owners are calling for their money." That's about it.

Could a man in the height of passion, see himself, he would want no other motive to govern his temper.

A loafer lingering about a bar-room was finally asked by a slight acquaintance to drink. Affecting to be indifferent to the invitation, he asked "what is the lightest drink?" "That which you don't pay for," said the bar-keeper.

Perhaps there is no phrase in common use more trite and unmeaning than that of "How do you do, sir!" as applied by persons meeting in the streets, or by those who are introduced to each other. If this mode of salutation were altered to, "Health and happiness to you, sir," it would not be without meaning, and would generally express the sincere wish of heart; for no man desires the unhappiness of a fellow-creature, unless he be his inveterate enemy.

Zeno, the philosopher, believed in an inevitable destiny. His servant availed himself of his doctrine, one day, while being beaten for a theft by exclaiming, "was I not destined to rob?" "Yes" replied Zeno, "and to be corrected also."

AMERICAN MASONIC REGISTER.

ALBANY, SATURDAY, DEC. 21, 1839.

Those Brethren who subscribed the prospectus for the Masonic Register, by me circulated, and who have not paid for the same to me, or Br. Mix, will oblige me much by sending the same to Br. L. G. Hoffman, by mail. The Post Masters, are authorised to send such money free of postage.

BLANCHARD POWERS.

Bennington, Nov. 19, 1839.

MASONRY IN KENTUCKY.—We have been favored with the proceedings of the Grand Lodge of Kentucky, from which we make such extracts as will be of interest to the brethren in this section of country.—We are not apprised of the state of Masonry in this State in years gone by, but if we are to judge of the past by the present flourishing condition of things in that State, Masonry has suffered nothing from the mildew and moral pestilence which has swept every thing before its baneful influence, in our own State, except the ancient landmarks of the Order.

The Subordinate Lodges report two hundred and eleven initiations during the year, and the Grand Treasurer, in his annual report acknowledges $15,252.65, in his hands.

During the setting of the Grand Lodge, it was resolved to erect a Grand Masonic Hall in the city of Lexington, for the use of the Grand and Subordinate Lodges, and $15000 was appropriated for that purpose.

The plan proposes a building with a basement story, and two stories of fourteen feet each upon it—the whole building to be sixty-five by forty-five feet in size, with a suitable number of windows, doors, flues, &c. to be of brick, and strongly built—on the first floor are arranged suitable rooms for the accommodation of two Lodges; besides a room for depositing the records and other property of the Grand Lodge, or for receiving strangers. On the second floor is the Grand Hall, 45 by 42 feet in size, for the use of the Grand Lodge, with a committee room, the rooms below being also to be applied to the same purpose whenever needed, the same rooms being also suitable for the accommodation of the Grand Chapter or subordinate Chapters, should they desire to hold their meetings as heretofore, in connexion with the Grand Lodge.

The Committee on foreign communications in their report, say. "That it is deemed a matter of great utility to the order, that the interchange of communication with all the regular Grand Lodges in the Union, should be placed on a permanent footing, by the best means in the power of this Grand Lodge. It inculcates the principles of harmony and brotherly love, which ought ever to characterize the order in its internal organization."

The following Grand Officers were duly elected for the ensuing year:—

M. W. George Breckenridge, G. M.
R. W. Thomas C. Orrear, D. G. M.
W. Abner Cunningham, S. G. W.
W. Thomas J. Welby, J. G. W.
M. R. Caleb W. Cloud, G. C.
Edmund F. Vawter, G. O.
Philip Swigert, G. Sec'y
William Brown, jr. G. Treas.
Augustus D. Ehrich, G. S. & T.

INSTALLATION.—A public Installation of Phoenix Lodge, at Lansingburg, will take place on Friday evening, the 27th inst. The Brethren of Albany, Troy, and their vicinities, are invited to attend. Br. Eddy, of Apollo Lodge, Troy, is expected to pronounce an Address on this occasion, which from the preparation, promises to be solemn and interesting.—While noticing this subject, we would again remind Secretaries and others that we shall at all times be happy to publish the returns of elections, the proceedings at anniversaries, installations, or other masonic intelligence. We hope they will not be remiss on this subject. The tendency will be happy. One spirited Lodge can infuse life in a dozen dead ones.

At the annual meeting of Mount Vernon Lodge No. 3, held at St. John's Hall, on Thursday evening the 19th, the following brethren were duly elected officers for the ensuing year.

Lewis G. Hoffman, W. M.
William Connelly, S. W.
George S. Gibbons, J. W.
John Hurdis, Sec'y.
Alexander Gray, Treasurer.
Richard Parr, S. D.
James K. Halliday, J. D.
Abraham Siskles, Tyler.
John Pochin, }
A. L. Lawrence, } Stewards.

At the annual meeting of Temple Lodge, No. 53, held at St. John's Hall, on Tuesday evening Dec. 17 5839—the following brethren were elected officers for the ensuing year, viz:

Argalus W. Starks, W. M.
John W. H. Canoll, S. W.
William Ferguson, J. W.
William Voorhees, Treasurer.
Levi Ewing, Secretary.
Peter G. Sharpe, S. D.
Isaac F. Fletcher, J. D.
Abraham Siskles, Tyler.
James Radliff, }
S. V. R. Ableman, } Stewards.

THE EXPENSE OF WAR.—We are assured, by those who profess to understand the matter, that the late Helderbergh war, will cost the state and county together, upwards of $50,000. This is paying for the whistle at a round rate. The Sun says, that an attempt will be made to prevent the law-breaking law makers, who were elected to the legislature, from taking their seats. We hope it will be so. Every good citizen should unite in effecting it.

* * Will our friends, at their several communications, on the 27th, endeavour to extend the circulation of the Register.

The essay of Miss Field, late of the Albany Academy on the "Immortality of Mental Influence," received the premium, at that institution. Its style is pure and classical, and as a composition, is decidedly the best we have published, "Triptolmous Tindall, Esqrs." "Frvolitities," to the contrary notwithstanding.

The "Decline and Fall of the City of Dogtown," which will be found, on another page, should have been credited to an amusing little volume, entitled "Yankee Notions." It is a fair hit at the land speculations of 1834—when "Dogtown" cities were as plenty as their inhabitants—bullfrogs, alligators, and land sharks.

One of our Subscribers in Kingston U. Canada, to whom we sent twelve back numbers of the Register, says that he was compelled to pay forty-five cents, postage on them. This is wrong, and is not justified, by the regulations understood to exist between the Canadian and American post office, which is one or one and half cents a paper. The fact whether a subscriber is receiving his paper weekly, or the 52 at one time, neither adds nor diminishes. The post master at Kingston, will undoubtedly correct the mistake.

MARRIED.

POETRY.

FIRST GRIEF.

[BY JAMES HEDDERWICK]

They tell me, first and early love
Out lives all after-dreams;
But the memory of a first great grief
To me more lasting seems;
The grief that marks our dawning youth
To memory ever clings,
And o'er the path of future years
A lengthen'd shadow flings.

Oh, oft my mind recalls the hour,
When to my father's home
Death came—an uninvited guest—
From his dwelling in the tomb!
I had not seen his face before—
I shudder'd at the sight;
And I shudder still to think upon
The anguish of that night!

A youthful brow and ruddy cheek
Became all cold and wan—
An eye grew dim in which the light
Of radiant fancy shone.
Cold was the cheek, and cold the brow—
The eye was fix'd and dim;
And one there mourned a brother dead,
Who would have died for him!

I know not if 'twas summer then,
I knew not if 'twas spring,
But if the birds sang on the trees,
I did not hear them sing;
If flowers came forth to deck the earth,
Their bloom I did not see—
I looked upon one wither'd flower,
And none else bloomed for me!

A sad and silent time it was,
Within that house of woe,
All eyes were dull and overcast,
And every voice was low!—
And from each cheek at intervals
The blood appeared to start,
As if recall'd in sudden haste,
To all the sinking heart!

Softly we trode, as if afraid
To mar the sleeper's sleep,
And stole last looks of his pale face,
For memory to keep!
With him the agony was o'er,
And now the pain was ours,
As thoughts of his sweet childhood rose
Like odour from dead flowers!

And when at last he was borne afar
From the world's weary strife,
How oft in thought did we again
Live o'er his little life!
His every look—his every word—
His very voice's tone—
Came back to us like things whose worth
Is only prized when gone!

The grief has passed with years away,
And joy has been my lot;
But the one is oft remember'd,
And the other soon forgot.
The gayest hours trip lightest by,
And leave the faintest trace;
But the deep, deep track that sorrow wears,
No time can e'er efface!

STANZAS AT A MARRIAGE FESTIVAL.

Love is gently omnipotent; to those who passes it, accident and death itself are but passing clouds, which can scarcely vex and cannot harm.—Recent English Essay.

The bridal wreath entwines a brow,
That glows in bliss beneath it;
The heart's sweet faith—she fondly now,
In tones of love, shall breathe it;
And if across that brow of snow
A shade of care would seem to flow,
'Tis not that doubts there press—

'Tis but that now gay thoughts retires,
And dares not flout the sacred fires
Of love born happiness.

And she is led by fancy far—
The future spreads before her,
Where truth still seems a diamond star,
In beauty beaming o'er her;
And where stands one, whose every look
Reflects her own, as calm clear brook
Repeats the sky above;
And not a single cloud is sent
To mar the heart-built firmament,
So full of light and love!

It is no dream—she knows full well
Life will not change to sadness—
She feels her heart a citadel,
Where rules bright hope and gladness,
And trusts in woman's pride, its care
To him whose image reigneth there,
With all a monarch's sway—
That trust shall be their morning light,
That trust shall give their bosoms might,
Which shall not know decay!

And now they hear from friends that greet,
Words eloquent with feeling,
And see in many an eye they meet,
Affection's tear drop stealing—
Yes! as life's anchor lightly weighs,
They read within each anxious gaze
What fate can but decree:
An oh, through many an after year,
That kindly word, that feeling tear,
Shall gladden memory!

And may the tides that round them flow,
Ne'er feel the tempest's power,
And o'er them skies at even glow,
Bright as this dawning hour;
Or should a storm dare break the wave,
Love still shall have the pow'r to save,
Bid threaten'g clouds depart,
And round them bend, calm, clear blue skies,
While truth, sweet light of angel eyes,
Shall paradise the heart!

DIRGE OF A CHILD.

No bitter tears for thee be shed,
Blossom of being! seen and gone!
With flowers alone we strew thy bed.
O blest departed one!
Whose all of life, a rosy ray,
Blush'd into dawn, and pass'd away.

Yes! thou art fled, ere guilt had power
To stain thy cherub soul and form,
Closed is the soft ephemeral flower,
That never felt a storm!
The sunbeam's smile, the zephyr's breath,
All that it knew from birth to death.

Thou wert so like a form of light,
That Heaven benignly called thee hence,
Ere yet the world could breathe one blight
O'er thy sweet innocence.
And thou, that brighter home to bless,
Art passed, with all thy loveliness!

Oh! hadst thou still on earth remain'd,
Vision of beauty! fair, as brief!
How soon thy brightness had been stain'd
With passion or with grief!
Now not a sully breath can rise,
To dim thy glory in the skies.

We rear no marble o'er thy tomb,
No sculptur'd image there shall mourn;
Ah! fitter far the vernal bloom
Such dwelling to adorn.
Fragrance, and flowers, and dew must be
The only emblems meet for thee.

Thy grave shall be a blessed shrine,
Adorn'd with Nature's brightest wreath,

Each glowing season shall combine
Its incense their to breathe;
And oft, upon the midnight air,
Shall viewless harps be murmuring there.

And oh! sometimes in visions blest,
Sweet spirit! visit our repose,
And bear from thine own world of rest,
Some balm for human woes!
What form more lovely could be given
Than thine, to messenger of Heaven?

BRING FLOWERS.

Bring flowers, young flowers, for the festal board,
To wreath the cup ere the wine is pour'd;
Bring flowers! they are springing in wood and vale.
Their breath floats out on the southern gale,
And the touch of the sunbeam hath waked the rose,
To deck the hall where the bright wine flows.

Bring flowers to strew in the conqueror's path—
He hath shaken thrones with his stormy wrath!
He comes with the spoils of nations back,
The vines lie crush'd in his chariot's track,
The turf looks red where he won the day—
Bring flowers to die in the conqueror's way!

Bring flowers to the captive's lonely cell.
They have tales of the joyous woods to tell;
Of the free blue streams, and the glowing sky,
And the bright world shut from his languid eye;
They will bear him a thought of the sunny hours,
And a dream of his youth—bring him flowers, wild flowers!

Bring flowers, fresh flowers, for the bride to wear!
They were born to blush in her shining hair.
She is leaving the home of her childhood's mirth,
She hath bid farewell to her father's hearth,
Her place is now by another's side—
Bring flowers for the locks of the fair young bride!

Bring flowers, pale flowers, o'er the bier to shed,
A crown for the brow of the early dead!
For this through its leave hath the white rose burst,
For this in the woods was the violet nursed,
Though they smile in vain for what once was ours,
They are love's last gift—bring ye flowers, pale flowers.

Bring flowers to the shrine where we kneel in prayer,
They are nature's offering, their place is there!
They speak of hope to the fainting heart,
With a voice of promise they come and part,
They sleep in dust through the wintry hours,
They break forth in glory—bring flowers, bright flowers!

REMEMBER THE POOR.

Lo! winter approacheth—his coming is nigh!
The chill winds sweep over the moor;
The storm-clouds are low'ring above in the sky,
And we should—Remember the poor.

Ye merchants, when reckoning profits at night,
Ye find that your gains still are sure
Give ear to the counsel that points to the right,
And bids you—Remember the Poor.

Ye farmers, whose labors with plenty are crown'd!
Who know not what 'tis to endure
The pangs which with poverty ever are found—
Will ye not—Remember the Poor.

O spend not your substance to gratify pride,
Nor following its glittering lure—
For the widow and orphan to heaven have cried
And it bids you—Remember the Poor.

MASONIC.

For the American Masonic Register and Literary Companion.
A LECTURE,

Setting forth the origin, and tracing the progress of the orders of MASONIC CHRISTIAN KNIGHTHOOD. And exhibiting the connexion of those orders with ancient Freemasonry. Derived from authentic ancient and modern, sacred and profane history.

By EBENEZER MIX, Esq. M. E. Grand Commander of Genesee Encampment, No. 10, holden, at Lockport, Niagara County N. Y.

Although the order of Templars was suppressed by the bulls and interdicts of the Pope, and laws and edicts of the monarchs of Europe, the order was not annihilated, the knights true to their vows and religious principles, and being determined to preserve the degrees of ancient Freemasonry, unswerved and unawed by the anathemas of the most powerful potentates on earth, and fully comprehending that the restraints attempted to be put upon them, were not conscientiously and morally binding, secretly propagated, sustained and preserved, the several degrees and orders which they had in charge, for the period of almost two centuries, to enable them to perform which, the monasteries of Europe supplied them with most of the materials, and a better field for that purpose did not then exist in the civilized world. It will also be observed that the feudal order of the Garter, was instituted soon after the suppression of the Templars, and from the similarity of the titles of the officers, and some of the outward forms of the order, to those appertaining to the order of knight Templars, we may well conclude that some of the Knight Templars were engaged in instituting the same.

We will here leave the Knights Templars and go back as to time, and bring up the history of another order of knighthood, already mentioned, the order of St. John of Jerusalem. This order originated, or at least derived that title, from the circumstance of its members being put in possession and taking the superintendence of a hospital, erected in Jerusalem in 1048 and dedicated to St. John the Baptist by some Italian merchants, for the reception and accommodation of Pilgrims and travellers who visited the holy city. They were likewise called knights hospitallers, in consequence of their having the charge, and being governors of the hospital.

They appear to be an order of unarmed brethren, whose duty it was, to feed the hungry, clothe the naked, and bind up the wounds of the afflicted; and to sustain and support, the poor and weary Pilgrim travelling from afar.

This order does not appear to have any knowledge of ancient freemasonry, yet I am well persuaded (and those who are familiar with the rites and ceremonies of the order, will I presume, on reflection, agree with me) that this order existed under the title of the order of St. Thomas, previous to the time of the establishment of that hospital. It appears that through all the turmoil, reigns, assaults, and captures which Jerusalem experienced; for upwards of two centuries, that this harmless and praise-worthy order, kept peaceable possession of the hospital, dispensing good works, and relieving distress until they embraced the use of arms, assumed a hostile attitude, and were in consequence, driven from their long-cherished abode, by the Turks.

While this order was thus peaceably and comfortably situated and usefully employed, Raymond, rector of the brethren, in its then state, being of an active and military turn, formed a plan of converting them into knights, and captain. He marshaled them into bands, invented banners, and led them on against the Turks, as knights of the order of St. John of Jerusalem, they fought with great bravery but the inferiority of their numbers, occasioned frequent defeats and they were at length compelled to give up their possessions to the conqueror, Saladin the Turkish chief. After a continued series of toils and misfortunes, and a constancy in the cause of religion which did them great honor, they were finally expelled from the holy land, in the year 1292. The Master and brethren fled to the island of Cyprus where they lived peaceably, supporting themselves by their industry, and employing their leisure hours in framing statutes for the government of the order; but returning to their former military pursuits, they attacked Rhodes, in 1308, which with seven other islands fell into their possession. They then assumed the name of Rhodes to their previous titles; thus situated they flourished for a considerable length of time.

This order had heretofore, in consequence of its extreme poverty, escaped persecution or assault, emanating from the avarice or rapacity of either Christians or infidels, but during this interval of peace, they were presented by the Pope with large estates and much treasure, which had been taken from the Templars, on the suppression of that order. They were again attacked by the Turks, whom they resisted with equal bravery and skill, but Sultan Soliman having determined at all events to dislodge them, he assembled an army of three hundred thousand men, with which he invaded the islands, and after six months incessant fatigue, and excessive loss, he succeeded in expelling them. The Emperor, Charles the V. gave them Malta at this critical era, to which island the knights retired in 1523 and assumed the title of Knights of Malta, of the holy order of St. John of Jerusalem.

Now let us return to the knights Templars, whom we left dead to the world, but to themselves, not only alive, but sound and healthy, as persecution always renders all virtuous societies.

When the knights of St. John had retired to the island of Malta, an asylum supposed to be secure from molestation, the Templars, who had suffered so much in defence of the Holy Land, having a fraternal feeling for those who had been engaged, fought, bled, and suffered in the same cause, and fully appreciating the high character, the Knights of Malta had earned for themselves and justly merited, resolved to join them, with their consent, in the possession and occupancy of this safe repository for the great treasures they had so long preserved for the benefit of mankind in the midst of its most inveterate enemies. After the necessary negotiations, the Templars joined themselves with the Knights of Malta on certain settled, expressed and satisfactory conditions, some of which were that the Templars should confer on the Knights of Malta, the degrees of ancient Freemasonry, and the order of the Red Cross, after which, they were to combine and consolidate, the orders of Knights Templar, and Knights of Malta, of the holy order of St. John of Jerusalem, all of which was mutually and punctually fulfilled.

After this transaction, Freemasonry and the Christian orders of knighthood had comparatively, a peaceful resting place and secure asylum, until the island was assaulted and taken by the French, after which the knights, dispersed over the civilized world, and from that period, Freemasonry and Christian Knighthood, have been co-extensive. These circumstances sufficiently account for the assertion made by our enemies, that the higher degrees of masonry and the orders of knighthood are of recent origin—true—until within a late period, they were known and enjoyed but by a few, and the circle of action of those few much limited.

That Freemasonry and the Christian order of Knighthood have been confined to Judea, the monasteries of Europe, and the island of Malta, until within a short period past, I do not pretend, that branches have sprung out of the main channel occasionally, in different ages, and flowed into many civilized countries especially, the three lower degrees of ancient Freemasonry, will not be disputed, and we have irrefragable proof, that the rites and ceremonies of all these degrees and orders, were transplanted from the island of Malta, and took root in other and distant climes, long before the conquest of the island by the French. But I insist that from all history, both ancient and modern, sacred and profane, as well as from masonic tradition, those degrees and orders, emanated from the sources at the times, and places, I have in this brief view of the subject, mentioned, and that the course I have marked out, in which they were preserved and handed down to us, in the main and of course the most unadulterated channel.

Thus we gather from history, that knights and knighthood originally signified servants and servitude. That all feudal and exclusively military knighthood, consisted of some head to each order, having many branches or supporters attached thereto, however disconnected the different branches, being instituted for the sole purpose of adding to the power of the head or chief, who was not even chosen or selected by the members.

We likewise learn from the same source, that Masonic Christian Knighthood, was voluntarily formed and entered into by the members of the institution of ancient Freemasonry, who, at their own pleasure, granted or refused membership to applicants, whether Monarch, Patrician, or Plebeian. That the institution has ever cherished, and supported benevolence, morality, virtue, and religion. That the body of its members has been composed of men, whose lives have been spent in performing deeds of charity, benevolence, and brotherly-love, in displaying bravery and intrepidity, and in enduring hardships and privations for the support and defence of morality, virtue, and religion. In short whose grand characteristics are unsullied honor, unwearied zeal in a brother's cause, and universal benevolence. We may therefore pronounce these orders of knighthood, the rock of ancient Freemasonry.

Thus much for the history of the rise progress and state of ancient Freemasonry, and the masonic Christian orders of knighthood. To have attempted to give even an epitome of the fidelity, patience and perseverance, courage and constancy, faith and humility, which have adorned the characters of those great and good men, who have instituted, supported, propagated and thus far sustained Freemasonry, and the orders of knighthood, could not have been expected in this brief history of the institutions. I have, however refer-ed to the records of their lives, which can be examined by every enquiring mind. But we Sir Knights, Companions and Brethren who claim to be their descendants in a sound, and moral point of view, are acquainted with their characters, in a greater or less degree. Then let me ask—is there a man on earth, destined to breathe this neither air—and on this mundane sphere, to tread the ground, who would not be proud, of such an ancestry.

But the atrocious scene was yet to come which was to complete the ruin of the Templars, and satiate the vengeance of their enemies. Their Grand Master Molay, and other dignitaries of the order still survived. And, though they had made the most submissive acknowledgements to their unrelenting persecutors, yet the influence which they had over the minds of the vulgar, and their connections with many of the Princes of Europe, rendered them formidable and dangerous to their oppressors. By the exertion of that influence they might restore union of their dismembered party, and inspire them with courage to revenge the murder of their companions; or, by adopting a more cautious method, they might repel, by uncontrovertible proofs, the charges for which they suffered, and, by interesting all men in their behalf, they might expose Phillip to the attacks of his own subjects, and to the hatred and contempt of Europe. Aware of the dangers to which his character and person would be exposed by pardoning the surviving Templars, the French Monarch commanded the Grand Masters and brethren to be led out to a scaffold, erected for that purpose, and there to confess before the public, the enormities of which their order had been guilty, and the justice of the punishment which had been inflicted on their brethren.—If they adhered to their former confessions, a full pardon was promised to them; but if they should persist in maintaining their innocence, they were threatened with destruction on a pile of wood, which the executioners had erected in their view, to awe them into compliance. While the multitude were standing around in awful expectations, ready, from the words of the prisoners, to justify or condemn their King, the venerable Molay, with a cheerful and undaunted countenance, advanced, in chains, to the scaffold; and, with a firm and impressive tone, thus addressed the spectators. "It is but just, that on this terrible day, and in the last moments of my life, I lay open the iniquity of falsehood, and make truth to triumph. I declare then, in the face of heaven and earth, and I confess, though to my eternal shame and confusion, that I have committed the greatest of crimes; but it has been only in acknowledging those that have been charged with so much virulence upon an order, which truth obliges me to pronounce innocent. I made the first declaration they required of me, only to suspend the excessive tortures of the rack, and mollify those that made me endure them. I am sensible what torments they prepare for those that have courage to revoke such a confession. But the horrible sight cannot make me confirm one lie by another. On a condition so infamous as that, I freely renounce life which is already but too odious to me. For what would it avail me to prolong a few miserable days, when I must owe them only to the blackest of calumnies." ^(a) In consequence of his manly revocation, the Grand Master and his companions were hurried into the flames, where they retained that contempt of death which they had exhibited on former occasions. This mournful scene extorted tears from the lowest of the vulgar.

Four valiant knights, whose charity and valour had procured them the gratitude and applause of mankind, suffering, without fear, the most cruel and ignominious death, war, indeed, a spectacle well calculated to excite emotions of pity in the hardest hearts; and, whatever opinion we may entertain concerning the character of that unhappy order, every mind of sensibility will compassionate the fate of the Templars.

and curse the inhuman policy of Phillip the Fair.

From the short and imperfect account of the origin and ruin of the Knights Templars, the reader will be enabled to understand the merits of the question, respecting the innocence of that order, which it will be necessary here to consider. The opinions of contemporary writers were too much influenced by party spirit, and religious zeal, to deserve any regard in this investigation. All those writers, however, who are generally deemed impartial historians, and who were in no respects interested, either in the condemnation or acquittal of the Templars, have, without hesitation pronounced them innocent of the crimes laid to their charge, and imputed their destruction to the avarice and private resentment of Phillip. In the decision of these historians, the public had, in general, acquiesced till their sentiments were unsettled by the pretensions, and the sophistical reasoning of Barruel. This writer has charged upon the Templars all those crimes with which their enemies had formerly loaded them; He has attempted to justify the severity of the French King, and has reproached, with the bitterest invective, the Society of Freemasons, because they were once connected with a fraternity, which, in his opinion, was so wicked and profane. While we endeavour, therefore, to defend the Templars against these recent calumnies, we will, at the same time, be maintaining the respectability of our own order, by vindicating its members from that imputed depravity, which according to Barruel, they have inherited from their fathers.

In order to form an impartial judgment respecting any sentence which has been passed, without proper evidence, either against individuals or associations, it is necessary to be acquainted with the motives and character of the accusers, and with the benefits which might accrue to them and the judges, by the punishment or liberation of the accused. In the case before us, the accusers had been disgraced and imprisoned by the accused, for their villainy and crimes. Their chief prosecutor and judge was actuated by motives of avarice and private resentment; and many rival orders who had been languishing in obscurity and indigence, propagated with assiduity the slanderous tale, in hopes of sharing in those ample possessions, and that public favour, which had been acquired by the superior abilities of the Knights Templars. To all ranks of men, indeed, the veneration which the name of a Templar inspired, was an object of envy: Their opulent revenues were calculated to give trouble to a covetous mind, and the remarkable regularity of their conduct was no small incitement to the exercise of detraction.

Such were the motives and prospects of their judges and accusers. Let us attend now to the accusations which were brought against them, and we will find that these could scarcely come under the cognizance of law, as their pretended crimes were committed against themselves, and not against society. Did they perpetrate murder upon any of their fellow-citizens. This was never laid to their charge. Did they purloin any man's treasure? Of theft they were never accused. Did they instigate to rebellion the subjects of any government, or plot destruction against the person of any king? Under such a character they were never known, till Barruel called them traitors and regicides; because, forsooth, it was his opinion that their successors, the Freemasons in France, were accessory to the murder of their King. What then were their crimes? It was said, that they burned their own infants! And yet an instance was never produced, in which the child of a Templar had disappeared, and in which the tenderness of a mother, as would certainly have happened, remonstrated against the murder of her child. They were said to have committed upon one another the most unnatural of all crimes! And yet, no individual produced a specific instance which he could corroborate by indubitable proof. They were accused of insulting the Cross of Christ; and yet they have shed their blood in the defence of his religion. Of crimes like these, one may conceive a depraved individual to have been guilty; but to believe, that a respectable fraternity, consisting of thousands of members, could be capable of such enormities, requires a degree of faith to which the most credulous will scarcely attain.

The innocence of the Templars, and the injustice of Phillip, will be still more apparent by considering the conduct of the latter, as related even by Barruel.—This writer observes, "That two men, who had been imprisoned for their crimes, declared that they had some important discoveries to make concerning the Knights Templars, and that this declaration, though entitled to little credit, made the king determine on the dissolution of the order, and arrest in one day all the Templars in his kingdom." ^(c) Here then was the most flagrant injustice in the very threshold of the whole affair. Without summoning a single witness; without examining a single Templar; without consulting a single friend; without even knowing what the important discoveries were which the criminals had to make; the French king determined on the destruction of the Templars, on the destruction of an order whose Grand Master had been his particular friend, and even the god father of one of his children. ^(d) This latter circumstance, indeed, is brought forward by Barruel, to justify the conduct of Phillip; because he sacrificed the duties of friendship to the principles of justice. But, when we take it in connexion with the rest of his conduct, it must inspire every honest mind with a more degrading opinion of the head and the heart of that persecuting monarch.

Such being the premature and precipitant determination of Phillip, we may consider the order of the Templars as at that time dissolved, and regard all those examinations, enquiries, confessions, trials, and councils which succeeded as mere phantoms of justice, conjured up by that crafty prince, to dazzle the eyes of his subjects and sanctify the depravity of his own conduct. By keeping this circumstance in view, the intelligent reader will be enabled to understand the minute, though sometimes contradictory, details of historians, respecting the trial and confessions of the Knights Templars; and, notwithstanding the veil of justice with which the judges attempted to cover their proceedings, he will be enabled to develop the detestable principles upon which their trial was conducted, and the still more detestable motives which induced Clement V. to partake in the guilt of Phillip the Fair.

The formidable, and indeed the only plausible argument by which Barruel supports his opinions, is drawn from the confessions of the Templars. He maintains that the avowals of the Knights were free from compulsion, and that no set of men could be so base as to accuse their brethren of crimes, of which they believed them to be entirely innocent. But the fallacy of his reasoning will appear from the slightest fact, that, when an avowal must be made, men are more ready to accuse themselves of crimes of which they have never been guilty, than to confess those which they have actually committed. Such as have attended to the operation of their own minds particularly in the earlier part of his life, will acquiesce in this extraordinary truth; and those who have not had occasion to observe it, will find upon consideration, that it is consonant to the constitution of the human mind. When a man confesses himself guilty of a crime which he has really perpetrated, he is exposed, not only to the reproaches of his own conscience, but to those of the world; and, should he, at any time, retract his confession, he must be aware that every subsequent inquiry would only confirm the truth of his first deposition. But when a man, from a principle of fear, acknowledges the truth of accusations with which he has been unjustly loaded, a sense of his integrity and innocence supports him under the opprobrium of the world, and he is conscious that his character will be vindicated by every investigation, and that the confessions which he himself made, may at any time be proved to have been the offspring of necessity. Such, undoubtedly were the feelings by which the Templars were actuated. Convinced, that the crimes which they were desired to acknowledge, were of such an unnatural kind, that they could never be imputed, by any reasonable man, to a numerous and hitherto respectable fraternity, they yielded to the solicitations of their persecutors; with the well-grounded hope that future enquiry would remove the stain which the irresistible desire of self-preservation had prompted them to throw upon their character. From this very consideration, indeed, namely, from the nature of the crimes charged upon the Templars, have many eminent historians maintained the innocences of that unhappy order.—But, were we able to allow with Barruel in opposition to all history, that the avowals of the Knights were free and numerous; by an application of the principles already laid down, we would, from that circumstance, prove the innocence, and not the guilt of the Templars.

THE CENTENARY OF METHODISM.

This occasion, of so much interest to the Christian world, has been widely observed by the denomination, who respect the Wesleys as founders of their Church. The appellation Methodist was first applied to Charles Wesley, when at College, who, from the sedateness of his manners, the regularity and piety of his life, gathered around him a few of the more thoughtful, while he was subjected to the ridicule of others. Their number at first, in 1729, consisted of four, namely, John Wesley, fellow of Lincoln College, Charles Wesley, student of Christ Church, Mr. Morgan, commoner of Christ Church, and Mr. Kirkman, of Merion College. In 1732, Mr. Ingham, of Queen College, and Mr. Broughton, Exeter, were added to their number, and soon after Mr. Clayton, of Brazen Nose, James Steevely and George Whitefield joined them. The first organization of a class of religious persons, under the appellation of Methodist, was made by the Rev. John Wesley in the year 1739, in the city of London. His first place of worship was a transformed foundry, in London, and the members numbered forty-two. Now the societies number half as many places of worship in the kingdom as there are parish churches; the number of members being exclusive of those in the United States, about 600,000. Their means and liberality may be estimated from the fact that for Missionary purposes alone they raised in 1837 about 400,000 dollars.

The first chapel erected in this country was in John street, New York, in 1768, though a church was organized there in 1766, and about the same time a society was formed by Mr. Strawbridge in Maryland.—The society in New York was commenced by Mr. Philip Embury, a local preacher, and Captain Thomas Webb, of the British army, also a local preacher.—The first ministers set by Mr. Wesley were the Rev. Messrs. Boardman and Pillmore, who came as missionaries, and landed in Philadelphia in 1769, where they found Captain Webb and a society of about one hundred members. Mr. Boardman went to New York and Mr. Pillmore continued here, where he preached the first Sunday evening, upon the commons, "having," as he says in a letter to Mr. Wesley, "the stage appointed for the horse race for my pulpit, and I think about four or five thousands hearers listened with attention still as night." In 1771, Messrs. Asbury, Whatcoat and Wright landed in Philadelphia on the 5th. October, where they were most warmly welcomed.

In 1773, the Methodists numbered in Philadelphia 180 members, now they are over 7000. Then the number of ministers stationed in the respective churches in this country, was 10, now the number is 3300, to which may be added 6000 local preachers. Then the whole number of members in the colonies was 1,160, now there are in the United States nearly upwards of 741,000.

Thomas Coke, L. L. D., of Jesus College, Oxford, was ordained Bishop, and entered upon his duties in 1784. In the same year Francis Asbury was ordained to the same office. Bishop Coke may be deemed the father of the missionary institutions of the Methodist Church. He crossed the Atlantic on missions 18 times, and died on a voyage to British India in the year 1811. He commenced the missions in Western Africa and in the West Indies, and having spent the whole of a large fortune in the cause, had the happiness of numbering 15,000 members in the West India missions.

Bishop Asbury, who was more exclusively devoted to the care of the church in this country, was born near Birmingham, in England, in 1745. He entered upon the ministry at the age of 17. He came a missionary to the colonies in 1773, was ordained a Bishop in 1784 and died at Fredericksburg, Virginia, 1816, in the 71st year of his age.

The church in the United States having a wider territory, and being remarkable for its assiduous labors in the new states, cannot be expected to accomplish as much as the British connexion in the cause of missions. Still its labors are vast and efficient. Its principal missions are among the Indian tribes, Africa, South America, Texas and the Southern States; connected with these missions are 230 missionaries, 21,838 church members, 2188 being Indians, 29 teachers, 838 scholars. For the support of these there were collected the past year, 142,000. The centenary occasion, besides being religiously observed, has elicited gratuitous offerings in England to the amount of 1,300,000 dollars. Of the sum which will be raised in this country no estimate can yet be made. About 10,000 dollars, it is presumed, will be contributed, from this city alone. The Union Church in Fourth street, has collected 3000 dollars.

THE GATHERER.

PARENTAL PARTIALITIES.

Parents can never too carefully avoid showing a distinction between children in the distribution of their affection. Parental love, during infancy and youth should be the patrimony of all, and—so far as human infirmity will allow—like the kindly dews of heaven, which descend equally, "on the just and on the unjust." The faults of early years should not be visited by a withdrawal of affection from the wayward child, nor should a naturally amiable disposition entitle its possessor to that interest in a parent's heart, which excludes others who have the same claim of consanguinity. We of course only refer to the commencement of life; for the parental love of after years assuredly is justly influenced by the conduct of our offspring. To the inexperienced in such ties; it may appear a task hard of fulfilment to guard against the froward behaviour of children influencing our bearing towards them; yet strange to say, here is not the error that so often spreads jealousy and dissension in families. It is not the natural yearning of the heart towards the most amiable—no, it is the bestowal of our partial affection on one child in preference to another, from the accident of sex or from being the youngest or the oldest born—from form or feature, or the early indications of intellect.

Here the election is made by the father or mother, often to the ruin of the favourite child; and it may generally be remarked, that the favoured of a parent under such circumstances is the first to make that heart ache, the partiality of which was so unjustly engrossed.—From John's Legend and Romance, African and European.

The National Gazette, published at Philadelphia, gave lately the following sketch of Mr. Dickens, the author of The Pickwick Papers:—In person, he is a little above the standard height, though not tall. His figure is slight, without being meagre, and is well proportioned. The face, the first object of physical interest, is peculiar, though not remarkable. An ample forehead is displayed under a quantity of light hair, worn in a mass, on one side, rather jauntily, and this is the only semblance of dandyism in his appearance.—His brow is marked: his eye, though not large, bright and expressive. The most regular feature is the nose, which may be called handsome—an epithet not applicable to his lips, which are too large. Taken altogether, the countenance which is pale without sickness, is, in repose, extremely agreeable, and indicative of refinement and intelligence. Mr. Dickens's manners and conversation, except, perhaps, in the perfect abandon among his familiars, have no exhibition of particular wit, much less of humour. He is mild in the tones of his voice, and quiescent; evincing habitual attention to the etiquette and conventionalisms of polished circles. His society is much sought after, and, possibly, to avoid the invitations pressed upon him, he does not reside in London, but, with a lovely wife and two charming children, he has a retreat in the vicinity. He is about 26 years of age, but does not look more than 23 or 24. Mr. Dickens is entirely self-made, and rose from an humble station, by virtue of his moral worth, his genius, and his industry.

THE TIME FOR WRITING.

Night is the best time for study, but morning is the best time for committing the fruits of our studies to paper. In the early dawn, while the sluggard yet turns upon his bed, and yawns for another nap, the industrious student, or author, should be up, with pen in hand, and committing his thoughts to paper, for his own future use, if not for the press, for the good of mankind. It is in the morning, if ever, that we find ourselves fitted for the labor of composition. The stillness of the season—the general calm serenity and salubrity of the atmosphere—the renovated vigor of our physical, and the cheeful state of our intellectual powers—all combine to promote the flow of our ideas and facilitate their correct and vivid expression. Our spirits seem to rise with the sun, and our imagination to soar with the eagle, who wings his flight with that brilliant orb. The perplexities of the day the various calls to which we are subject, according to the nature of our occupations, have not come upon us; and we are left to those calm reflections, and delightful reveries, which improve the judgment, exalt the imagination, and meliorate the heart. When we hear the birds begin to sing, or perceive the first ray of light through the lattice, then is the time to rise; then is the time to sit down to the labours of the desk. The rising luminary of day reminds us of the great luminary of the universe, and conveys our thoughts to HIM as the source of all light, of all wisdom. In such a state of mind, under such benign influences, our genius is quickened, our judgment is strengthened, our humane affections are expanded, and our labors cannot fail to benefit ourselves, if they do not redound to the good of our country and mankind. Rise, then, with the lark, and anticipate the sun, if you wish to enjoy health of body, and vigor and elasticity of mind, and to combine these in laborious and useful efforts to promote human happiness and prosperity.

THE CHAMELEON.

"I had a chameleon which lived for three months, another for two months, and several which I gave away after keeping ten days or a fortnight. Of all the irascible little animals in the world, there are none so choleric as the chameleon: I trained two large ones to fight, and could, at any time, by knocking the tails against one another, ensure a combat, during which their change of colour was most conspicuous: this is only effected by proxysm of rage, when the dark gall of the animal is transmitted into the blood, and is visible enough under its pelucid skin. The gall, as it enters and leaves the circulation, affords the three various shades of green which are observable in its colours—the story of the chameleon assuming whatever colour it near it, is, like that of its living upon air, a fable. It is extremely voracious. I had one so tame that I could place it on a stick opposite to a window, and in the course of ten minutes I have seen it devour half a dozen flies; its mode of catching them is very singular; the tongue is a thin cartilaginous dart, anchor shaped; this is thrust forth with great velocity, and never fails to catch its prey. The mechanisms of the eyes of the chameleon is extremely curious; it has the power of projecting the eye a considerable distance from the socket, and can make it revolve in all directions. One of them, which I kept for some months, deposited thirteen eggs in a corner of the room; each was about the size of a large coriander seed; the animal never sat on them. I took them away to try the effects of the sun; but from that period she declined daily in vivacity, and soon after died."

ODDS AND ENDS.

An Irish gentleman at cards having, on inspection, found the pool deficient exclaimed, "Here's a shilling short, who put it in?"

A knavish attorney asked a very worthy gentleman what was honesty? "What is that to you—meddle with those things which concern you."

THE FREEMASON.

A TALE OF TRUTH.

It was during the late war, towards the close of Napoleon's disastrous invasion of Russia, that a party of French officers were assembled in a rude tent, refreshing themselves after the fatigues of a hard day's march. Moscow had already been abandoned, and the hitherto victorious armies of France were in full retreat, amid all the horrors of a Russian winter. The ground was covered with deep snow, which yielded crisply beneath the tread: the men, in clearing the space for the erection of the tent, had piled it in form of a circular embankment, into which the outward stakes were driven. The night was intensely cold, not a cloud obscured the heavens, the stars, shining with that peculiar brilliancy which distinguishes them in a northern latitude, lit up the distant plain that trenched by the drifting winds into billowy forms, appeared like a sea of foam, relieved only with the red glare from the watch fire of the neighbouring picket.

Wrapped in fur cloaks and pelisses, the spoil of the abandoned city, they were seated on the ground, enjoying their repast with true zest which only hunger gives. The party consisted of Count Lauriston, Major Guillet, Captain Adolphe Lessau, Lieutenant Florent, who, with several inferior officers, had attended their chief in his unsuccessful interview with the Russian general. Prince Kutusoff, when commissioned by Bonaparte, went to propose an armistice, and to eat for peace.

The supercilious manner in which he had been received by the prince, who refused either to grant a cessation of hostilities, or forward Napoleon's letter to the emperor, chafed the fiery spirit of the count, and during their long day's march he had scarcely exchanged a word with any of his officers. Even a sullen disposition must yield at last to the contagion of good humor and a desire to please. A Frenchman's is not the most obstinate in the world, and Lauriston, roused by the cheerful gaiety of the party, and their peals of laughter, at each fresh sally, gradually forgot his spleen, and joined in the conversation.

'Wonder,' exclaimed Adolphe, gaily, 'what the fair dames of Paris would say, could they behold us in our winter bivouac—the snow our carpet, and the bare canvass our only shelter from the keen frost: many a fair bosom would commiserate our fortune.'

'Ay,' interrupted Florent, 'and envy us our furs; these sables would distract the heads of our belles; the empress herself cannot boast of such. Should I ever see our dear country again, I will preserve mine in lavender till I become a peer of France, and then line my robes with them.'

'Take care that it does not first become your winding-sheet. The soldier will have something to tell of, who again sets foot upon his native soil. We are encompassed with dangers—not only the enemy, but their accursed climate to contend with—even I,' continued the major, 'veteran as I am, begin to feel its influence; how, then, will the dainty limbs of youth resist it?'

Faith, major, you are severe on Florent; he stands not only fire, but frost like a hero—I have seen him expose his uniform to the snow rather than derange the graceful folds of his cloak.'

'And I, count,' added Adolphe, 'within the last month have twice seen his ungloved hand—'

'It must have been when he was bathing it with eau de Cologne, then,' interrupted the major, with a slight sneer.

'You may behold it, gentlemen,' hastily exclaimed the lieutenant, nettled at the observation of the last speaker, 'grasping the hilt of my sword, if either of you presume to question the spirit of its master.'

The mischievous major seemed more amused with the anger of the young man, than disposed to take up the quarrel, while Lauriston elevated his eye-brows with the hauteur of conscious superior.

'My foolish observation has occasioned this,' said Adolphe, after a slight pause; 'but in truth, I meant not to offend—come, give me your hand.'

Florent still looked gloomy.

'What! man,' he continued, 'resent a jest—so slight a one—and from me, too! you can't be serious, come give me your hand, friend—brother.'

A smile of peculiar meaning passed between the young soldiers, and each instantly grasped the other's hand.

'Humph!—Brothers—' said Guillet, after a pause, 'this comes of Freemasonry; I have known many a pretty quarrel spoiled in a similar manner; there was Marlet, of our regiment, he, I remember, had a dispute with an Austrian Col. just after the battle of Austerlitz; they were to have met the next morning, and I should been his second, had not the fool gone to a Lodge the same evening, where he encountered his man, what passed, heaven and the brotherhood alone can tell—all I know is, that instead of meeting like soldiers, they entered the café arm-in-arm like priests—Bah! don't talk to me of Masonry, it only tends to make men—'

'What?' passionately demanded Florent anticipating some reflection upon his courage.

'Brothers,' coolly answered the soldier; 'it has done so in the present instance.'

'Faith,' said the count, 'he has you there—the major is too old a campaigner to be caught by youngsters; but, tell me, since you think so highly of Masonry, what are its peculiar claims to the consideration of mankind?'

'It is universal,' replied the young soldiers; 'travel where you will, there Masonry has spread its branches, diffusing in its progress a knowledge of the useful arts; it is equally cultivated in the tents of the wandering Arab, and the palaces of the more enlightened European. Even, here,' he continued, 'in this cold and inhospitable region, despite the jealous prohibition of a despotic government, the Craft still flourishes.'

'Does it?' exclaimed the major; 'it must be a sturdy plant, then; for this infernal frost would destroy vitality in anything less hardy than a bear; we only have escaped, I suspect, from having robbed him of his skin.'

'You are in error, major,' replied Lauriston, shrugging his shoulders in contempt—'you forget the natives—they surely live here.'

'Exist, you mean, count,' grumbled the old soldier; 'besides, they are too nearly allied to our species to require a distinct classification. Look at your Don Cossack, now—he is your bear on horseback; and in truth a most determined savage, who scorns all civilized modes of warfare, and fights after the manner of a wild Indian, appearing when you least expect him and like the whirlwind, sweeping all before him. It was only in our last affair old General Bellout, that prince of tacticians, was completely baffled: he had formed his regiment in fine order; his position was unimpeachable, his right being protected by a heavy battery, which, according to all rule, the enemy should not attempt. While waiting patiently for the attack a junior officer observed a party of Cossacks defile towards the wood which flanked the battery, in order, as he justly imagined, to effect a surprise. Bellout knowing how apt boys are to imagine themselves wiser than elders, paid slight regard, unfortunately, to his suggestions. Well, the action commenced, the regiment manoeuvred till it had drawn the enemy under the battery, when, to their astonishment, it commenced its deadly fire upon them. Bellout found that, contrary to all tactics, a party of those flying devils had turned his strong point of defence into the certain means of his defeat.'

'Well major,' said Adolphe, half asleep, brothers though some of them may be, heaven defend us from a visiting party of these bearded gentlemen! The sentinels have replenished the fires, I perceive; so, without fear of either wolf or Cossack, I have taken up my position for the night; it will soon be day-break, and a few hours sleep will leave us all the better for tomorrow's march.'

'You are wise, youngsters,' replied the veteran—'nothing like rest; Lauriston has already taken your advice—good night—good night!' and in a few minutes the little party were buried in sleep.

The last star was fading in the heavens when Lauriston awoke; he was still a day's march from the army and well knew that the emperor would be impatient to learn the success of his mission. 'Come gentlemen,' he exclaimed, waking his companions, who, wrapped in their cloaks, still enjoyed their slumbers, 'we have played the shiggard;—to horse, away! Laurent call in the men.'

All was soon bustle and confusion in the little encampment; the horses were led from the rude tent where they had passed the night with the men, and waited, ready caparisoned; while the poles of their late resting place were being struck. Just as they were preparing to mount, a party of Cossacks were perceived crossing the plain at full speed towards them. 'Fall in!' exclaimed the major, in that steady tone of command which the old soldier hears and obeys with confidence, 'Count he continued, 'your life is of value to the emperor—to our country—you must fly, and leave us to make good our retreat.'

'But will that be honorable?' demanded Lauriston; half anxious to be gone and yet ashamed to desert his brave companions.

'Under any other circumstances, perhaps not,' replied the major; but you are in possession of information necessary for the safety of the army;—at all risks, your life must be preserved, whatever may become of ours. Florent, with corporals Jaques and Preinet, will accompany you—I cannot spare more—they are the only two married men of our party, and deserve the chance—farewell—no time is to be lost.'

Lauriston instantly followed the advice of his companion; and accompanied by the young lieutenant and the two men, commenced his retreat.

The old soldier formed his little party in the hollow lately occupied by the tent, which was protected on three sides by the embankment of snow thrown up in clearing the ground; his number amounted to eighteen men, besides Adolphe and himself.

'How many do you count?' enquired the veteran of his companion, as the enemy gained upon them: 'my eyes are so dazzled by the snow, I can scarce see ten yards before me.'

'About thirty,' replied Adolphe, coolly: 'shall have warm work of it they are here!'

'Steady men,' cried the major: level high.'

As he spoke, the party, headed by their commander, reached the ground. The Cossacks were advancing with their usual impetuosity, when the first six were thrown into some slight confusion by the giving way of the embankment which yielded beneath their weight and plunged them up to their horses' bellies in snow. The Frenchmen saw their advantage, and fired; two fell: the others, by a desperate exertion of strength, backed till they gained firm ground.

The attacking party now divided into two separate bodies, and commenced wheeling round their enemy, each in a different direction. The effect of this manoeuvre was to distract their attention; for at the same instant one party poured in a line through the entrance of their little citadel, while the other, leaping the embankment in the rear, attacked them at a disadvantage. The struggle was now hand-to-hand—men encountered each other with all the bitterness of national hate and personal feuds.

'Our only chance,' said the major to Adolphe who was fighting near him, 'is to gain the open ground—we are cramped here; and spurring his horse, he dashed past the enemy in gallant style, followed by the young officer and several men. The Cossacks were too much accustomed to this desultory mode of warfare to be easily taken by surprise: the party who had leaped the embankment in the rear, headed by their officer, immediately followed, leaving their companions to despatch the few who still struggled desperately within the frozen arena. The old major was the first who fell, but not before he had slain the soldier who had intercepted his flight. Adolphe was pursued by three of the enemy, who, with their long lances poised the air, in anticipation of their victim. One, whose horse was of finer metal than his companions, was haining rapidly upon him, when as a last resource, he drew a pistol from his saddle, and fired. The arm of this pursuer fell powerless at his side; at this moment the officer and two men, who by a detour had gained upon his path, dashed before.

Adolphe—his sword broken, his path beset—perceiving that all further attempt at flight or resistance would be useless, calmly awaited his fate. One of his pursuers was on the point of transfixing him with a lance, when a gleam of hope flashed across his mind. Turning towards the officer, he made that peculiar sign which, through the world, designates a Master Mason. Swift as an arrow the commander rushed between the Cossack and his destined victim, striking up his lance with his sabre just as it reached the young Frenchman's breast, the disappointed savage rode grumbling away.

'I may not offer you my hand,' exclaimed the Russian, in excellent French; 'it is stained with the blood of your countrymen; but you have made a claim upon my mercy which, even here in the red moment of victory, with my spirit chafed with my country's wrongs, I must—at all hazards—will respect. Your parole—'

'Is given,' answered Adolphe, scarcely believing his good fortune, for the Cossacks were seldom known to give quarter.

'Enough!' replied his captor: follow me.'

THE MORALIST.

For the American Masonic Register and Literary Companion.

THE IMMORTALITY OF MENTAL INFLUENCE.

When we reflect that mind is to exert an influence over future ages—how much does it increase our accountability for its improvement! Gifts mis-applied, render their possessor a curse to the world. Such was Voltaire. Genius was his; but it was the scorching flame of the volcano. It glared upon the world, and dazzled by its splendor; but within there was a mass of moral corruption, destined for the destruction of France. He was the master spirit of Atheism; and his principles flowed over Europe, scathing and blighting the fair things they touched. The more dreadful was his influence, from the brilliancy of his intellect. The deadly pollution of his pen was concealed in the beauties of his style:—like the apples of the dead sea, the fair covering but hid the bitter ashes. He prepared the way for the French Revolution—he laid the foundation of that horrid structure; and would have smiled in demoniac triumph at the progress of the work, could he have lived to witness it. A nation governed by usurping tyrants;—families disunited;—the father bleeding on the scaffold;—the mother in prison awaiting her doom; and the children left at the mercy of an infuriated populace:—Such was the end, to the attainment of which, Voltaire directed all his energies—Nourished by his intellect, the tree of infidelity has spread its branches over France, and they distil a poison, that has sunk deep in her soil and that ages cannot remove. What is she now? Were her principles purified, when the tomb closed above him who gathered the elements of her destruction? Have we not evidence, that his writings exert as deadly an influence now, as then? It is true that the guillotine does not so regularly perform its office; but see the numbers who, urged on by the demon of Atheism, plunge the dagger into their own bosoms.—Her public journals are filled with instances of suicide and murder.—What can be the morals of that nation, whose rulers and chief men, will crowd around a convicted felon and beg for some token of remembrance,—an autograph,—a seal; a lock of hair. What people would obey laws, formed by such men? And this is France; such her sons;—and such the effects of that influence, exerted by one of those minds who give a character to their own and future ages.

Could man have received a higher motive for the improvement of his talents than the belief that their influence is to be immortal? that it shall not cease when the lifeless form is laid low, in the sepulchre? Death brightens his glory; for in the language of another, it breaks the direct link between the man of genius, and his country—and gives him an illustrious communion with all countries. The poet, the orator, and the hero are no longer the citizens of a nation, but they belong to the human race in all its boundaries. Their renown and their powers, are, like their natures, spiritualized; they have passed out of and above the world, and from their immortal height, they bear healing and splendor on their wings for all lands, and all generations.

The ambitious man struggling for fame, sees his reward—not in the applause of those who gather around in the first flush of prosperity, but in being recognized, by after ages, as one of the exalted few, born for immortality. With patient footsteps, he toils up the hill of science, which he never would attempted to ascend, were not a glorious future to be his recompense. For, who would spend a life in accumulating treasures of knowledge, which must at last be laid with their possessor in the silent grave?—on which the stranger will tread recklessly of all that lies beneath? To die and perish!—the words strike a death-knell to the lofty aspirations of intellect:—but to live forever:—to know that mind will exert its influence as effectually when the body is mouldering in the tomb, as now—adds fervor to the poet's inspirations,—urges the man of science to perfect his discoveries, and stimulates the Philanthropist and Christian to new and more extended usefulness.

It is a beautiful characteristic of genius that whatever receives its touch:—is gifted with its immortality. It is this which excites our interest in a country, before we have pressed its soil, or gazed upon its beauties. Who does not love the names of Greece and Italy? lands consecrated by the intellects of their sons.—The painter has portrayed, and the bard bathed among of the vine-clad hills;—the orange groves:—the fragrant flowers, and the laughing streams of his native land. From the laurel wreath that binds his brow has he plucked a leaf to lay beside each loved thing there. In fancy, we have dwelt among those fair scenes; until they seem to us, as the remembrances of early years.

To this power, given to genius alone, may we partially ascribe the rapid advance of intellectual improvement. Many, in ages past,—alarmed by the repulsive form, in which knowledge was presented to them, preferred the dark night of Ignorance; but who had it been exhibited in a more attractive dress would have been the first to worship at its shrine. Those, who strive thus to attire it are the benefactors of their own and future generations. Such an individual was Erskine. "He" in the language of his biographer, turned the dry details of law, into great intellectual and historic records—exalted the concerns of private individuals into monuments of national freedom, and raised, on common and temporary topics,—some of the richest trophies, of forensic eloquence in any age or nation.

The influence of Chaucer's intellect, is mirrored on every page of English Poetry. The change which he effected, has given it an immortality to which the compositions of an earlier period could never attain.—He polished the rude barbaric lay, and without restraining the fresh impulses of nature, allowed his thoughts to flow in that measured harmony, which constitutes the music of poetry. Since his day many poets have appeared, who excel him in refined and studied elegance, but in all may be traced the guiding hand, who "formed the structure and left it for after ages to adorn."

It is a cheering thought, to the humble aspirant, that the influence of mind, is as powerful as enduring—when it emanates from the peasant, as the monarch—that the purple and the ermine,—the sceptre and the crown may not win immortality—but that intellect may bear away the prize;—though its possessor have no proud name to trumpet forth his praise. The pearl is as pure in the rough dwelling nature gave it, as when it glistens amid raven locks;—the diamond shines as brightly in its native sands:—as when it decks the brow of beauty;—and mind is as glorious in its effects, burning in the breast of the low-born, as the noble. Could the proudest titles have won the glory with which intellect has encircled the names of Shakspeare,—of Curran,—of Burns, or, prouder still, of our own Washington?

But is the Immortality of Mental Influence confined to the few characters that Fame has consecrated? Does not the humblest mind exert an influence through futurity? The name may be forgotten, but does not the intellect still live? Who may separate the myriads of drops that form the mighty ocean? who number the grains of sand upon the shore? and yet does not each drop—each grain of sand, form some part of the moving billow, or extended beach? Then, who may trace the influence of individual minds,—as each, the centre of a distinct system, and still revolving round some greater orb, is unnoticed in the vast galaxy of mind? The lightning, in its playful brilliancy, hides the rough point by which it is caught;—and the brighter intellect eclipsed in its glory,—the uncultivated mind, by which its powers were developed; yet, such influences, are like the falling stone upon the waters,—the retreating wave gives impulse to the succeeding wave, spreading in everlasting circles, growing wider and wider, till it mingles with the ocean of eternity.

MISCELLANY.

From the Philadelphia Herald and Sentinel.

MARRIED, AND YET NOT MARRIED! SINGULAR CASE.

Before Judge King and his associates of the Court of Common Pleas. Thursday morning, Dec. 12th, 1839.

Commonwealth, at the relation of James Dick vs. William P. Smith. This was a habeas corpus sued out by James Dick, and directed to Wm. P. Smith, commanding him to produce before the Court the body of Mrs. Sarah Dick (formerly Sarah M'Nabb) who, it was alleged, was restrained of her liberty by Mr. Smith, and was the wife of the relator. On this day, Mr. Smith, attended by his counsel, Thomas S. Smith, esq., appeared in court to answer to the writ, and was also attended by Mrs. Sarah Dick. Mr. Joseph M. Doran, as counsel for Mr. Dick, stated to the court that it was a novel case, and one which loudly called upon them to interfere, in order that the marital rights and authority of his client might be vindicated and enforced; that Mr. Dick, who was an importing merchant of this city, and a gentleman of great worth and respectability, had been acquainted with Sarah McNabb for many years, and believing her to be a lady in all respects calculated to make him happy in the matrimonial state, wooed her, and after a courtship of three years, at length obtained her consent to unite her destiny with his by becoming his wife.

The wedding day which was to crown their felicity was fixed by the lady herself, and Mr. Dick provided ample means to furnish a house, entrusting entirely to her the selection of such articles as she deemed necessary to comfort, if not to luxury. A house was taken and every thing procured, under the direction of Mrs. Dick, and the fourth of September last being the day fixed upon by the lady, a wedding supper was prepared for that day, invitations sent out, and the bridesmaids strictly enjoined upon not to fail in their attendance at the appointed time. True to appointment, the bridesmaids and guests attended at the house, and the groom elect, with the whole company, proceeded in due order to the residence of a respectable Episcopal clergyman of this city, by whom the matrimonial knot was tied as fast as ceremony and form could make it, and the usual blessing was pronounced over Mr. and Mrs. Dick and their posterity to the latest period of recorded time. Thus united, and so attended by their mutual friends, the loving pair returned to their own house, where an ample supper was provided for the guests, of which all partook. Mr. Dick was all attention to his wife, and she all love and affection towards him, in short, they appeared to be the most fond and doting couple in the world, with the fairest prospect of winning and deserving the gammon of bacon which is awarded in the Manor of Dunmow to the man and his wife "who had not quarrelled, nor had either repented, nor had one offended the other, from the day of their marriage."

At 11 o'clock the bridesmaids had prepared the nuptial couch and were preparing to fling the stocking in proper form; and Mrs. Dick shortly after left the company down stairs, as all supposed for the bridal chamber—leaving behind her devoted lord, to await the joyous signal to pass the threshold of that mysterious place. The signal not being given in a reasonable time, the groom and company looked at each other with anxiety and astonishment, till at length inquiries were made, when, lo! it was discovered that the bride, instead of going up stairs, had secretly left the house, dressed and adorned as she was; but where she had gone, none could tell!

All was trouble and confusion, and Mr. Dick of course looked the very picture of despair. The company at length retired, and on the next morning it was ascertained that Mrs. Dick had gone the night before to the house of Mr. William P. Smith, with whom she lived before her marriage, as an assistant in domestic affairs, and where she is now staying. Mr. Dick endeavored to see her, but she refused to see him, acknowledging she was not his wife, and that she was resolved never to live with him; and he, finding that she would not return to his bed and board, and believing that undue influence had been exercised over her, and that she had been detained from him contrary to her real wishes, had sued out this writ of habeas corpus.

and it being alleged that she was not his wife, he desired his witnesses should be heard, and thought the court, after hearing them, would pronounce the marriage to be legal, and that she was no longer Sarah McNabb, but in verity Mrs. Sarah Dick, wife of James Dick. It was further stated that Mrs. Dick's conduct was disapproved of by her mother and sisters, and all her friends, all of whom desired her to return to her husband, who, in their opinion, was a deserving and estimable man.

Judge King—what return does Wm. P. Smith make to the writ?

Mr. Thomas S. Smith replied—That Mrs. Sarah Dick was not restrained of her liberty, and that she was now present in court to make the same answer.

Mr. Doran—I hope the whole question will be considered, and that the court will decide whether there was or was not a legal marriage; it would be better for both parties to have the question decided.

Judge King—we have no power to go beyond the return. Let the return be read, and then let us hear what Sarah Dick says.

The return was then read, and was as above stated; and Mrs. Sarah Dick was called before the court.—She is a small and stout young lady, with sparkling black eyes, and good features, and would be considered handsome by any one. She came forward, not at all abashed, and to the questions put to her by Judge King, answered distinctly that she was not restrained of her liberty, but remained at Mr. Smith's with her own consent.

Mr. Doran now desired to put some questions to her, which the court would not suffer to be put to her, considering that her declaration of not being restrained of her liberty was all that could be asked of her.

The case here ended, and a great many persons, including a number of well dressed ladies, went immediately out of the court room, evidently disappointed at the decision of the Judges.

"HOW TO GET ON."—THE APOTHECARY METHOD.

"Don't you see?" said Bob; "he goes up to a house rings the area bell, pokes a packet of medicine without a direct on into the servant's hand, and walks off. Servant takes it into the dining-parlor; master opens it and reads the label, 'Draught to be taken at 1 o'clock pills as before—lotion as usual—the powder. From Sawyer's late Nockemoff's. Physicians' prescriptions carefully prepared; and all the rest of it. Shows it to his wife—she reads the label; it goes down to the servants—they read the label. Next day the boy calls, 'Very sorry—his mistake—immense business—great many parcels to deliver—Mr. Sawyer's compliments—late Nockemoff.' The name gets known, and that's the thing, my boy in the medical way; bless your heart old fellow, its better than all the advertising in the world. We have got one four ounce bottle that's been to half the houses in Bristol, and hasn't done yet!"—From the Pickwick Papers.

CHRISTMAS FROIC.—On Monday evening a colored hack driver named Abraham Zabriskie, of 233 Walker street, about 6 o'clock drove his sleigh and pair before his own door, and while he went into the house for a moment to warm his fingers, along came a squad of "nice young men," five in number, whose names were Williams Smith, John Sullick, James Sherry, John Norris, and Isaac Norris. The bucks, just "by way of a lark," jumped into the sleigh and drove off at full speed. Instigated probably by St. Nicholas or some other rowdy saint, they came to the determination to increase their force by adding to the party a quota of ladies, and then, hey for Harlem! According to they drove to the corner of Willett and Delancy streets, where Miss Ann Ellis was taken in, next at the corner of Mulberry and Stanton streets they were joined by Miss Catharine Farrell, next at 64 Lewis street, the beautiful Miss Julia Smith joined the party, and arriving at the corner of Mulberry and Houston street, the last seat was filled by Miss Margaret Brady. The lash was now applied to the horses, and in a twinkling or so the merry party were on the Third Avenue on their way to Harlem. They stopped at Bradshaw's Hotel, where having partaken of some refreshments, they again took their seats in the sleigh, and with a "here she goes, and there she goes," started for 'tother side of York island, viz Manhattanville.

Meanwhile, matters and things were taking a different course "down town." Zabriskie soon learned that his horse and sleigh were gone, and presuming, as a matter of course, that the only drive the rowdies would take would be toward Harlem, he was not long in making up his mind as to what course to pursue.—He went forthwith to a brother whip, whom he engaged to drive him to Harlem, and pursuing the fugitives overtook them just as they were about dashing into the village of Manhattanville. Here, by the aid of the two officers, whom he had brought along with him, Zabriskie succeeded in securing Sullick, Smith, and Sherry, and three of the young ladies, all of whom were brought down to the city, and lodged for cool reflection, in the watch house. The two Norrises and the other lady made good their escape, and have not yet been heard from by the officers.

Yesterday morning the three young ladies were suffered by Justice Taylor, to return to their homes on their own recognizances to appear in court against their respective beaus, and Sullick, Smith and Sherry, were, in default of $300 bail each, committed on charge of stealing the horse and sleigh. Sherry subsequently procured the requisite bail, and was liberated.

ALBANY, SATURDAY, DEC. 28, 1839.

THE ANNUALS FOR 1840.—Noseaon within our recollection has brought a greater variety and more beauty of style, than is to be found in the annuals of 1840, at LITTLE'S Emporium of Literature. Those of our readers who intend to "give good gifts," to their friends, will find at this place every thing to gratify their taste. Among his splendid collection, we observe

The Poets of America, illustrated by one of her Painters, and edited by John Keese, with marginal and other embellishments scattered over its pages in great profusion, generally vivid and striking sketches of the letter press.

The Keepsake, large octavo, by Lady E. S. Wortley. Its line engravings are fit studies for the artist.

Oriental Annual.—Tales, legends and historical romances as usual illustrated in Finden's very best style from original sketches.

Heath's Book of Beauty, edited by the Countess of Blessington—its chief merit pictorial of course, which being every thing in such a book, is made to redeem its literary mediocrity.

Heath's Picturesque Annual, confined to illustrations of Windsor Castle and its environs, with historical descriptions and reminiscences by Leitch Ritchie.

The Belle of the Season (large quarto)—love tale, by the Countess of Blessington, illustrated by some splendid scenes in high life, from the pencil of C. A. Chalon.

Fisher's Drawing Room Scrap Book, with poetical illustration by L. E. L. and Mary Howitt.

Gems of Beauty, with illustrations in prose and verse by the Countess of Blessington.

Fisher's illustrations of Constantinople and its environs—a magnificent book, valuable for its historical as well as pictorial merit.

The Amaranth—original prose and verse, beautifully illustrated by distinguished artists. Large quarto.

The Iris of prose, verse, and art, edited by Mary Russell Mitford—engravings by Finden from paintings by J. Browne. Large quarto.

The book of the Boudoir, or the Court of Queen Victoria, being poetical illustrations accompanying portraits of the nobility, among them the Queen herself, by Finden, from a drawing by J. Lane. Large quarto.

Flora's Gems—a collection of bouquets, drawn and explored by James Andrews, with poetical illustrations. Large quarto. &c. &c. &c.

CONGRESS.—This Body have at length organized themselves, and we are enabled to give a few extracts the Message of the President. The all-engrossing political topic, the Sub-treasury, occupies a large portion of it. Hugh A. Garland, the former clerk, has been re-elected, and Mr. Dorsey, as Sergeant at-arms. Mr. Stanley of N. C. gave notice, that he should, at some future time, offer a resolution, that the public printing be done by contract, and given to the lowest bidder.

POISONING.—The New York papers contain a singular case of poisoning, which has created much excitement in that city, and which appears to be shrouded in mystery. On Saturday evening last, a woman in passing through Catherine market, gave one of the butchers a fancy cake, which he eat a part of, and divided the rest among those standing around. He was immediately taken sick, and has since died. The others, who partook of the cake, are lying dangerously ill. The woman, whose name is Phoebe Ann Simonson, has been arrested, together, with six other females. At the lodgings of Simonson, the saucer in which the cake was baked, has been found; and is undergoing annihilation, together with several mineral substances found on the premises.

At the annual meeting of Temple Chapter. No. 5, held at St. John's Hall, Dec. 25. 1839, the following Companions were elected officers, for the ensuing year:—

EXTRACTS FROM PRESIDENTS MESSAGE.

I regret that I cannot on this occasion congratulate you that the past year has been one of unalloyed prosperity. The ravages of fire and disease have painfully afflicted our otherwise flourishing portions of country, and serious embarrassments yet derange the trade of many of our cities. But, notwithstanding these adverse circumstances, that general prosperity which has been heretofore so bountifully bestowed upon us by the Author of all good, still continues to call for our warmest gratitude.

With foreign countries our relations exhibit the same favourable aspect which was presented in my last annual message and afford continued proof of the wisdom and of the pacific, just and forbearing policy adopted by the first Administration of the Federal government, and pursued by its successors.

For the settlement of our Northeastern boundary, the proposition promised by Great Britain for a commission of exploration and survey, has been received, and a counter project, including also a provision for a certain and final adjustment of the limits in dispute, is now before the British Government for its consideration. A just regard to the delicate state of this question, and a proper respect for the natural impatience of the state of Maine, not less than, a conviction that the negotiation has been already protracted longer than is prudent on the part of either government, have led me to believe that the present favorable moment should not on account be suffered to pass without putting the question forever at rest. I feel confident that the government of her Britannic Majesty will take the same view of this subject, as I am persuaded it is governed by desires equally strong and sincere, for the amicable termination of the controversy.

There is every reason to believe that disturbances like those which lately agitated the neighboring British Provinces, will not again prove the sources of border contention, or interpose obstacles to the continuance of that good understanding which it is the mutual interest of Great Britain and the United States to preserve and maintain.

Within the provinces themselves tranquility is restored, and on our frontier, that misguided sympathy in favor of what was deemed to be a general effort in behalf of popular rights, and which, in some instances misled a few of our more inexperienced citizens, has subsided into a rational conviction strongly opposed to all intermeddling with the internal affairs of our neighbors.

Nothing has occurred to disturb the harmony of our intercourse with Austria, Belgium, Denmark, France, Naples, Portugal, Prussia, Russia, or Sweden. The internal state of Spain has sensibly improved, and a well grounded hope exists that the return of peace will restore to the people of that country their former prosperity, and enable the government to fulfil all its obligations at home and abroad. The government of Portugal, I have the satisfaction to state, has paid in full the eleventh and last instalment due to our citizens for the claims embraced in the settlement made with it on the third of March, 1827.

I regret to be obliged to inform you that no convention for the settlement of the claims of our citizens upon Mexico has yet been ratified by the Government of that country.

The financial operations of the government, during the present year have I am happy to say, been very successful. The difficulties under which the Treasury Department has labored, from known defects in the existing laws relative to the safe keeping of the public monies, aggravated by the suspension of specie payments by several of the banks holding public deposits, or indebted to public officers for notes received in payment of public dues, have been surmounted to a very gratifying extent. The large current expenditures have been punctually met, and the faith of the Government in all its pecuniary concerns, has been scrupulously maintained.

The latest accounts from the Exploring Expedition represents it as proceeding successfully in its objects, and promising results no less useful to trade and navigation than to science.

The revenue of the Post Office Department for the year ending with the 30th of June last, was four million four hundred and seventy-six thousand six hundred and thirty-eight dollars—exhibiting an increase over the preceding year of two hundred and forty-one thousand five hundred and sixty dollars. The engagements and liabilities of the Department for the same period are four million six hundred and twenty-four thousand one hundred and seventeen dollars.

I have heretofore assigned to the Congress my reasons for believing that the establishment of an Independent National Treasury, as contemplated by the Constitution, is necessary to the sole action of the Federal Government. The suspension of specie payments in 1837, by the banks having the custody of the public money, showed to so alarming degree our dependence on those institutions for the performance of duties required by law, that I then recommended the entire dissolution of that connection. This recommendation has been subjected, as I dared it should be to severe scrutiny and animated discussion; and I allow myself to believe that, notwithstanding the natural diversities of opinion which may be anticipated on all subjects involving such important considerations, it has secured in its favor as general a concurrence of public sentiment as could be expected on one of such magnitude.

Recent events have also continued to develop new objections to such a connection. Seldom is any bank under the existing system and practice able to meet, on demand, all its liabilities for deposits and notes in circulation. It maintains specie payments, and transacts a profitable business, only by the confidence of the public in its solvency; and whenever this is destroyed, the demand of its depositors and noteholders—pressed more rapidly than it can make collections from its debtors—force it to stop payment. This loss of confidence with its consequences occurred in 1837 and afforded the apology of the banks for their suspension. The public then acquiesced in the validity of the excuse; and, while the State Legislature, did not exact from them their forfeited charters, Congress in accordance with the recommendation of the Executive, allowed them time to pay over the public money they held, although compelled to issue Treasury notes to supply the deficiency thus created.

It now appears that there are other motives than a want of public confidence under which the banks seek to justify themselves in a refusal to meet their obligations. Scarcely were the country and government relieved, in a degree, from the difficulties occasioned by the general suspension of 1837, when a partial one, occurring within thirty months of the former, produced new and serious embarrassments, though it had no palliation in such circumstances as were alleged in justification of that which had previously taken place.—There was nothing in the condition of the country to endanger a well managed banking institution; commerce was deranged by no foreign war; every branch of manufacturing industry was crowned with rich rewards; and the more than usual abundance of our harvests, after supplying our domestic wants, had left our granaries and store houses filled with a surplus for exportation. It is in the midst of this that an irredeemable and depreciated paper currency is entailed upon the people by a large portion of the banks. They are not driven to it by the exhibition of a loss of public confidence, or of a sudden pressure from their depositors or note-holders, but they excuse themselves by alleging that the current of business, and exchange with foreign countries, which draws the precious metals from their vaults, would require, in order to meet it, a large curtailment of their loans to a comparatively small portion of the community, than it will be convenient for them to bear, or perhaps safe for the banks to exact. The plea has ceased to be one of necessity.—Convenience and policy are now deemed sufficient to warrant these institutions in disregarding their solemn obligations. Such conduct is not merely an injury to individual creditors, but it is a wrong to the whole community, from whose liberality they hold most va-uable privileges—whose rights they violate, whose business they derange, and value of whose property they render unstable and insecure.—It must be evident that this new ground for bank suspensions, in reference to which their action is not only disconnected with, but wholly independent of, that of the public, gives a character to their suspensions more alarming than any which they exhibited before, and greatly increases the impropriety of relying on the banks in the transactions of the Government.

A WRETCH.—The West Chester (Pa.) Record says, some demon in human form entered the stable of Mr. Setzler, in Coventry township, on the night of the third inst. and poisoned one of his horses, and cut off his mane and tail, and about four inches of the tongue of another horse. The unfeeling, unmanly and degraded perpetrator of this act, left a paper on the partition wall, of which written, "Don't spite me any more." Low and despicable must be the brute who could inflict such wanton cruelty.

Those Brethren who subscribed the prospectus for the Masonic Register, by me circulated, and who have not paid for the same to me, or Br. Mix, will oblige me much by sending the same to Br. L. G. Hoffman, by mail. The Post Masters, are authorised to send such money free of postage.

LIGHT! LIGHT! LIGHT!!! REMEDY FOR THE TIMES. G. W. Knowlton & Co., Manufacturers of Camphine Oil Lamps, Spirit Gas Lamps, Oil Lamps, &c. Feel grateful for favors hitherto received. Respectfully acquaint their friends and the public that they have a good assortment of lamps of all kinds, from one dollar upwards to suit the emergency of the times. They therefore respectfully invite those who are desirous of studying economy in lighting their stores, houses, &c., by the most brilliant and cheap light, to call and examine their neat and well manufactured lamps, which have given universal satisfaction to the many thousands who now use them. Remember that by adopting these lamps, you have a better light, and save on an average 50 per cent. They would also say to the public, that they can always depend upon a first rate article of Camphine Oil, and Spirit Gas, as they manufacture it themselves.

THE MOORISH MAID.

'Neath the shade of von stately tree,
See'st thou that lovely Moorish girl,
And mark her high and lofty brow
Where clusters many a waving curl.

But why pillowed on that dimpled hand
Thy head with glossy ringlets dressed,
And why that eye intently fixed
On yonder silvery lake at rest.

In that smooth lake that looks so calm,
She sees in "fancy's wide domain,"
A lover with devoted heart
Who ever constant did remain.

But he was of the Christian creed,
And could he ever dare aspire
To obtain the hand of that lovely girl,
From her proud Mahometan sire.

No—he had hoped, but vain was hope,
For her he was forbid to name,
His creed, he ne'er could sacrifice
Nor see her by another claimed.

'Twas thus he mused as he wandered by
That lake so beautiful and fair,
"Why not plunge in and thus relieve My aching heart from all its care."

Ere pondering o'er the fearful step,
He plunged—and that fair girl is left
To mourn his sad untimely end,
And of her fondest hopes bereft.

FLORA.

THE SPIRIT'S MYSTERIES.

The power that dwelleth in sweet songs to waken
Vague yearnings, like the sailor's from the shore.
And dim remembrances, whose hue seems taken
From some bright former state, our own no more;
Is not this all a mystery? who shall say
Whence are those thoughts, and whither tends their way!

The sudden images of vanish'd things,
That o'er the spirit flash, we know not why;
Tones from some broken harp's deserted strings,
Warm sunset hues of Summers long gone by;
A rippling wave—the dashing of an oar,—
A flower scent floating past our parents' door;

A word—scarce noted in its hour perchance,
Yet back returning with a plaintive tone;
A smile—a sunny or a mournful glance,
Full of sweet meaning now from this world flown,—
Are not these mysteries, when to life they start,
And press vain Spring showers from the blighted heart.

And the far wanderings of the soul in dreams,
Calling up shrouded faces from the dead,
And with them bringing soft or solemn gleams,
Familiar objects brightly to o'erspread,
And waking buried love, or joy, to fear—
These are night's mysteries—who shall make them clear.

And the strange inborn sense of coming ill.
That sometimes whispers to the haunted breast,
In a low sighing tone which naught can still,
'Mid feasts and melodies a secret guest;—
Whence doth that murmur come, that shadow fall?
Why shakes the spirit thus?—'tis mystery all!

Darkly we move—we press upon the brink
Haply of unseen worlds, and know it not!
Yes! it may be, that nearer than we think,
Are those whom death hath parted from our lot,
Fearfully, wonderously, our souls are made—
Let us walk humbly on, yet undismay'd.

Humbly—for knowledge strives in vain to feel
Her way among these marvels of the mind;
Yet undismay'd—for do they not reveal
Th' immortal nature with our dust entwined?
So let us deem! and ev'n the tears they wake
Shall then be bless'd for that high Nature's sake.

THE CATEATER.

A new version of the "Three Black Crows," of Smollet.

Though facts will swell as stories fly,
Till truth o'erstretched becomes a lie;
The tell tale here, no legend frames,
Which more than mod'rate credence claims:
Nor bouncer like, a fiction broaches
For those who swallowed lies like Loaches.
Nor sceptic dreads, whose scowling eye
At aught uncommon darts the lie.
John Trot, a homespun country putt
Jack Sly one morning met full but,
Who starting, star'd and stamm'ring said,
Lord! Juh—huh—John! what an't you dead!
Dead! why? says John,—dear heart quoth Sly,
Don't rave, I'll tell the reason why;
Dick Bam declares, (who saw the sight)
You eat up three live cats last night.
Eat three live cats, quoth John, odd rot it,
Prime news! I wonder where he got it!
But I'll soon know,—so speeds to Bam,
Who flatly swore 'twas all a sham.
I could not say, quoth Dick, that you
Had eat three cats, 'twas only two;
Two, in the devil's name and who
Has told, says Trot, this tale to you?
Bob Banter! Oh! he did, quoth John,
I'll make him change his note anon,
So he's to Banter all agog.
Whom thus he greets. You stand'ring dog,
Who rake up lies to gull the flats,
Did I, last night eat two live cats?
Two, replies Banter, that's rare fun!
Eat me if I said more than one:
Than one, and zounds it why said that?
Why say that I eat one live cat!
Your brother told me so, says Bob,
If so, says John I'll jolt his nob;
So off went Cain in quest of Abel,
With mind whose index lack'd no label,
As frowning brow and flashing eye,
To John's intents ne'er gave the lie;
And had he then met Tom his brother,
Death might have levell'd one or t'other.
But fortunately John thus fooled,
No brother found till passion cool'd,
When lighting then on tat'ling Tom
He cried, where got'st thou that tale from?
Plague on thy tongue thou foul mouth'd brat
That I last night eat up a cat?
A cat says Tom, your spitt'ling spare,
A Puss I said, a fine fat Hare,
Mother herself here told me that.
You lie you Dog nor hare nor cat,
Quoth old Dame Trot, so dinna blab it.
I only said John eat a Rabbit,
And that's a truth I pledge my life,
For here's my author John's own wife.
When John's meek spouse demurely rose,
And said good friends this contest close,
For sure as families increase by marriage,
Stories will always breed in carriage:
And though three cats of English breed,
'Tis said poor John dispatch'd with speed,
John supp'd, as oft he's supped before,
On one Welsh Rabbit,—nothing more.

THE COTTAGE DOOR.

BY T. E. HARVEY, ESQ.

How sweet the rest that labor yields
The humble and the poor,
Where sits the patriarch of the fields
Before his cottage door!
The lark is singing in the sky,
The swallow in the eaves,
And love is beaming in each eye,
Beneath the summer leaves!

The air amid his fragrant bowers,
Supplies unpurchased health,
And hearts are bounding 'mid the flowers,
More dear to him than wealth;
Peace, like the blessed sunlight, plays
Around his humble cot,
And happy nights and cheerful days,
Divide his lowly lot!

And when the village Sabbath bell,
Rings out upon the gale,
The father bows his head to tell
The music of its tale.—
A fresher verdure seems to fill
The fair and dewy sod,
And every infant tongue is still,
To hear the Word of God!

Oh! happy hearts!—To him who stills
The ravens when they cry,
And makes the lily 'neath the hills
So glorious to the eye.
The trusting patriarch prays, to bless
His labor with increase:—
Such 'ways are ways of pleasantness,
And all such 'paths are peace.'

THE STRANGER'S HEART.

The stranger's heart! oh, wound it not!
A yearning anguish is its lot;
In the green shadow of thy tree
The stranger finds no rest with thee.

Thou think'st the vine's low rustling leaves
Glad music round thy household eaves;
To him that sound hath sorrow's tone—
The stranger's heart is with his own.

Thou think'st thy children's laughing play
A lovely sight at fall of day!
Then are the stranger's thoughts oppress—
His mother's voice comes o'er his breast.

Thou think'st it sweet when friend to friend
Beneath one roof in prayer may blend;
Then doth the stranger's eye grow dim—
Far, far are those who pray'd with him.

Thy hearth, thy home, thy vintage land—
The voices of thy kindred band;
Oh, 'midst them all when blest thou art,
Deal gently with the stranger's heart!

THE BETTER LAND.

"I hear thee speak of the better land,
Thou call'st its children a happy band;
Mother! oh where is that radiant shore?
Shall we not seek it, and weep no more?
Is it where the flower of the orange blows,
And the fire-flies glance through the myrtle boughs?"
—"Not there, not there, my child!"

"Is it where the feathery palm trees rise,
And the date grows ripe under sunny skies?
Or midst the green islands of glittering seas,
Where fragrant forests perfume the breeze,
And strange, bright birds, on their starry wings,
Bear the rich hues of all glorious things?"
—"Not there, not there, my child!"

"Is it far away, in some region old,
Where the rivers wander o'er sands of gold?
Where the burning rays of the ruby shine,
And the diamond lights up the secret mine,
And the pearl gleams forth from the coral strand,
Is it there, sweet mother, that better land?"
—"Not there, not there, my child!"

"Eye hath not seen it, my gentle boy!
Ear hath not heard its deep songs of joy;
Dreams cannot picture a world so fair—
Sorrow and death may not enter there;
Time doth not breathe on its fadeless bloom,
Far beyond the clouds, and beyond the tomb,
—It is there, it is there, my child!"

PARMELEE'S STOVE.—This truly unprecedented stove has won to itself the acknowledged superiority over all other extant, from its simplicity of arrangement its complete combination of every thing desirable in a cooking stove, being equally adapted to burn either wood or coal at a saving of 30 per cent in either kind of fuel. Those who have heretofore conceived any objections to using coal for culinary operations, will be perfectly satisfied of the utility of these stoves by calling at No. 5 Green st., Albany. Every stove will be warranted to give satisfaction, or the purchase money will be refunded. For sale only by the subscribers, at No. 5 Green street.

THE HISTORY OF FREEMASONRY,

DRAWN FROM AUTHENTIC SOURCES OF INFORMATION.

No. VIII.

It is not, however, upon speculative principles alone that we can account for the confessions and subsequent recantations of the Knights. There are, fortunately, some historical facts which furnish a rational explanation of their conduct; but which Barruel, either from ignorance or design, has totally overlooked.—About the commencement of the whole affair, Molay, the Grand Master of the order, had been examined at Paris. From the causes which we have already explained, but, particularly, from a dread of those tortments to which an obstinate avowal of his innocence would expose him, he made every confession which his persecutors demanded; but he, at the same time, transmitted circular letters to an immense number of his brethren, requesting them to make the same confessions with himself: (a) for it was only by simultaneous conduct, that they could hope to disarm the fury of their enemies, and avert the blow which was threatened to their order. Agreeably to the request of Molay, many of the Templars made the same acknowledgements; while others, whose morality was more inflexible, and whose courage was more undaunted, disdained to do evil, that good might come, and persisted unto death in the avowal of their own innocence, and that of their order. Molay, however, and those knights who had followed his example, soon perceived, that though their submissions had protected them from injury as individuals, they had, nevertheless, rather inflamed the rage of Philip against the order; and, being now convinced, that their acknowledgements of guilt had produced an effect opposite to what they expected, they boldly retracted their former avowals, and adopted that intrepid conduct of which we have already given a short account. There is another circumstance connected with this part of our subject, which though not taken notice of by historians, is well deserving of the reader's attention. It is asserted by all contemporary writers, whether the friends or adversaries of the Templars, that all those knights who maintained their innocence, were condemned either to death, or to a punishment equally severe while all who confessed, and adhered to their confessions, were either completely acquitted, or sentenced to a few days' fasting and prayer, or a short imprisonment. (b) It is allowed also by these historians, and even by Barruel, that a very considerable number of the Templars were altogether ignorant of the crimes perpetrated by the rest, and that some who were privy to them were not partakers in their guilt. In which class, then, are we to rank these innocent men? Among those who suffered, or among those who were saved? If among the former, their enemies were guilty of the most flagrant injustice and cruelty, in consuming the innocent on the same pile with the guilty. If among the latter, they must have been compelled to confess themselves guilty of crimes of which they were completely innocent.

In order to show that the confessions of the Templars were voluntary, and not extorted by the rack, Barruel is obliged to deny facts which are admitted by every historian. But, lest his readers should not be so sceptical on that point as himself, he takes care to inform them, that the bishops declared, that all whose confessions were extorted by the rack, should be regarded as innocent, and that no Templar should be subject to it; Clement V. rather favoured the Templars, and that he sent the most venerable persons to interrogate those, whose age and infirmities prevented them from appearing before him. But who, pray, were these aged and infirm Templars to whom Clement is so compassionate? Were they men who were smarting under diseases inflicted by the hand of heaven. Were they men whose aged limbs were unfit for the fatigues of a journey, or whose gray hairs had excited the pity of the Roman Pontiff? No—they were a few undaunted knights whom the blood extorting screws of their tormentors had tortured and disabled; whose flesh had lacerated on the rack, and whose bones had been disjoined, or broken on the wheel. These are the men, who, in the language of the above writer, were prevented by their age and infirmities from travelling to Poitiers, or who, in the more simple style of the Pope himself, were unable to ride on horseback, or to bear any other method of conveyance whatsoever. Such was that madness of Clement which Barruel applauds! And such too, we may add, the integrity of Barruel!

Having thus endeavoured to vindicate the character of our ancestors from the accusations of their enemies, it will be necessary to make a few remarks respecting the ceremonial observances which are attributed to them and their posterity, by the author of the memoirs of Jacobinism. But this, our enemies well know, is forbidden ground, on which Freemasons are prohibited to enter by the laws of their order. It is here, consequently, that the most numerous, and apparently the most successful attacks have been made, for we can be provided with no means of defence without laying open the mysteries of the fraternity. Concessions of the disadvantages under which Freemasons labour, their adversaries have fabricated the most frightful and foolish ceremonies, and imposed them upon the world as the ceremonies of Masonry. Among his number, may be reckoned those rites and oaths which Barruel ascribes to the Templars and their posterity, but which, we solemnly aver, have no connection either with the one or the other; and, were we permitted to divulge to the world the whole of our ritual system, many who have duped the public by deceitful information, would stand abashed at their conduct, while others, who have confided in such information, would be astonished at the extent of their credulity. They might Freemasons defy, as they have done, in every other point, the fabrications of the malicious and the conjectures of the ignorant. Then, too, might they mock at the ingenuity of the wise. But, as they are bound to preserve from public view the rites of the order, it is highly disingenuous to assail them in a quarter where resistance is impossible, and where every unprincipled man triumphs with impunity. Is not this to assassinate an enemy with his hands tied behind his back? Is not this to reproach a foe who is deprived of the organs of utterance?

But there is another important consideration, which while it points out in a more striking manner the dishonesty of such an assault, shews at the same time, in the most undeniable manner, to reject every calumny as unwarrantable, arising from reports concerning their rites and ceremonies. If ever the secrets of Freemasonry were betrayed, they must have been betrayed by men who were completely destitute of religious principle; who paid no respect to those ties which unite the members of civil, as well as secret associations; who, in short, neither feared God, nor regarded man. Suppose, then, that a person, pretending to be a Freemason, offered to communicate, either to an individual, or to the public, the rites and ceremonies of his order. What degree of credit should men of probity attach to the information which might in this way receive! A person addresses them under the character of a perjurer, offering to violate the most solemn engagements, and to divulge mysteries which have been concealed for ages. He may give them accurate information, or he may not. If the secrets which he offers to betray, have been hitherto unknown, there is no possible way of ascertaining the truth of his deposition. And it is rather to be suspected, that he will dupe his auditors by false information, than trample upon an engagement, guarded by the most awful sanctions. He might, indeed, confirm by an oath, the truth of his asseveration; but, as he must have violated an oath equally solemn, no man of sense will give him the smallest credit. But, supposing that he really divulges the secrets and ceremonies of Freemasonry, it is clear that he has not understood their true import, or, at least, that they have made no impression upon his mind. It is almost certain, therefore, that, from ignorance, or misapprehension of their meaning, he will exhibit, under an aspect calculated to excite ridicule, those rites and ceremonies, which, if properly explained, would command admiration. If then it be so difficult for the uninitiated to discover the secrets of Freemasonry, and still more so to ascertain their significations if they should discover them, what must we think of those men who open their ears to every slanderous tale against Freemasons, which unprincipled men may impose upon their credulity?—What must we think of those who reproach and vilify our order, upon the uncertain reports of cunning and interested men? We appeal to the impartial reader, if they are not equally base with the informers themselves.

Such are the considerations by which we would attempt to repel those charges and distorted facts, with which Barruel has calumniated the character, and disfigured the history of the Templars. They will be sufficient, we hope, to remove those erroneous impressions which the perusal of the memoirs of Jacobinism may have left upon the reader's mind. Although we have adopted the opinion of those who maintain the innocence of that unfortunate order, we cannot coincide with them in believing, that, as individuals, they were free from blame. The Templars were possessed of the same corrupted nature, and influenced by the same passions as their fellow men: and they were, unquestionably, exposed to more strong and numerous temptations. Some of the knights, therefore, may have been guilty of crimes, and these too of an aggravated kind, which, by a strange, though not uncommon mistake, might have been transferred to their order.—But it was never proved that they were traitors, child-murders, regicides, and infidels. A certain class of historians, indeed, have imputed to them such iniquities, and, when unable to establish their assertions, have fixed upon their order the more probable crimes of drunkenness and debauchery. But, amidst all these accusations, we hear nothing of that valour which raised the Templars to pre-eminence; nothing of that charity and beneficence which procured them the respect of cotemporaries; nothing of that fortitude and patience which most of them exhibited on the rack, and in the flames. In their case it has been too true, that

The evil which men do, lives after them;
The good is oft interred with their bones.

But, allowing the Templars to be as guilty as their enemies have represented them. Upon what principles of sound reasoning, or common sense, does Barruel transfer their guilt to the fraternity of Freemasons? Is it absolutely necessary, that the son should inherit the bodily diseases, and the mental debility of his fore-fathers; or is it fair, that one order, proposing to itself the same object, and instituted upon the same principles as another, should be charged also with the same crimes? Certainly not. If virtue and vice were hereditary qualities, we might arrogate to ourselves much honor from our connection with the Templars. But, as we have not been applauded for a Templar's virtues we should not be reproached for a Templar's crimes. But the reasoning of Barruel is as repugnant to the dictates of experience, as it is to those of common sense. Were not the inhabitants of England, at one period, fanatics, rebels, and regicides? But where now is the nation that is more liberal in its religion, and more steady in its loyalty! Did not the French, at one time, torture, burn, and massacre their fellow citizens, from the fury of their religious zeal, and the strength of their attachment to the catholic communion? But what nation under heaven is at present less influenced by religious principles, and less attached to the church of Rome. Did not the rulers of France, at one time, torment and assassinate hundreds of the Templars, because they deemed them infidels, traitors, and regicides? And have we not seen, in these latter days the very rulers of France themselves, infidels, traitors, and regicides. But if the impartial reader should, upon farther inquiry, give credit to the guilt of the Templars; in order to remove the imputed stain which has been transferred to Freemasons, it may be sufficient to address him in the words of the poet.

Tempora mutantur, et nos mutamur in illis.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

SPIRIT OF DISCOVERY.

TO STAIN PAPER OR PARCHMENT.

Yellow. Paper may be stained a beautiful yellow by the tincture of turmeric formed by infusing an ounce or more of the root, powdered, in a pint of spirit of wine. This may be made to give any tint of yellow, from the lightest straw to the full color, called French yellow, and will be equal in brightness even to the best dyed silks. If yellow be wanted of a warmer or redder cast, anatho, dragon's blood must be added. The best manner of using these, and the following tinctures, is to spread them even on the paper, or parchment, by means of a broad brush, in the same manner as varnish.

Crimson. A very fine crimson stain may be given to paper by a tincture of the Indian-lake, which may be made by infusing the lake some days in spirit of wine, and then pouring off the tincture from the dregs. It may also be stained of a scarlet hue by the tincture of dragon's blood in spirit of wine, but this will not be bright.

Green. Paper or parchment may be stained green, by the solution of verdigris in vinegar, or by the crystals of verdigris dissolved in water.

Orange. Stain the paper or parchment first of a full yellow, by means of the tincture of turmeric; then brush it over with a solution of fixed alkali salt, made by dissolving half an ounce of pearlashes or salt of tartar, in a quart of water, and filtering the solution.

Purple. Paper or parchment may be stained purple by archil or by the tincture of logwood.

The juice of ripe privet berries expressed will likewise give a purple dye.

To dye horns of different color. Black is performed by steeping brass in aquafortis till it is turned green, with this the horn is to be washed once or twice and then put into a warm decoction of logwood and water.

Green is begun by boiling it; &c. in alum-water, then with verdigris, ammoniac and white wine vinegar, keeping it hot therein till sufficiently green.

Red is begun by boiling it in alum-water, then with verdigris, ammoniac, and finished by decoction in a liquor compounded of quicklime steeped in rain water, strained, and to every pint an ounce of Brazil wood added. In this decoction the horns are to be boiled till sufficiently red.

Horns receive a deep black stain from a solution of silver. It ought to be diluted to such a degree as not sensibly to corrode the subject, and applied two or three times if necessary, at considerable intervals, the matter being exposed as much as possible to the sun, to hasten the appearance and deepening of the color.

To Write on Paper with Gold or Silver.

Make a sizing as strong as will flow freely from the pen, by dissolving equal quantities of gum Arabic and loaf sugar in water; write with this on paper and let it dry; then moisten the paper by breathing on it, or by holding it over hot water, and immediately lay pieces of gold or silver leaf on the lines of the writing, pressing them down gently with a dry hard pencil. Allow the sizing to dry again, and then brush off the superfluous gold or silver with cotton. The writing may be burnished, and will present a beautiful appearance.

THE NATURALIST.

NATURE AND HABITS OF THE HONEY BEE.

The queen resembles neither of the other bees in structure; she is about eight lines and a half in length, while the males are seven, and the workers six. Her abdomen is longer in proportion and increases much when filled with eggs; her wings so short as scarcely to reach past the third ring and her colour tends to a deep yellow. The slowness, or even gravity of her march, her stature, and above all, the various homage paid her by the bees, characterise her in a distinguishing manner.

"We can scarce believe," says a writer, "what our eyes have witnessed on observing the regard and assiduous of the nenters for the beloved queen." She resides in the interior of the hive, and seldom, if ever, departs from her station, unless when she leads out a new swarm. When any alarm is given by knocking the hive, the queen advances to the entrance, and some persons have a facility of taking her without injury, and the whole swarm on missing her will follow wherever she is carried. The government of the bees is termed republican, although it resembles more the monarchical, as a single personage, the queen governs the whole. She is likewise their mother in the strictest sense. Among 20, or 25,000 bees of which a hive frequently consists, the queen is the only one that breeds; and it is to this prerogative that she is indebted for the extreme love and affection which she enjoys from her subjects. This respect and obedience are truly remarkable. She is almost continually attended by a circle of bees, who devote themselves to her service, some present her with honey, others pass their trunk lightly over her body in order to remove from it any thing that may be offensive. When she walks, those that are in her passage, range themselves in a respectful manner to make way for her. They either know or appear to know, that these procedure has an important object in view, that of augmenting the number of their citizens. The queen being the parent of the hive, it is from her alone, that a complete swarm composed of queens, drones and workers, can proceed; and without all these different members of the community, it cannot either lay up stores or be preserved in existence. That bees are propagated by means of eggs which are hatched into worms, could not be unknown from times of the most remote antiquity; but no point in the natural history of animals has been more keenly contested than their precise mode of generation.

Forty-six hours after impregnation, the queen begins laying eggs, which will become workers; and and provided impregnation takes place within the first twenty days of her existence, thousands are produced uninterruptedly during the succeeding eleven months.

Then she commences laying eggs, which will be drones.

A single copulation is sufficient to impregnate all the eggs which a queen will lay in two years, or, perhaps the whole that she will lay during her life. The laying of a queen is retarded, or altogether interrupted, by cold; and one impregnated in the end of October, has been known to retain her eggs four months and a half, owing to the intervention of winter. This queen during March and April, laid about 3000 eggs, producing males only, and so very prolific are these insects, that a single queen may be mother of 12,000 bees, or more, in the space of two months, which is laying at the rate of 200 eggs daily. The queen, before depositing an egg, examines whether the cell is clean, and fit to receive it, and also suitable to its future condition; for queens, males and workers have cells peculiarly adapted to their kind, and the queen by anticipation, seems aware which of these will proceed from the egg, she deposits. Those producing workers, are deposited in hexagonal horizontal cells; the cells of the drones are somewhat irregular in their form, but the cells containing the eggs, intended to produce queens, are large, circular and hang perpendicularly in the hive. When the egg is laid, the bees supply the cell with the pollen of flowers, which serves to feed the young worm coming from it. The eggs of all the three kinds of bees, are hatched in three days; a worker remains five days in the vermicular state, a male six and a half; and a queen five. The worker's worm occupies thirty-six hours in spinning its silken envelope, or cocoon; in three days, it changes to a nymph; and only on the twentieth day of its existence, does it become a complete or perfect winged animal. The drones are still longer in attaining their lost metamorphosis, which succeeds in twenty-four days after the egg has been laid. But the queen comes to perfection in six days. Food is carried by the bees to the worms as they require it; but when ready to be transformed to a nymph, they are aware that it is no longer necessary; on the contrary, the mouth of the cell is sealed with a covering of the wax, formed of concentric circles from the hedge, convex, if including males, and flat, if including workers. The same cell may successfully bring different workers to maturity; after one has left it, the bees clean the inside, and the mother again lays there; but the cells containing eggs which become queens, are used no more than once.

Immediately on the loss, or removal of the queen, the whole hive is a scene of tumult and disorder: the bees seem to anticipate their own destruction, by the precaution they take to guard against it. Should there be neither eggs nor brood in the combs, they will infallibly perish; their instinctive faculties are lost, they have no object for which their labors are united; they cease to collect honey and prepare wax, and in a short time they disappear and die. But if there be brood in the combs, the industry of the bees continues unabated; for by the proceeding which they follow, they know that their loss will be repaired. Having selected a worm, three days old, or less, they sacrifice three of the contiguous cells, that the cell of the worm may be formed into one adapted to breed a queen. They next supply it with the necessary food, which is not the common farina, pollen or bee bread, on which the young workers feed, but a peculiar paste or jelly, of a pungent taste, which is reserved for queens alone. When reached maturity, a queen comes forth, qualified to fulfil every indispensable function on which the preservation of many thousand lives depend. Working bees have therefore the power of effecting the metamorphosis of one of their own species, to avert the effects of a loss, which would prove the utter ruin of the whole colony. The sole function of the queen bee is, to perpetuate her species: but single, and unassisted by the workers, herself and her offspring would perish. Her fecundity is surprising. Swammerdam affirms, that she contains 50,000 eggs; and some authors advance, that she may be the mother of 100,000 bees in one season. In addition to the peculiarities, exhibited in her propagating young, she is marked by others of the most conspicuous description. She is watched and attended to; and to judge from appearances, sheltered and respected by the workers. Groups of them constantly encircle her; they supply her with honey, brush and lick her limbs; whenever she moves, they recede before her; and, according to the united sentiments of all, who have studied the nature of bees, pay her, what would be called real homage, could we allow them the prerogative of understanding. She is the object of the greatest attachment; her presence inspires them with new instincts, and animates them to labour; the permanent existence of a queen, in short, is the only security of the workers.

EDUCATION.

DISTRICT LIBRARIES.

The following from the Evening Journal, is doubtless from the Superintendent of Common Schools, conveys information of importance to school districts which have not expended their library appropriation:—

There appears to be some apprehension that School Districts may lose their library money the ensuing year, in cases where, from insuperable difficulties, they have not been able to expend, in the purchase of books, the moneys received during the present year. We have applied to the proper source for information, and the following is the result of our inquiries. The act of 1838, in relation to the income of the U. S. Deposit Fund, appropriated 55,000 dollars annually, to be applied to the purchase of District Libraries, upon the like conditions as the school moneys are distributed. One of the conditions is, the actual expenditure of the money received in one year before calling for the amount to be paid the ensuing year; and as the first payment was made in 1839, it was required by the law to be expended in that year. Notice of this condition, was given in June, 1838, by Gen. Dix, the then Superintendent, and the same notice has been twice given since, once in a Circular on the 26th February, and again in a Circular on the 10th of May last. So that if there be any impracticability in the matter, it is not for want of abundant notice, nor does it arise from any Circulars of the Superintendents; but it is in the law itself.

There doubtless are and will be difficulties to prevent a strict compliance with the law. The Legislature of 1839 anticipated them and made provision by the 6th section of the act of April 15th, to guard against any loss or injury, in consequence, by authorizing the Superintendent to allow the payment of library money to delinquent districts, according to the circumstances of the case. We doubt not this authority will be liberally exercised in favor of all districts in which there has not been gross and wilful neglect. And to enable him to exercise the discretion given by the Statute, the commissioners of Common Schools are required by the 14th regulation, issued on the 10th of May last, to report to him every case in which they withhold library money and the circumstances. They are not to distribute such money in any way, without the directions of the Superintendent, but are to keep it on hand until such directions are given. If it should become necessary, doubtless the Legislature will pass a general law on the subject, extending the time for the expenditure of the money received in 1839.

As there are many districts in the state, that feel a deep interest in this subject, an acceptable service may be rendered them by re-publishing this statement or its substance, in the newspapers of the State generally.

THE GATHERER

TENDER-HEARTED LANDLORD.

James, said a worthy merchant on Main street to his clerk the other morning: Go down to Water street, to Mr. —, and tell him his rent must be paid to day, I can't wait any longer, as he's already two quarters in arrears.

The clerk obeyed the direction, and soon came back with great appearance of milkiness about the eyes.

'Mrs. — wants to see you, Sir, about the rent, very much, Sir.'

The merchant happily was at leisure, and went at once to visit his tenant. He found him extended upon a coarse bed, in an insensible stage of a dangerous malady. His wife was busy over a scanty fire; apparently preparing some simple aliment for her sick husband. Three little children sat shivering in the corner. His approach was unnoticed.

'Ma,' said one of the little urchins, 'when be you going to get breakfast!'

'Breakfast, my dear child, that is more than I can tell.'

The merchant advanced.

'My good woman—my good woman—ahem—that is,—and the worthy man felt very much like choking. He grasped his pocket-book convulsively, and laid some bills upon the table—he opened the door and disappeared.

'James,' said he again to his clerk, 'take this order to Mr. —, and tell him to have the provisions delivered immediately.'

The merchant felt much better than he would have done, if he got his rent. There is something in a good action that makes one's heart feel lighter.—warmer—better. We would publish the good man's name, but we know he would dislike it and we would not for all the world offend him.

BEAUTY.

How often do we hear men eager in the pursuit of partners for life, inquire for beautiful women: and yet how brief the existence of what they see, and how unproductive of happiness in its possession.

We know full well the satisfaction that sleeps beneath the snow white lids of a beautiful eye: in the haughty curl of an exquisite lip, in the blush of a rose that leaps into the budding cheek; and the fine turn of a swan like neck, the gentle motions of a symmetrical form, or on the shadowy redundancy of dark and beautifully flowing tresses. The hearts of the young and passionate leap gladly, and are filled with impulses whilst gazing upon these things—but when the soul is scrutinized and found unblest by elevated thoughts and generous imaginings, when the intellects uncultured, and the imagination cold, the slumber of forgetfulness will soon fall upon the dream of beauty, and the flame of affection be quenched in apathy or disgust.

With men of genius, strong feeling and powerful passions are ever associated, and in beauty is unmingled with the qualities of wild thought and affection; if delicacy, and virtue are not admirably blended with mental attractions, the light of love will soon be extinguished, and the genial impulses of the bosom chilled by apathy and contempt. Men of intellect may yield a momentary homage to a beautiful woman dispossessed of their fascinations; even a village urchin will chase the gilded wing of a butterfly, but in both cases the external splendor palls upon the senses, and something of an innate character is sought for, to sustain the regard which beauty excited. Nothing is so flattering to the feelings of man, as the exhaustless and quenchless regard of a sensible female, and no incense so rich can be offered upon the shrine of a woman's ambition, as the avowed and enthusiastic affection of a man of genius. Beauty! thou art mean and unmeaning toy, when contrasted with depth of feeling and power of mind, and she who would aggrandize to herself consequences from the little ambition of personal beauty, is too imbecile in her aspirations, to merit the attention of an elevated thinker.

POISONING OF JOHN W. FLOOR CONFESSED.

POLICE OFFICE.—Our readers have been apprised of the death of a young man named John W. Floor, occasioned by his eating a poisoned pound cake, presented to him by a female in Catharine market—and of the arrest and imprisonment of six females on suspicion of being concerned in, or accessory to, the crime committed. Nothing however appearing to implicate five of the females in the guilt of the transaction, they were subsequently discharged, and only one, named Phebe Ann Simonson, alias Sanderson, who called herself the wife of the deceased, was detained in prison for future examination. This female, it is generally admitted, and by herself declared, was the wife of Mr. Floor, and lived in apartments in Lewis street, where he supported her as his wife, and she is understood to be about 7 or 8 months in pregnancy. After her arrest this woman (whose maiden name was Simonson, and whose parents went from Staten Island to reside in Bergen county New Jersey) acknowledged that she had been to the market on the night the cake was given, and had obtained some mutton chops, but denied having had any cake that night at the market.

After her arrest, the apartments she had occupied were searched, and a saucer and a plate, each containing portions of pound cake which adhered to their sides were found, and identified by a Mrs. Fisher and a Miss Phillips, of the same house, as those she had baked cakes in on Saturday sen'night in the stove of Mrs. Fisher. It was also proved that when one of the cakes (the smaller one) was somewhat scorched, that the accused expressed her regret at the fact, saying that she wanted that cake for a particular use; and also that when a child of Mrs. Fisher asked for a piece of the smaller cake, the accused again said she wanted it for a particular use, but that the child might have a piece of the larger one on the next day.

The smaller cake the accused said she had eaten herself on the way to the market, which was not the fact, as it was evidently given to Mr. Floor. The saucer that had contained the cake was put into the hands of Dr. Chilton, the chemist, who on making a chemical analysis of the portions of cake adhering to its sides, detected in them considerable portions of arsenic, though there was none in the portions of cake adhering to the larger plate. A small iron pot was also found by Justice Merritt in the apartment of the accused, which contained a fluid with a white sediment, being as supposed the washings of the poisonous vessel in which the dough of the cake was mixed. The substance in the iron pot was also impregnated with arsenic, and likewise, as we are informed, a bowl in which some of the cake had been prior to its being baked. An apron was also found of dark calico in her apartment, being the one she wore when she mixed and made the cakes, which was discolored or turned yellow in several places, as if some acid had been spilled thereon.

It was ascertained also that the accused had enquired the effect oxalic acid would produce on the human system, and whether it would poison and kill a person or not—and it appeared that a female of her appearance had been to one or more apothecary shops enquiring for arsenic. Thus things remained until yesterday, when other witnesses had been subpoenaed to attend; before their arrival, however, the father and mother of the accused came to the prison to see their daughter and she was brought up into the private examination room of the magistrates, where she met them. The mother fell on her knees on the floor and wept and wailed aloud. The father was also greatly affected. In the midst of this scene of grief and agony, the accused told the magistrate and Coroner that they need not send for the witnesses, for that she did purchase the arsenic of a boy in a shop in Oliver street, on the Tuesday preceding the death of her husband. She said on that morning she went to the deceased for money to pay her rent, and that he only gave her half a dollar, and that she then went away in a state of feeling she could or would not describe, and proceeding to the shop in Oliver street purchased three cents worth of arsenic, and took it with her over the river to her parents' house in Bergen, and returned home with it on the Saturday before the death of Mr. Floor. She said it was not jealousy, and she could not tell what it was that caused her to get the poison. The magistrate cautioned her against inculpating herself, but she persisted in going on with her story, and would not be stopped, though the Justice, and Coroner left the room long before the completion of her tale of acknowledged guilt, not wishing to hear any thing disclosed through her until her regular examination, which will probably be this day.

Her parents left in tears, and the accused was reconducted to prison, where she also cried bitterly, and wished to tell the officer all about it, and declared to her legal adviser her determination to confess all that had taken place. She has since sent for Carson Chase to attend her in prison as her spiritual adviser. These are all the facts of the case as far as they have transpired.

GREAT SNOW STORM.—We have accidentally from Buffalo and Baltimore and Philadelphia, of a great snow storm during the 24 hours from Saturday to Sunday night. At the West the depth was about 12 inches—at the South from 12 to 20 inches—the Baltimore American thinks the maximum of 16 inches the true depth. All the rail-roads from E. I. timore and Philadelphia had been obstructed, and rendered impassable, and mails due from every direction.

POPULAR TALES.

THE FREEMASON.

A TALE OF TRUTH.

The young Frenchman had been the guest, rather than the prisoner, of Ivan, about two months, when one morning his host entered his apartment with a letter in his hand—

'Bad news, dear Adolphe,' he exclaimed: 'some enemy to our happiness has informed the Governor of Moscow that a French officer of high rank has found refuge here; he writes to thank me for my services, and commands me to give you up to the general of the district.'

'Mine was a lot too fortunate to last,' replied his friend: 'but it is the fate of war, and I submit. If in the dungeons of Moscow I feel the privations of your hospitable home, the recollection of your generous friendship shall console me. When must I depart?'

'Depart!' exclaimed Ivan: 'can you then think so meanly of me as to desert you in the moment of danger? are you not my friend—my brother?—consign you to the dungeons of Moscow! not if the emperor himself commanded it. You are my guest—a name sacred to the poorest peasant—you never have been my prisoner. I resign all claim upon your honor—I here restore your parole. I had not named that unfortunate affair, but prudence may compel us to adopt precautions for your safety, which, had you not been aware of the motive, must have appeared very strange to you.'

'Generous Ivan, how shall I express my gratitude yet let not your zeal in my behalf compromise you with your government; you have a mother

'Who would blush for me,' interrupted his friend, 'were I capable of violating the rights of hospitality.—I will meet the general—he was my father's friend—I will appeal to his generosity; should that fail, we must descend to artifice: meanwhile, you must lay aside your uniform, and be content to disguise yourself in habiliments of mine—the ladies are already aware of the necessity of concealment, and will not be surprised at the exchange.'

'Unfortunate that I am,' exclaimed Adolphe, 'to disturb the happiness and tranquillity of your family.—Should I be discovered, the vengeance of the emperor would fall on them—and your domestics, they 'Have neither eyes nor ears but as we direct. At the worst, too, we have a chamber so curiously concealed that suspicion's self might pass it in her search. It was provided as a place of refuge for the females against an enemy—it may now preserve a friend: there we can conceal you till the arrival of Aran, a Jew merchant, who annually visits these wilds to purchase furs—disguised as his servant, you may securely reach the frontier. Farewell!—I must to horse and remember that—

By the mystic word and sign;
By our secret art divine;
By each point of fellowship;
By the grasp add by the slip;
By the rite we dare not name;
By a Brother's sacred claim—'

[German Masonic Song.]

these walls are your home—your safety is my duty and peculiar care." While speaking the above lines, Ivan grasped the hand of his companion; at the conclusion he shook it warmly, and quitted the apartment.

Ivan had left his home about two days, when Aran, the long expected Jew merchant, arrived in the neighborhood to purchase skins of the serfs and neighboring boors. His caravan consisted of six sledges, which were well laden with the fruits of his long journey. To Adolphe's offers he turned a deaf ear.—'The danger was too great—it would interfere with his trade.' His scruples were eventually removed by a night of Lauriston's casket. The eyes of the avaricious Israelite sparkled as he beheld the gems; and he consented, on condition that he received a considerable portion of the treasure, to allow the young soldier to accompany him in the disguise of one of his drivers—and even promised to shorten a portion of front, in order to facilitate his escape. It was finally arranged that they should depart in four days.

Aware of his own feelings, and more than suspecting the nature of Catharine's, Adolphe was considering how he could best impart to her the intelligence of his departure. The countess being indisposed, had kept her chamber, and it was not till late in the evening that an opportunity presented itself. He was seated at his guitar, playing a Russian air from memory, when Catharine entered the apartment.

'Is it possible,' she exclaimed, smiling, 'that so accomplished a troubador can descend to the savage strains of the frozen North—can any thing Russian dwell upon your memory?'

'I must indeed be cold,' he replied, 'ere I forget the generosity of Ivan, or the beauty of his fair—country woman,' he added, checking himself, lest his too pointed meaning should bring on the declaration he deemed it most honorable to avoid.

'A compliment,' replied Catharine, 'at the expense of your sincerity—you are detected, I can read the heart—as a punishment, you shall sing some lay of your own dear country.'

'Willingly,' he replied: and striking a slight prelude on the instrument, he sang the following words, not inapplicable to his own feelings—

'Farewell! farewell! I would not fling,
Around thy brow the veil of sorrow:
Brightly for thee the morn may spring,
And mirth and pleasure wait thy morrow;

The words of love thy lips have spoken,
Each burning thought alike forget,
Keep not of me one parting token
To wake the strain of vain regret!

Strike not the lute, whose chords for me
Breathed music's strain or passion's spell:
Each note would breathe again in thee
The memory of this sad farewell!

Gay hours of bliss—long happy years—
And love's best joys—fair maid! he thine:—
His broken heart, his burning tears,
And sighs of vain regret are mine!

The deep manly voice of the young soldier trembled at the concluding stanzas. From his emotion, even more than the words of his strain, Catharine felt he was about to depart.

'You are going to leave us,' she exclaimed, bursting into tears, 'and I shall see you no more.' The undisguised feeling with which these few words were uttered, betrayed too plainly the state of her feelings. Adolphe threw himself upon his knee before her, and declared his love.

'Honor,' he exclaimed, 'has hitherto bound my tongue in silence as a captive and enemy, I dared not ask your hand—but these cruel wars must end; I will return—I can rely on Ivan's friendship—I shall demand your hand—'

'You will find me his wife!' passionately interrupted the agitated girl; 'know you not I am betrothed to him?'

'God!' exclaimed Adolphe, 'what have I done!—there wanted but this, wretch that I am! Is this my return for his generous friendship? Forget me, Catharine,' he continued, 'better we had never met—think not of me—I were a monster, unworthy of the name of man, could I gratify my own passion at the expense of his happiness. He is gentle, affectionate, formed to be beloved—you will soon recall your heart from this wandering, wayward choice, and learn to look upon him as your husband.'

'Never, never,' replied Catharine, 'can I love Ivan but with a sister's love! You never felt the passion or you could not coolly resign me to another.' But, go,' she continued, more calmly, 'in your own land, doubtless, you will find one worthier of your heart than the deserted Catharine—'

'Never loved!—You wrong me. Witness these tears, that shame my manhood—the pangs that rend my soul!—Nothing but the powerful call of gratitude and imperious honour could tear me from you. My heart may break with the effort, but it must be accomplished! One embrace:—the first and last of happiness I ere may know.'

At this moment, Ivan, who had unexpectedly returned, entered the apartment, but started as if a serpent had stung him, on beholding Catharine in the arms of his friend.—Unperceived, he quitted them.

'Farewell, for ever!' exclaimed Adolphe, as he disengaged his arm from the trembling form of Catharine; 'think of me but as a dream.' He imprinted upon her brow a single kiss, and rushed from her presence.

'Tis over, thank heaven!' he murmured: 'the struggle's past,' as sinking upon a couch in his own room, he began to reflect upon his future course. Here I must not remain another hour—we must never meet again. I owe it to her peace, to Ivan's friendship, to my own honour.' Hastily writing a letter, which he left upon his table, he threw his cloak around him, him, and placing Lauriston's casket in his bosom, he silently and unobserved quitted the hospitable mansion which had so long concealed and sheltered him. The night-fires guided him to Aran's tent, who, won by the gift of the jewels, consented to depart instantly. The arrangements were soon made. While his people were striking their tents, Adolphe changed his dress for the meaner habiliments of a sledge-driver. An hour before midnight everything was prepared, and the party silently commenced their journey.

'Thus ends my dream of friendship,' said Ivan, as starting from his feverish slumber, he prepared the next morning to visit the deserted chamber of Adolphe. 'I have read, it is the nature of woman to be false, and man to deceive. Hitherto I have deemed it the cynic's censure: I now find it the philosopher's truth.—Yes, the false mistress and treacherous friend should not have been Catharine, and Adolphe Leeseau.—How, gone!' he exclaimed, as looking round the apartment, he searched in vain for its late inmate: 'can Catharine be the partner of his flight? His eye fell upon the letter—he trembled as he broke the seal; it ran thus:

DEAR IVAN,

'Condemn me not, that I have withdrawn from your hospitable home without bidding you farewell: but my honor and your happiness demand that I should act as I have done. Till a few moments preceding the writing of this, I knew not of my danger. May you and Catharine be happy! Farewell.

'ADOLPHE.'

'He is true, he is true' said Ivan, rapidly glancing over the paper; 'human nature forgive me, that I doubted thee! He loved, but knew not of my engagement to Catharine. I was to blame—he should have been forewarned.'

Ivan took no notice of the scene he had witnessed to Catharine or his mother, trusting that time would lessen her grief, and her heart gradually appreciate his devoted affection. By a tacit agreement, the name of Adolphe was never mentioned between them. As the spring advanced, the countess removed, to St. Petersburg, her palace at Moscow being destroyed. Here they visited, and gradually plunged into the fashionable dissipation of the court. But, although Catharine moved amid the brilliant throng, her buoyancy of spirit was gone—she appeared to endure rather than enjoy, and Ivan found that the shaft had pierced deeper than he at first imagined.

Two years rolled on, and the once blooming Catharine had become a delicate invalid. Apathy and languor, the forerunners of consumption, had gradually tainted the springs of health, and frequently obliged her to keep her chamber. She was one evening reclining upon a sofa, listening to a romance that Ivan was reading; it turned on France and her minstrel knights. A deep sigh from his auditor drew his attention: she lay pale and gasping—a tear upon her cheek. His generous nature could endure it no longer.

'Catherine!' he exclaimed, 'we must change the scene: your health is too delicate for this cold northern climate—you shall travel—the genial airs of France will restore you.'

'France!' cried Catharine, half-springing from the couch: 'Can you be serious? Should we meet—'

'Adolphe, you would say; why, you must punish him for his desertion. Yes, dear Catherine,' continued Ivan, "I now look upon you but as a sister; my friend is worthy of your love—honour and gratitude alone prevented your union—they shall be rewarded. Nay, no words: I shall be repaid the sacrifice in your happiness and again embracing my friend. Summon your spirits; in a few days, we will set out for France."

In the summer of the same year, the military Lodge of St. Louis was assembled in Paris. The room was crowded with officers, and foreign Brothers of distinction. Count Lauriston, as Master, was in the chair. The usual signal for silence being given, he thus addressed the assembly:

"Brothers: it is my pleasurable task to record another instance of the advantages resulting from Masonry. A Brother here present, while escorting me, during the late war in Russia, from an interview with Prince Kutusoff, was attacked by a party of Cossacks. I had barely time to escape with my despatches: his men were slain, and one of the enemy about to despatch him, when it became apparent to the commander of the party that the Frenchman was a Brother—he saved his life—concealed him in his own house, and finally enabled him to reach his native land. I find by the list of this night's visitors that, unknown to each other, the two Brothers are present."

"How!" exclaimed Adolphe, rushing forward, "my friend here."

A group of foreign officers at the same moment opened their circle, and Ivan was clasped in the embrace of his friend.

Accompanied by Catherine, he that very day had arrived in Paris, and he, ring that a Lodge was held in the hotel where he was staying, he sent in his certificate to the Master.

We will not detain our readers by dwelling upon the happiness of Catherine, or the gratitude of Adolphe—the following announcement, from the journals of the same month, will conclude our tale:

"Married, at the chapel of his Excellency, the Russian Ambassador, Count Adolphe Lesseau, to Lady Catherine Hornloff. Count Ivan, of Dantzoff, gave away the bride."

MISCELLANY.

SECOND MARRIAGE OF THE FATHER OF PETER THE GREAT.

The Czar Alexei Michailovitch, father of Peter the Great, was so much attached to the nobleman Artemis Matfeof, that, contrary to the etiquette of the Russian court, which forbids the czar to visit a subject, he would often go to his house in a friendly and familiar way. One evening, coming unexpectedly, and seeing the table set for supper with great neatness, he said to Matfeof, "The table seems so neatly and prettily covered! I feel a strong desire to sit down to it with you. Yes, I will follow the suggestions of my appetite, and place myself at table by thee, upon this condition, however, that I disturb nobody, and that none get up from table till they have supped." "Whatever your majesty pleases and commands must be to the honor of my house," returned Matfeof. The supper was served up, and the czar sat down to table. The mistress of the house enters, with their only son, and a young lady, who after making their profoundest reverences, obey the czar's commands, and take their places at the table. During the supper, the czar looked frequently round upon the little company, and seemed to take particular notice of the young lady that sat over against him, as not recollecting that he had ever seen her before as one of Matfeof's children. "I always thought," said his majesty, "that thou hadst no other child than the boy, but now I see, for the first time, that thou hast a daughter likewise: how camest thou never to mention her to me?"

"Your majesty thought perfectly right," answered Matfeof; "I have but that one son. But the young lady that sits opposite is the daughter of my friend and relation, the nobleman Kyrilla Narishkin, who lives in the country on his estate, whom my wife has taken in to the house, to show her the city, and, in God's good time, to get her well provided for."

The czar said nothing more, than that, "he had done a good deed, which therefore must be agreeable to God." After supper, when Matfeof's family had risen from table, and gone to their own apartment, the czar chose to continue sitting with his host. His majesty resumed the subject of the young lady, Natalia Kyrillovna, and said, "The maiden has a handsome appearance; she seems to have a good heart, and is not too young to be married. Thou must endeavour to get her a fit husband." "Yes," answered Matfeof, "your majesty judges rightly of her; she possesses an excellent understanding, with the greatest modesty, and the best of hearts. My wife, and the whole family, are uncommonly fond of her, and consider her as if she were our darling daughter. But as to a suitor for her, that is what we are not soon likely to expect. She has indeed numberless good qualities, but little or no wealth, and if I should meet with an opportunity to settle her, the portion I could afford her out of my narrow fortune would be but small." The czar upon this replied, "She must find a sweetheart that has so much property himself as to stand in need of nothing from her, but consider her good qualities as the greatest and best of portions, and make it his endeavour to render her happy." "That is just what I could wish," said Matfeof; "but where shall I find such a lover, who looks more for excellent qualities in his bride than for a splendid fortune?" "Oh, yes," said the czar, "they are still to be found very frequently: do thou think occasionally thereupon, and I myself will likewise look out for some such match. The maiden is deserving of all the pains we can take to make her happy." Matfeof thanked his majesty for so gracious an intimation of his kindness, and there the matter remained. The czar wished him a good night, and took himself away. A few days afterwards his majesty came again to Matfeof, discoursed with him for a couple of hours on state affairs, and, after getting up, seemingly with a design to take leave and go away, on a sudden took his chair, and sat down afresh. "Now, tell me," said he to Matfeof, "hast thou not forgot our late conversation about providing a lover for Natalia Kyrillovna?"

"No, most gracious sir," answered Matfeof; "I bear it continually in mind, and only wish it were to some effect. I have found nothing suitable for her yet, and I much doubt that a proper offer will soon be made for though a number of our young noblemen come to visit me, and consequently often see my charming foster daughter, they none of them give any intimations about marriage."

"Well," said the czar, "perhaps it may not be necessary. I told thee that I would myself use some endeavours to provide a bridegroom for her. I have had the good fortune to find one, with whom she will probably be very contented and happy. I know the man, he is an honourable and worthy person, has merit, and wealth enough not to be under the necessity of asking an estate or portion with her. He loves her, and will marry and make her happy. Thou knowest him too, though probably he hath the most reserved intention to marry. I think likewise, that when he applies to thee, thou wilt not give him a denial." Matfeof here interrupted the czar, by saying, "as I just told your majesty, that would be a most desirable thing, it would free me from a great concern I have continually at heart about this poor girl. Dare I now beseech your majesty to tell me the man's name?—Perhaps I know him likewise, and can inform your majesty something of his circumstances."

"I have told thee that I know the man," returned the czar; "that he is a worthy honest fellow, and capable of rendering his wife happy, this thou mayest take my word for. I can say no more of him, till we know whether Natalia Kyrillovna will be willing to have him."

"There is no doubt of that," returned Matfeof, "when she hears that your majesty has provided her a spouse. In the meantime, she must know who the person is, that she may give her answer. This, I think is but reasonable."

"Well then," said the czar, "I give thee to know that I myself am the man that hath resolved to marry her, if she be inclined to it. Do thou tell her this, and ask her whether she can approve of me."

At this unexpected declaration of the czar, Matfeof was filled with astonishment, threw himself at his feet, and said, "I beseech your majesty, for the love of heaven, that you will change your resolution, or at least that you will not order me to acquaint the young lady with it. Most gracious sovereign, you know full well, that I have already a great many enemies at court, and among the principal families of the empire, who are jealous of the favour and confidence your majesty is pleased to allow me. What an outcry, will there be among them when they find your majesty has preferred a marriage with a poor maiden of my family to a connection with one of the principal ladies at court! Doubtless their hatred and malice against me will cover all the land: and every one will think that I have abused your majesty's favour, and unworthily contrived to bring about the match, for the sake of raising myself still higher in your majesty's regard, and for elevating my family to a connection with that of the czar's."

"All that will nothing signify," replied the czar; "the affair is mine, and thou hast no business with it. My resolution is taken, and thereby I shall remain."

"Well, be it according to your majesty's pleasure," said Matfeof; "and may God bless your majesty with every kind of prosperity! Since it is to be so, let me beg only one favour for myself and for Natalia Kyrillovna, which is, that your majesty will proceed in the matter according to the custom of the empire, and with as little noise as possible, by ordering a number of the marriageable young ladies of the principal families, and among them Natalia Kyrillovna, to appear together at court, with the design of choosing one of them for a bride; and, in the meantime, that no person besides your majesty and myself, not even Natalia Kyrillovna, have the slightest intimation of your purpose and resolution."

The czar found this procedure highly proper, and accordingly bade Matfeof be prepared for the event, and to discover his intention to no one. A few weeks afterwards, he declared his design of marrying again to the heads of the church and the chief ministers in a private council, and further told them that on such a court day all the marriageable daughters of the chief nobles were to be commanded to appear at court, that his majesty might consider them, and choose a bride.

This was accordingly done on a certain day in September, 1670, in the Kremlin palace at Moscow, when sixty noble ladies presented themselves in their most superb attire, and among them Natalia Kyrillovna Narishkina in neat and pretty apparel. They were all sumptuously entertained by the czar; but Natalia was declared to be the monarch's bride.—Gentleman's Magazine.

CHANCE.

The following article, by Lyman Beecher, is an admirable satire on the doctrine of the "fortuitous concurrence of circumstances" in the creation of the world:—

Some time ago, after chaos and old night had reigned undisturbed from eternity, and matter had fermented and tossed, and rolled into almost infinite forms, it happened to fall, for the first time, into just those relations which constituted the volcanic power: when, in a moment, an explosion took place, loud as ten thousand thunders, which sent out innumerable suns flying in confusion through space, streaming athwart the darkness their baneful light, till they stopped and became fixed stars in the glorious firmament above. But they carried in their bosom the sad accidents which gave them birth: and new throes ensued, sending out around them comets, and planets, and satellites all moving in elliptic orbits, with arithmetical accuracy, so that for ages past, and for ages to come, the almanac discloses their movements with as exact accuracy as the clock tells of time. What chance it was that checked their flight, and by a resolution of force wheeled them around in their elliptic career—or why, the centripetal power exhausted, they did not fall back with accelerated momentum, into the horrible crater whence they sprang—or where that mass may be which could furnish matter of which to make the universe, and sustain reaction of sending it out: that mighty cannon, whose shots are suns and worlds: our philosophers have not yet discovered. But so it happens—they were exploded, as yet they have not fallen back.

And now leaving the suns and orbs, and other system, we descend to trace the history of our own mother earth, whom we meet reeking from her recent explosion, her waves of fire tossing and raging, which, as they cooled, crusted and stood upright as a heap, and became the perpetual hills and everlasting mountains. The weightier masses sunk down towards the centre, with lighter and lighter deposits above, leaving the crust, when pulverised, for fallow ground and harvests.

As yet, however, the earth was without form and void, and a hideous nakedness spread over its late burning surface—when, strange to tell, grass and trees sprang up and began to ornament the hills and carpet the valleys—and hard on the footsteps of this wonder trod another: the waters teemed with organic life, which lashed with oar the pliant wave, and sported in the deep—and suddenly the hills sent down to the valleys, and the valleys sent back to the hills, the bleating of flocks and herds, while the groves sent forth the joyous notes of birds and insects. All these, in grand concert, burst out upon the silence of nature, and all as they needed, waited on almighty chance who gave them their meat in due season.

The organization of this delightful choir was such as demanded respiration, and the flowing of a warm blood for which an elastic atmosphere was needed; and it happened, as the earth cooled and consolidated, that several gases escaped from confinement, so exactly of the same specific gravity, and blessed with such social and friendly dispositions, that they agreed to exist in partnership, and to surround the earth, and most benevolently to volunteer their aid for respiration. Each, alone, deadly to life, but united, its sustaining power.

This world of breathing animation, rose up with optics, camera-obscuram the head, to pencil inside the images of objects without—when lo! the orb of day, when he fled from his prison, forgot not in his panic to take with him stores of light, manufactured for immediate use, which, ever since, he has been pouring out unexhausted, in marvellous abundance. Light, so dexterously compounded of seven colors as to be colorless, and well adapted to the vision.

But, amid this exuberance of animated being, there was not a man to till the ground, or admire the beauties of nature. Behold, then, another wonder—the fortuitous concurrence of atoms, before the earth so cooled as to stop fermentation, produced human skeleton, among which with kind affinity, came the sinews and muscles, and took their place. The lungs for breathing, and the arteries and veins to carry around the vital fluid, offered their aid, and were accepted.—The nervous system—semi-animal semi-spiritual—took its middle place, as arbitrator between the soul and body. And, to cover what otherwise had been unsightly, kind nature provided a blanket, and with kind sympathy threw its velvet covering over the whole. The eye, to lit itself up accidentally, just at the moment it was wanted, and the sockets stood excavated for its reception, and the muscles warm to make it easy, and the ligament to tie it in. The mouth opened at the right time to prevent suffocation, and in the right place for speech, and ornamented with double rows of ivory for mastication. While Nature's self, with pencil dipped in the colors of heaven, stood by, well pleased to put on her beauteous workmanship, the finish of the sparkling eye, and rosy cheek, and ruby lip. All this, however, had constituted only a beauteous animal, but for the glorious accident of a machine for thinking, which happened to pass that way, and consented to make an experiment of its powers in the upper department of this marvellous product of chance. It took its place, and swung the pendulum, and has continued to go with surprising accuracy, though latterly in some instances, it has seemed to be out of order, and to stand in need of some little rectification in respect to its reasoning powers.

MICHIGAN CITY, (Indiana,) Dec. 4.

A WILD CHILD.—Strange as it may appear, it is currently reported and very generally believed, that a wild child, or lad, is now running at large among the sand hills round and in the vicinity of Fish Lake. It is reported to be about four feet high, and covered with a slight coat of chestnut colored hair. It runs with great velocity, and when pursued, as has often been the case, it sets up the most frightful and hideous yells, and seems to make efforts at speaking. It has been seen during the summer months running along the lake shore, apparently in search of fish and frogs, and appears to be very fond of the water, for it will plunge into Fish Lake and swim with great velocity, all the time whining most piteously.

How this creature has come here, or what its history may be we leave to conjecture; but may it not be probable that it may have strayed away from some emi-grating party, when encamped for the night, and wandered off in the woods, where it has grown up an associate with the animals of the forest? We think this may be case. If so, what must have been the anguish of its parents and friends on learning that they were compelled to pursue their journey without their tender care? It is also supposed that it may have been stolen by the Indians, and left in the forest to perish; but we can hardly believe such to be the case.

It would be sothing but an act of humanity on the part of our young men to turn out and capture it.—Gazette.

AMERICAN MASONIC REGISTER.

ALBANY, SATURDAY, JAN. 4, 1839.

OURSELVES.—Since the commencement of our paper, we have obtruded "ourselves" but very little before our readers; and we trust we shall be excused, at this time if we remind them that the same "sinecurs" is as necessary in a printing establishment, as is said to be indispensable in war—MONEY. Our terms are advance, which is made necessary by the low price of the paper, and the consequent impossibility of paying a per-centage for collection. We would therefore ask our country friends, who have not paid to remit us the amount of their subscriptions; which can be done through the post master free from charge. As we intend to be prompt with our patrons, and give them no cause for complaint; we really hope they will exhibit a corresponding feeling, and relieve us from the embarrassments which neglect will subject us to.

We shall make out the bills of our city patrons, in a few days, when they will be waited upon.

BURNETT'S TREATISE ON PAINTING.—Linen & Fennel, have just issued part first of Burnett's celebrated Treatise on Painting. We are glad to see sufficient enterprise among the Publishers of New York, and sufficient encouragement given by the Public to ensure the getting up of a work, that has too long been known only by reputation, to many of the Artists of our Country. Burnett's work is a necessary acquisition to every artist who seeks for excellence in his profession, and the low price at which the American Publishers have put their edition, places it within the means of every lover of the art.

The engravings are executed by L. P. Clover Jr. and are pronounced by the first artists of the country to be in no way inferior to the English. Great care has been bestowed upon the letter press, and the paper is of the first quality.

Such an undertaking merits the approbation of all who have found the difficulty attending the pursuit of a profession in which they have been compelled to grope their way in darkness. It is too often the case that young artists, starting forth in their professions, take years to acquire that which if properly directed in the commencement, would require but a few months to attain.—This work is intended, and truly calculated to obviate this difficulty. The arts on Composition—Light and Shadow—and Coloring, are here laid down clearly and concisely. We recommend this work to the Principals of Seminaries, as of essential service in obtaining any thing like a knowledge of Historical, Portrait and Landscape painting. We trust, and have no doubt, that this Treatise will have an extensive sale. We understand it is for sale at the Book-store of W. C. Little.

A GOOD PRECEDENT.—We observe that the accounts of the county lately passed upon, by the supervisors, have been published. This is right, and we hope it will be continued every year. It enables the tax-payer, to see what he pays his money for. Among the expenses is $4000 for Rector. We believe the tax-payers would have been better satisfied, if that amount had been expended for a halter.

DISTRESSING OCCURRENCE.—On New Year's day as Mr. George Hawley, and his wife were returning from New Baltimore in a sleigh, accompanied by an infant child of three months old, the weather being intensely cold, Mrs. H. wrapped up her infant closely to keep it warm. On reaching home, who shall describe the mother's anguish on finding her babe a corpse in her arms. Thus were two fond parents, who rose and hailed the dawn of a "happy new year" as joyous as any of us, called at its close to mourn over the cold form of an only and beloved child. Verily, who can tell what a day will bring forth.

LITERARY.—Mr. John Fair, of this city, wishes us to say that he intends to publish "by subscription, at $2, a Hebrew and English Lexicon in miniature, together with a new grammar, without points, which is to harmonise the sound of the letters to the Massoretical points, and enable the student to read the Old Testament in the original in twelve lessons." The work is to be dedicated to the Freemasons and Odd Fellows throughout the globe. It will have a big dedication, at all events.

We take a great deal of pleasure in copying the following deserved encomium, from the Eve. Journal.—Independent of Mr. Cushman standing No. 1, in his profession, we can also testify to his literary merit.—Some of the best articles which has appeared in our paper, poetical and prose are from his pen.

Engraving of Judge Buel.—We have seen a proof impression of an engraved Portrait of the late Judge BUEL, by Mr. T. H. CUSHMAN, from a Painting of Mr. F. FINE. It is an excellent likeness. The Artists, who are both Albanians, have in this effort displayed genius which give abundant promise of future usefulness and eminence. The numerous friends of Judge BUEL will appreciate their obligations to these young Artists for their fidelity in preserving the resemblance of a distinguished public benefactor. A copy of this PORTRAIT will be sent to each of the subscribers of the CULTIVATOR.

Election of Mayor.—The Common Council on Monday evening last, re-elected the Hon. Joel L. Rathbone, as Mayor of the city, for another year.—Whatever diversity of feeling may exist politically in relation to this gentleman, all parties unite in appreciating the bland and gentlemanly deportment of the present incumbent, who as our first municipal officer wears his honors with credit to himself and the city.

Br. L. G. Hoffman.

Below I send you a return of the Officers of Lockport Lodge, No. 73, chosen at the annual election on the 17th.—You no doubt will be gratified to hear that our Lodge is in a very flourishing condition, and that the cause of "Brotherly love," is acquiring an enviable reputation here, notwithstanding we are situated in the very centre of the "infected district." We number over 40 members now, and I have no doubt, but that we shall have over a 100, by the end of another year. Fraternally, y's. B.

MASONIC CELEBRATION.

The Anniversary of our Patron Saint, was celebrated in this city, on the evening of the 27th, with much satisfaction to the Craft. Br. Starka provided an excellent supper, for the occasion, which if taken as a "specimen of his work," shewed any thing but the "idle craftsman." After the cloth was removed, the following toasts and sentiments were drank interspersed with ode and song, and the brethren separated at an early hour, mutually satisfied with their "call from labor," and delighted with the harmony and good fellowship which prevailed:—

STANDING TOASTS.

1. The Day and all who honor it. May each return of it, find us in the full exercise of all the virtues we profess.
2. The President of the United States.
3. The Governor of the State of New York.
4. The distinguishing attributes of a Mason. FAITH in God, HOPE in Immortality, and CHARITY to all mankind.
5. Washington, Clinton, and Lafayette. Stars placed in the Masonic firmament, for Anti-Masonry to gaze at. "The stone which the builders rejected, has become the head Stone of the corner."
6. The Masonic Temple. Founded on the rock of Truth and Virtue, it fears neither bigotry, intolerance nor persecution.
7. The Brethren of the U. S. We remember them on every point of Fellowship.

VOLUNTEER TOASTS.

By Br. L. G. Higman.—The Square and Compass, within its bounds may be found the whole duty of man while here below—by its masonic use, we are prepared as living stones for that spiritual building not made with hands—eternal in the heavens.

By Br. J. Stockton.—Freemasonry—Its light illumines the countenance of the widow and orphan. May its opponents obtain more light.

By Br. W. Ferguson.—Masonry in its purity—may we so preserve it.

By Br. Jas. K. Halliday.—May Christianity and the mysteries of Masonry be better understood by its advocates and opponents. May their precepts be practised in their true virtue; then shall it be adorned with Faith, Hope and Charity—these three—but the greatest of these shall be Charity.

By Br. Jas. Radcliff.—In memory of our deceased Br. Daniel P. Marshall; his virtues and morality we trust, entitle him to a seat in the east in St. Peter's Lodge. (Drank Standing)

By Br. S. V. R. Ahlman.—The widow and orphan. Fit objects for a Mason's care.

By Br. E. Vanderlip, Jr.—Brotherly Love, Relief and Truth. Three cardinal virtues of a Mason. May every brother endeavor by precept and example, to inculcate those truly masonic virtues, so that the world at large may be convinced of the beauties of an institution, the birth of one of its Patrons we this night celebrate.

By Br. C. Livingston.—The health of our absent Brethren of this city.

By Br. J. Hurd.—The Masonic Fraternity—May it ever be their highest aim to assimilate their actions to their professions.

By a Guest.—AUNT MASONRY. A harmless old lady that taught school in the western part of this State. Her neighbors respecting her of "being no better than she should be," dismissed her from the "District." She retired to an adjoining State where it is supposed she died of a nervous fever. Peace to her ashes.—(Drank Standing and in tears.)

By Br. Geo. Cooke.—Freemasonry, and its transcendent virtues—Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will towards all mankind.

By Br. R. Parr.—To all those who steer their course by the three great Lights of Masonry.

By Br. W. Connelly.—The Craftsmen throughout the world. May freedom, harmony and brotherly love prevail among them.

By Br. H. Smith.—The Memory of Robert Burns. The Mason the Poet, and the Philanthropist.

By Br. W. Voorhes.—Faith, Hope and Charity, the three great principles in Masonry.

By Br. L. Ewing.—The sentiment of every good Mason.

"Teach me to feel a brother's woe,
To hide the faults I see;
That mercy I to others show,
That mercy show to me."

By Br. J. Courtney.—Masonry and Anti-Masonry. It took but a short time to shew which was built upon the sand.

By Br. J. Stewart.—

His memory who the temple reared,
And every true and faithful heart:
To all whom Masonry has squared,
That still preserve the secret art.

By Br. O. Tomlinson.—Freemasonry—why do we love it! Because it is founded upon that love, that loveth every man that cometh into the world.

By a Guest.—Anti-Masonry—Relic of a barbarous age. The Vandals desolated the Monuments of antiquity, their posterity have vainly attempted to desecrate our Temple.

By Br. O. A. Kingsley.—Political Anti-masonry—The last nail in its coffin, has been driven home.—The chief mourners are Ignorance and Superstition.

By a Guest.—Liberty. May it spread every where over the face of the earth! May its spirit animate all governments, wheresoever existing, whether administered by Priests, Kings or Presidents.

By Br. A. Wilder.—Freemasonry, and Morality, linked together by indissoluble bonds.

By Br. C. M. Fowler.—Our Institution. Beloved by its friends, and respected by its enemies.

By a Guest.—May the brethren of our Craft, be ever distinguished in the world by their regular lives, more than by their gloves and aprons.

By Br. D. Cullender.—May every dishonest Mason be detected, and cast out of the Hwe, like a drone bee.

By a Guest.—Our Host. His work of this evening proves him no impostor, but a regular craftsman.

By Br. A. W. Starke.—The memory of the bright Constellation of names that adorn the rolls of Masonry. We point to them with the exultation and just pride of the Roman Mother of the Gracchus to her sons and say "these are my jewels."

Attempt to Poison.—An attempt was made a day or two since to poison the family of Mr. Jesse Hoyt, in the following diabolical manner. A package was delivered at Mr. Hoyt's house which the bearer said was sent from a grocery in the Bovey, and was a sample of some very fine coffee. From some circumstance, suspicion was aroused in the mind of Mr. Hoyt, he forwarded the parcel to Mr. Chilton to analyze. On examination, Mr. Chilton found the coffee strongly impregnated with arsenic. Who the vile contriver of this wholesale murder may be is yet to be discovered. It is hoped, however, that he will not long escape detection or the punishment due so horrible a crime.

TRINITY CHURCH YARD.—In the diggings which are carried back for the enlargement of the foundation of the new church, several ancient vaults, we learn, have had to be disturbed. Among the relics were the silver plate and remains of the countess of Clifton, interred about some 100 years since, those of Hon. Mr. — aged seven years, and a number of others, of those days when titles were so rife in this then good loyal province. These remains of the venerated dead, are we hear, to be deposited in the new vaults to be erected.—[N. Y. Star.

KILLED BY MISTAKE.—Peter Mitchell esq., one of the most eminent merchants of Savannah, was recently murdered at Brunswick, Geo., and it is supposed through mistake—the blow by which he fell being intended for another person. Mr. M. was on board of a steamboat which landed in the night, at Brunswick. He left the boat with the intention of going to the hotel, and on his way was struck down with a club in the hands of some person unknown. The object of the person making the assault it would seem was not for gain, as Mr. Mitchell had a gold watch and money about his person which remained untouched—the general opinion is that the blow was intended for another individual who left the wharf about the same time, but owing to the darkness of the night the perpetrator missed his object.

Interesting to Knitters.—Among the queer things exhibited at the Mechanic's fair at Rochester, N. Y. were two stockings knit at the same time, by Miss Robinson. It is said that she used but four needles, knits one stocking within the other, the same as if knitting but one, & yet when she "narrows off" one "at the toe," both are finished!

MARRIED.

CARRIER'S ADDRESS
TO THE PATRONS OF THE
AMERICAN MASONIC REGISTER.
Albany, January, 1, 1839.

Onward, and still onward, hath been the flight of time—
The alternate change from night to day in harmony did chime.
They came and went like shadows which pass before the sight,
Now veiling all in darkness, then bursting into light.
Farewell, a long farewell then to thee thou good old year,
Thou hast past away forever, no more our hearts shall cheer,
No more our sorrows witness, or hear thy praise divine,
Farewell, farewell for ever then, thou good old thirty-nine!
The morn when thou didst usher forth, full many a heart felt glad,
The night that set its seal on thee full many a heart felt sad,
Yet many hearts which at thy ope with sorrow down were bowed,
At the last closing scene of thee with joy and gladness glowed.
Thou art gone forever good old year, thy race forever
run,
Both joy and sorrow marked thy course, until thy time
was done,
We all should then remember, thee thou good old thirty-nine,
Those for the sorrows they have felt, those for their joys divine!
Thou cam'st when wintry winds blew chill, and snows
lay on the ground,
When rivers, lakes and bays, were all in icy fetters bound.
The trees had doff'd their leaves of green, the rose no
more did bloom,
All nature seem'd a sterile waste, drear as the silent tomb.
But soon the warble of the birds was heard o'er hill
and dale,
The lumbkins sported in the fields, or sought the flowery vale.
The trees put forth their tender buds, the lark in air did sing,
The earth through all her various works, proclaimed
thy genial spring:
With balmy breezes summer came, the heart of man to cheer,
The fruits and flowers of every kind most beauteous did appear.
Both field and forest had put on their lovely robes of green,
Where'er the eye the view took in, how charming was the scene!
The sober autumn brought to sight the fields of ripened grain.
The scythe and sickle then did gleam on many a hill and plain.
The rich productions of the soil were gathered up and stored.
For man, whom Providence ordained the great crea-tion's lord,
Thy winter it was bleak and cold, how piercing was the frost!
Storms raged in fury o'er the land, or oceans billows tost.
It was the last of thirty-nine, the closing of the year,
It went, and forty with a smile came following in the rear.
This day another year is born, this day comes forth to light,
Let every heart with joy abound and hail it with delight,
It smiles upon our happy land, land of the brave and free.
And smiles our country every where blessed with prosperity.

Not ours the subtle politician's page,
Though living in this nation-musing age,
When every witting deems himself a sage;
Not ours to laud the claims of every fool,

Who thinks he has quite cash enough to rule;
Nor ours to publish every knave's essay,
Nor ours to each dull, windy speech display,
Nor o'er the nation's wrongs grow eloquent,
And wonder how the deuce the cash is spent,
And rouse the entire free population,
To scatter the "corrupt administration,"
Or prove "the opposition" arguments
To be great frothy words devoid of sense,
And end a dolorous lamentation,
With a specific for the dying nation.
And if to foreign climes we wing our flight,
What theme will there our humble muse invite?
Is't prices current or Bank circular---
All that the bosoms of our princes stir---
Or wars of Spain, disputes of Belgium,
French revolutions, that so frequent come,
Treason in England, Russia's influence,
And certain unnamed monarchs impotence,
Or stern Mehmet Ali, and his wars,
And flashy France, and puffing England's cause;
Or in some gay Court awhile we flutter
See fawning Courtiers earn their bread and butter.
And scores of Ladies the Queen's maids of honor,
Jealous of Virme, crying shame upon her!
Or all the heartless slanders (aliment
Of courts) malice or envy can invent?
Our muse impatient flies to other themes,
Where science tinges life with brighter beams
And lingers o'er the poets ardent dream's.
These be our themes! to us belong
The truths of ages chronicled in song.

In our blessed age where intellect is free,
Where shall the faint of man's triumphs be,
The elements his docile servants are.
Spin the fine thread and swift impels the car,
Delve in the mine, help towering structures rise,
Plough in the deepseas, and lift him to the skies;
Swifter than thought, magnetic courses run,
And "fleeing time" finds his best speed outdone,
No more interminable distance bars
Friendship's embrace, a foe man's bitter wars;
And nations, verge of earth's extremest span
Claim kindred as one family of man.

'Mid the mutation of all time, or changes here on earth,
Freemasonry remains the same as when it first had birth,
For Wisdom Strength, and Beauty still its supporters be,

Assisted by their sisters Faith, Hope, and Charity.
It has existed from the time the world was in its youth,
Its base that attribute divine—the immortal word of Truth.

The architect who framed the globe, and measured out its span
Still gives it his protecting care, for happiness to man.
From east to west, from north to south, its mysteries are known,
Its usefulness each time hath felt on which the sun
hath shone.

It bind man to his fellow man, with all a brother's
love,

Its precepts are the words of Him, who reigneth high above

The Craft of every age can boast the honored of the earth,

The warrior, statesman, poet, sage, the man of princely
birth,

The great, the good, the wise, the learned, the layman
and divine,

All at its fount have wisdom drank and knelt before its shrine.

Oh! Masonry thy fame shall last until all time is done,
Thy mysteries as in ages past, shall go from sire to son.
Like the fixed mountains of our earth: it shall forever
stand,

A monument of goodness from the Almighty Hand.
Kings have their tortures tried in vain the order to destroy.

Grim death in all its fearful forms its fury did employ.
The rack, the gibber and the stake, each in its turn was tried---

But Craftsman still, by faith sustained, in truth's great cause they died

Fanaticism crossed the sea, unto this western world,
Not many years have passed away since its dark don, farled,

But all its efforts came to nought, its fury raged in vain,
For Masonry though crushed to earth, like Truth
rose up again.
And it shall stand, a beacon light, man through this life to guide,
Amid temptations rocks and shoals, which beset on every side,
Yes! it shall stand forever, until time's sands have ran,
Its truths on earth proclaiming, good will and peace to man.

Not in the worships of the crowd,
Ambition finds its aim,
Not for applaudits long and loud,
It seeks its exalted fame.

Not for a sound of idle breath,
Men toil and peril brave,
Ah no—they seek to vanquish death
And triumph o'er the grave.

To live in others' thoughts enshrined,
When meaner things shall die,
A breathing impulse in mankind
Throughout futurity.

For this the poet midnight toils,
The soldier sells his life,
And statesman dwells amidst turmoils
And fevered cares and strife.

His fellows first the clown most rude,
Struggles to be among,
Nor perish with the multitude,
Unnumbered midst the throng.

But count the names which float upon
Time's dark oblivious wave—
How few of mighty millions gone,
Ambition's strife could save!

Behold! the ashes of the dead,
With lofty hopes once fired,
Lie in the dust on which you tread,
Their kindling light expired.

Be thou content e'en though thy name
With thy sojourning cease;
Be wise, and be thy highest aim
To pass thy days in peace.

THE HISTORY OF FREEMASONRY,

DRAWN FROM AUTHENTIC SOURCES OF INFORMATION.

No. IX.

About the time of the Knights Templars, chivalry had arrived at its highest perfection. It had its existence, indeed, prior to this period, but as it continued to influence the minds of men long after the destruction of that unhappy order, it was thought proper to defer its consideration till the present stage of our history. When chivalry made its first appearance, the moral and political condition of Europe was in every respect deplorable. The religion of Jesus existed only in name. A degrading superstition had usurped its place, and threatened ruin to the reason and dignity of man. The political rights of the lower orders were sacrificed to the interests of the great. War was carried on with a degree of savage cruelty, equalled only by the sanguinary contentions of the beasts of prey: no clemency was shown to the vanquished; no humanity to the captive. The female sex, even, were sunk below their natural level; they were doomed to the most laborious occupations, and were deserted and despised by that very sex, on whose protection and sympathy they have so natural a claim. To remedy these disorders, a few intelligent and pious men formed an association, whose members swore to defend the Christian religion, to practise its morals, to protect widows, orphans, and the weaker sex; and to decide judicially, and not by arms, the disputes that might arise about their goods or effects. It was from this association undoubtedly, that chivalry arose (a); and not as some think from the public investiture with arms which was customary among the ancient Germans. But, whatever was its origin, chivalry produced a considerable change in the manners and sentiments of the great. It could not, indeed, eradicate that ignorance and depravity which engendered those awful evils that we have already enumerated. It has softened, however, the ferocity of war. It has restored the fair sex to that honorable rank which they now possess, and which at all times they are entitled to hold. It has inspired those sentiments of generosity, sympathy, and friendship, which have contributed so much to the civilization of the world; and has introduced that principle of honour, which, though far from being a laudible motive to action, often checks the licentious, when moral and religious considerations would make no impression upon their minds.

Such was the origin of chivalry, and such the blessings which it imparted. That it was a branch of Freemasonry, may be inferred from a variety of considerations, from the consent of those who have made the deepest researches into the one, and who were intimately acquainted with the spirit, rites, and ceremonies of the other. They were both ceremonial institutions. Important precepts were communicated to the members of each, for the regulation of their conduct as men, and as brethren of the order. (b) The ceremonies of chivalry, like those of Freemasonry, though unintelligible to the vulgar, were always symbolical of some important truths. (c) The object of both institutions was the same, and the members bound themselves, by an oath, to promote it with ardour and zeal. (d) In chivalry there were also different degrees of honor, through which the youths were obliged to pass before they were invested with the dignity of knighthood (e); and the Knights, like Freemasons, were formed into fraternities or orders, distinguished by different appellations (f).

From these circumstances of resemblance, we do not mean to infer that chivalry was Freemasonry under another name; we mean only to show that the two institutions were intimately connected; that the former took its origin from the latter, and borrowed from it, not only some of its ceremonial observances, but the leading features, and the general outline of its constitution. These points of similarity, indeed, are in some cases so striking, that learned men have affirmed that Freemasonry was a secondary order of chivalry, and derived its origin from the usages of that institution. (g) For what reasons these authors deduce the forms of Freemasonry from the ceremonies of chivalry, it is impossible to conjecture. The only argument which they adduce, is the similarity of the institutions; but they do not consider, that this proves, with equal force, that Freemasonry is the parent of chivalry.—We have already shown that there were many secret institutions among the ancients, but particularly the Fraternity of Dionysian architects, which resembled Freemasonry in every thing but the name; and it requires no proof that these fraternities arose many hundred years before the existence of chivalry. If then there be any resemblance between the institutions which we have been comparing, we must consider Freemasonry as the fountain, and chivalry as the stream. The one was adapted to the habits of intelligent artists, and could flourish only in times of civilization and peace; the other was accommodated to the dispositions of a martial age, and could exist only in seasons of ignorance and war. With these observations, indeed, the history of both fraternities entirely corresponds. In the enlightened ages of Greece and Rome, when chivalry was unknown, Freemasonry flourished under the sanction of government, and the patronage of intelligent men. But, during the reign of Gothic ignorance and barbarity, which followed the destruction of imperial Rome, Freemasonry languished in obscurity, while chivalry succeeded in its place, and proposed to accomplish the same object but by different means, which though more rough and violent, were better suited to the manners of the age. And when science and literature revived in Europe, and scattered those clouds of ignorance and barbarism with which she had been overshadowed, chivalry decayed along with the manners that gave it birth, while Freemasonry arose with increasing splendor, and advanced with the same pace as civilization, and refinement;

The connection between chivalry and Freemasonry, is excellently exemplified in the fraternity of the Knights Templars. It is well known that this association was an order of chivalry, that the Templars performed its ceremonies, and were influenced by its precepts; and we have already shown, that the same association was initiated into the mysteries, was regulated by the maxims, and practised the rites of Freemasonry. But, though they then existed in a double capacity, it must be evident to all who study the History of the Templars, that their masonic character chiefly predominated; and that they deduced the name of their institution, and their external observances, from the usages of chivalry, to conceal from the Roman Pontiff the primary object of their order, and to hold their secret meetings free from suspicion or alarm. About this time, indeed, the church of Rome sanctioned the fraternity of operative Masons, and allowed them to perform their ceremonies without molestation or fear. But this clemency, as we have already shown, was the offspring of necessity; and the same interested motive which prompted his Holiness to patronise that trading association, could never influence him to countenance the duplicity of the Templars, or permit them to exist in their masonic capacity. It was the discovery, indeed, of their being Freemasons, of their assembling secretly, and performing ceremonies to which no stranger was admitted, that occasioned those awful calamities which befel their order. It will, no doubt, appear surprising to some readers, that such zealous defenders of the Catholic religion should practise the observances of an association, which the church of Rome has always persecuted with the bitterest hostility. But their surprise will cease when they are informed, that even about the middle of the eighteenth century when Freemasonry was prohibited in the Ecclesiastical States, by a papal bull, the members of the Romish church adopted the same plan. They were so attached to the principles and practice of the fraternity, that they established what they called a new association, into which they professed to admit none but zealous abettors of the papal hierarchy. In this manner, by flattering the pride of the church, they eluded its vigilance, and preserved the spirit of Freemasonry, by merely changing its name, and professing to make it subservient to the interests of the Pontificate.

Before leaving this subject, it may be interesting to some readers, and necessary for the satisfaction of others, to show in what manner the Knights Templars became depositaries of masonic mysteries. We have already seen, that almost all the secret associations of the ancients either flourished or originated in Syria, and the adjacent countries. It was here that the Dionysian artists, the Essenes, and the Kasideans arose. From this country also came several members of that trading association of Masons which appeared in Europe during the dark ages (h); and we are assured that, notwithstanding the favorable condition of that province, there exists, at this day, on Mount Libanus, one of these Syriac fraternities (i). As the order of the Templars, therefore, was originally formed in Syria, and existed there for a considerable time, it would be no improbable supposition that they received their masonic knowledge from the lodges in that quarter. But we are fortunately in this case not left to conjecture, for we are expressly informed by a foreign author(k), who was well acquainted with the history and customs of Syria, that the Knights Templars were actually members of the Syriac fraternities.

(h) Mr. Clinch, who appears to have been acquainted with the act, supposes that Freemasonry was introduced into Europe by means of the Gypsies. Anthologia Hibernica, for April 1794, p. 280. There was such an intimate connection between Asia and Europe in the time of the Crusades, that the customs and manners of the one, must, in some measure, have been transferred to the other.

Having thus compared Freemasonry with those secret associations which arose during the dark ages; let us now direct our attention to its progress in Britain, after it was extinguished in the other kingdoms of Europe. We have already seen that a trading fraternity of Freemasons existed in Europe during the middle ages; that many special favors were conferred upon them by the Roman See; that they had the exclusive privilege of erecting those magnificent buildings, which the pride of the church of Rome, and the misguided zeal of its members, had prompted them to rear; and that several masons travelled into Scotland, about the beginning of the twelfth century, and imported into that country the principles and ceremonies of their order. And we had illustrated several causes which preserved this association in Britain after its total dissolution on the Continent.

(k) Among these, another cause might have been mentioned, which, without doubt, operated very powerfully, in the preservation of Freemasonry in Britain. The first lodges in this country were certainly composed of foreigners, who, when the patronage of the church was withdrawn from them, were probably unable, or unwilling, to undergo the danger and expense of returning to their homes by sea. The lodges of which they undoubtedly were the leading members, would on this account, probably, continue in a more flourishing condition, as the foreign members would find it their interest to connect themselves with the inhabitants, by the ties of a brother mason, when they used no claim upon their affections as fellow countrymen. But the case was quite different with the continental lodges, which were entirely composed of artists from every country on the Continent; for, when the church of Rome had no further occasion for their services, they would return to their respective homes, and Freemasonry would soon decay when her supporters were dispersed, and her lodges forsaken.

CRITICISM.

From the Kjekkerbocker of December.

JACK SHEPPARD.

We believe it is ROBERT SOUTHWY, who relates, in some one of his matter-full books, that he once saw, on a populous borough-road in England, a full sized figure of Fame, erect, tiptoe, in the act of springing to take flight and soar aloft, her neck extended, her hand raised, the trumpet at her lips, and her cheeks inflated, as if about to send forth a blast which was to be heard even as far away as London. The image was placed, if we remember rightly, above a shop-board which announced that Mr. Somebody fitted up water-closets upon a new and improved principle! We have been reminded of this ambitious artizan, while reading English publisher's puffs of 'Jack Sheppard,' which have been repeated ad nauseam in the London journals, within the last three or four months. We are satisfied, from a perusal of the numbers as they appeared, that Mr. AINSWORTH's fame, so far as 'Jack Sheppard' was concerned, was of a peculiar kind, and vastly resembled infamy. The brilliant success of Mr. DICKENS, in his incidental but matchless pictures of metropolitan degradation and crime, undoubtedly prompted our author to attempt the feeble imitation before us; but instead of employing these themes as final accessories to a good purpose; Mr. Ainsworth adopts them as the very staple of a work, whose lessons are of the worst description. Its only merit, in fact—and even this has been greatly overated—is a certain degree of power in descriptions of nature and character. But there is nothing in 'Jack Sheppard' which can be said to approach the faintest of Boz's timings in this kind, in 'Oliver Twist,' and elsewhere. We endorse, unreservedly, the verdict of a London contemporary, (and a respectable portion of the English press are with him,) upon the character and imputations of this badly-conceived and worse executed work: 'Jack Sheppard' was a 'celebrated' house and prison breaker of the last century, and the history of his life is the vulgar and disgusting atrocities incidental to his 'gentle craft.' To relieve the tedium of an endless repetition of adventures, where each reflects its brother, and to raise the work above the level of a dry extract from the Newgate Calendar, and the newspapers of the day, the hero is involved in a melo-dramatic story of notiveless crime, and impossible folly, connected with personages of high degree; and an attempt is made to invest Sheppard with good qualities, which are incompatible with his character and position. But the sacrifice of probability and of moral propriety is vain. We never escape from the staple; crime is the one source of every interesting situation; and if we cannot exactly say that horse-pistols are the sources of horse-laughs, we may safely assert, the only proofs the dranatis personæ exhibit of possessing brains, is the constant liability under which they live, and move, and their being, of having them knocked or blown out.' In the elaboration of a work of this description, little is required beyond mere technical authorship. The invention and excitement are furnished to the author's hand. The characters, actions, thoughts, and expressions, dictated beforehand, are all of the lowest and the most monotonous kind. And yet the author of such a book as this has been favorable compared with DICKENS! Absurdity can no farther go.

MISCELLANY.

THE 'AMERICAN OURANG-OUTANG.'

'This is some monster, with four legs! Where the devil should he learn, our language? If I can recover him, and keep him tame and get to France with him, he shall pay for him that hath him and that roundly'—Free SHAKESPEARE.

THERE is no occupation more interesting to the inquiring mind, than the contemplation of the manifold freaks and vagaries with which dame Nature, in her sportive mood, is wont to amuse herself. To trace the division-lines between her kingdoms, ever has been a stumbling-stone to philosophy; and difficulty increases as you proceed, until finally, in attempting to follow her in her various windings, to her ultimate subdivisions, our discriminating faculties are utterly confounded. The unfeathered biped, in the fulness of his vanity, has flattered himself that, formed in the image of his Maker, there is no connecting link between him and the next in rank, in the descending scale of creation; that there is an impassable gulf which must ever separate the more creature of instinct from that higher order of beings, possessed of mind and reason. I will not stop to investigate this question, although sufficient evidence might be adduced to humble our pride: for I might tell of the wonderful sagacity of certain dogs; of learned pigs, that would put to the blush some of our mathematical professors; and I could quote the official report of one of our naval commanders, of his voyage to the coast of Africa, wherein he states that he saw the monkeys making baskets, and suggests whether they might not be employed to advantage in our navy-yards: but I will proceed with my story, which, unlike most stories, is literally true. It will at least show, that the enlightened population of Paris was once at fault, and that a human being was palmed upon them as an American ourang-outang!

A gentleman of the town of —, in Virginia, owned a slave by the name of Paul. He was a native African, about sixty years of age, four and a half feet high, with a short body, and uncommonly long arms. He had two small, twinkling eyes, which would have been in a remarkable state of propinquity, but for the intervention of a nose of ample latitude, barely elevated above the plane of his face. He had no chin, but what he lacked in this respect, was fully compensated by his under lip, which, with its partner extended nearly from ear to ear; so that when he laughed, to use an old comparison, his head was just half off. His knotty wool descended to within an inch of where his eyebrows should have been, over a forehead receding abruptly backward from his twinkling orbs; his ears were small and transparent; made apparently of the material of which bat's wings are formed; His face was shrivelled and wrinkled, and, from age or deformity, his body, had an undue inclination forward, with a compensating projection a posteriori. Such was Paul, and I shall hardly be accused of profanity when I say, that he might have been worshipped without a violation of the commandment.

It was Paul's good or bad fortune, as he was basking one August day, on the sunny side of the street, to attract the attention of a peri-patetic dealer in tinware and essences. He stopped and gazed long and wistfully at Paul. Vague, and undefined, and novel notions coursed through the pericranium of the pedler. He took a step forward, hesitated, then crossed over, and finally, with 'speculation in his eye,' addressed Paul. He inquired to whom he belonged, and whether he was willing to be sold. He told him that if he was willing, he would buy him, make him a free man, and pay him well for his services beside. The pedler's ways were very insinuating; and after a little farther parley, Paul surrendered at discretion, went to his master, and insisted on being sold.

Now Paul's master was one of the most benevolent charitable, and humane man in the world. He had owned him forty years, and would just as soon have thought of selling one of his children, as selling Paul. He refused at once. Paul begged—the pedler importuned. Human nature could stand no more. Paul was sold.

Some time after this event, a gentleman who had been residing abroad, returned to Virginia, and gave me the following account. He was passing, he said, through one of the thoroughfares of Paris, when his progress was impeded by a great crowd, and his attention directed to an avant-courier, or herald, who was announcing the exhibition of an 'American ourang-outang,' a most wonderful animal, and the only one ever exhibited in Europe. His curiosity was excited, and elbowing his way through the multitude, he gained admission to the show. Ye gods and goddesses! what was his amazement, on recognizing, in this marvellous lusus nature, his old acquaintance Paul! Paul—on whom, in by-gone days, he had played so many a school boy prank—here in an iron cage, playing the monkey in Paris, to a delighted audience. The harmless, quiet, and inoffensive Paul, who would not have hurt a fly, confined like a felon, with a chain around his waist; skipping about his prison-house, chattering, jabbering, and grinning, and munching, with Simian avidity, the nuts thrown to him by the crowd! He was dressed in a full suit of red regimentals, in the French style, bedizened with gold-lace; and on his head was an enormous chapeau-bras; while from an eyelet-hole, in the seat of his inexpressibles, protruded a bona-fide tail, of due proportions, which he whisked about, as, though it had been a thing of life. Anon he would throw himself on one side, tickle himself the while with his long nails; then gallop on all fours around his cage; and finally when fairly tired out by exertion, quietly seat himself in a corner, and throwing aside the monkey, assume the stolid gravity of the man.

The first idea of my friend was to expose the fraud; but a sly wink of recognition from Paul, determined him to humour the joke. He played to admiration; all Paris was agog; and nothing was talked about but the "American ourang-outang."

Months had passed away, and Paul's adventures had faded from my memory, when one day, passing in a steamboat through Hampton Roads, a signal was made from a vessel that had just cast anchor. A boat, with a man in her stern-sheets, was shoved off, and in a few moments she was alongside the steamboat; and if old Neptune himself had risen from the waves, I could not have been more surprised than I was to recognise in our new passenger my old friend Paul!

Very cordial was our greeting; and after welcoming him with a glass of grog, and a hearty shake of his long skinny fingers, I insisted upon hearing his adventures from his own lips. Suffice it to say, the story as I have related it, was correct in all its essentials; with the addition only, that finding he had to do all the work, and the Yankee kept all the money, he came to the conclusion that it was a losing copartnership on his side: so he made his escape; and for aught I know to the contrary, he is still living in ease and comfort, with his oldest and best friends.

From the Phil. Enquirer

THE FATE OF MRS. BISHOP.

We alluded, some days since, to the elopement of Mrs. Bishop, with Bochs, the harpist, and ventured to predict that a dreadful penalty would soon overtake her. The prediction is already fulfilled. Late accounts from England, state that nothing can exceed the sensation of disgust and indignation, which her elopement with such a man has produced throughout all society, both in England and on the Continent.—

The finger of scorn was pointed at her, and the language of censure was changing rapidly into that of a still stronger feeling. Bochsa is said to be stained with many a vice. A fugitive from the effects of crime, he finds that he has involved his victim in miseries, from which his talents, and they are great, cannot relieve her, nor in which his good qualities, if he possessed any, can soothe her. They have been denied a hearing in Hamburg, either on their own account, or as assisting in the concerts of other professors. Russia has forbidden their admittance; in France, Bochsa dare not for his life set foot; the fame, or rather the infamy of the fugitives, seem to fly in advance of them. In the meantime, sentiments and demonstrations of sympathy with the forsaken husband are now generally manifested, and a public concert was about to be given, in a central situation, at which all the élite of the profession had evinced their desire to assist, and thus at once testify their respect for Mr. Bishop, and their abhorrence of the conduct which has called for this public demonstration.

What a fearful admonition does not this case afford! How mad must have been the infatuation of the woman! Honored, successful and prosperous at home, idolized by her husband—nothing but temporary insanity, as it strikes us, could have induced her to throw herself into the arms, and identify her name with the infamy of her abandoned companion. An intelligent correspondent, of a Southern paper, some time since, made some remarks in the course of a notice of "Chevely," which appears to us highly appropriate to the present case, "Contrariety of temper and unkindness," he observes "have been urged as good and sufficient reasons for divorce; but never can they release woman from the vows of her virgin heart. What is the value of the casket after the jewel has been stolen? A woman cannot be required to love a husband whose conduct towards her is brutal. 'Nothing on compulsion'—but especially love. Yet she can drive from her presence the man who is stealing from her that heart, which, if she cannot bestow upon her husband, she ought to bury, while he lives, deep in her own bosom. When she married, she —'Staked her life upon a cast!'

After she has taken that step, she must

'Stand the hazard of the die!'

Who has not admired those most beautiful of all the lines of Goldsmith, commencing with

'When lovely woman stoops to folly,' in the Vicar of Wakefield? Like the lovely, yet unfortunate Olivia, pencilled in those lines, all that is left for her 'is to die.' To apply the language of Addison's Cato to married life,

"When love once p's its admission to her heart,
The woman that deliberates, is lost."

When Cleopatra wished to die, she applied an asp to her arm, that the infusion of its poison might accomplish the object. But a serpent, far more deadly than that—as deadly as the one which whispered in the ear of Eve amidst the bowers of Eden—instills its poison into the very heart of a married woman, who does not, cannot 'love her lord,' when she listens to the impassioned tale of unhallowed love. That lost Eve the happiness of Paradise. This wrests from woman—like the glorious works of art, lovely even when in ruins—not only the joys of earth, but the hopes of Heaven."

EFFECTS OF RAILROADS.—A writer in Blackwood's Magazine, in taking a view of the anticipated effects of railroads upon national character, makes the following observations.

"The steam engine, i. e. its effective state, is not yet ten years old, yet it is already spreading not merely over Europe but over the vast Savannas of the new world. What will all this come to in the next fifty years? What must be the effect of the gigantic stride over the ways of the world? What the mighty influence of that mutual communication, which even in its feeblest state has been, in every age, the grand instrument of civilization? Throw down the smallest barrier between two civilized nations, and from that hour both become more civilized. Open the close shut coast of China or Japan to mankind and from that the condition of the people will be in progress of improvement. The barbarian and despot hate the stranger. Yet for the fullest state of civilization, freedom and enjoyment, of which each is capable, the one thing needful is the fullest intercourse of nation with nation, of man with man. The facilities of the railroad are made for peace, its tendency is to make nations feel, the value of peace and unless some other magnificent invention shall come to supercede its use, and obliterate the memory of its service, we cannot suffer ourselves to doubt that the whole system, which is now in course of adoption with such ardor throughout Europe, will yet be acknowledged as having given the mightiest propulsion to the general improvement of mankind."

IRREVERENT CONDUCT OF A DOG.—Singular as it may appear, the following anecdote strongly exhibits how frequently trifling occurrences influence state affairs.

'Among the historical anecdotes of dogs, it must not be forgotten that the memorable schism between England and Rome, which commenced in the reign of Henry the VII, were rendered irreconcilable by the irreverent behavior of Sir Thomas Boleyn's dog to Pope Clement the VII.—Sir Thomas Boleyn, who was father of the celebrated Anne Boleyn, afterwards one of the Queens of Henry VIII, had been created Earl of Wiltshire by that monarch, and was at the head of the embassy appointed by him to argue the point of his divorce from Catherine of Arragon, before the council assembled at Bologna, in presence of the Pope. The pope, when he gave audience to the Earl, required that he should acknowledge his supremacy by kissing his toe. This, the Earl being of the reformed religion, positively refused to do, although it was a piece of homage which all the sovereigns of Europe were accustomed to perform, when admitted into the presence of the head of the papal church.

While Clement, in a very high tone, was insisting on the propriety of the English Earl submitting to the ceremony and extending his toe significantly towards him at the same time the Earl's dog, imagining no doubt, that a signal insult was intended to his master by this gesture, sprang forward, and bit his holiness' toe, which provoked a general burst of laughter from all present, and was so highly resented by the Pope, that he refused to admit the Earl to a second audience. The Earl of Wiltshire returned to England with his suit—and the separation of the country from the papal see took place in less than four years after this ridiculous incident.'

THE GATHERER.

Invention of Maps.—Strabo says that Anaximander was the first Greek who invented a map. "Among the Egyptians, Senostris is said to have been the first author of maps. At the conclusion of his travels, he sketched on tablets his route, which is said to have been a great wonder to the Egyptians and the Cœchians. After Anaximander, Heraticus, Democritus, and Eudoxus taught geography by maps. Traces of maps are discoverable in Joshua XVIII. 8. and Herodotus makes mention of a brazen geographical tablet shown by Aristogoras, tyrant of Miletus, to Cleomenes King of Sparta. The oldest maps in existence are Pentinger ablets, the history of which is highly curious.

The Character of Children.—"Men are but children of a larger growth," and preserve, generally speaking, through their lives the characteristics impressed upon their minds, moral principles, and tempers, from the age of two till fifteen. At the later period they are less at home. The school, the counting house, the work-shop, begin to remove them, and each succeeding year removes them still more, from family influence and parental supervision. During this period, then, the mother gives the decided tone to the character of children. She is at home, while the occupations of business carry the father abroad. Upon mothers, then, devolves a responsibility as lasting as time, and mighty as the consequences of her influence are momentous. The mother must be a good woman, or her children will be wayward in infancy, vicious in youth, bad in their maturity, and miserable in age. There are women virtuous in conduct, of good intentions and generous feelings, but who fail in one point, on which happiness depends—temper. If a mother is given to fretfulness, anger, and ill nature, her children of necessity acquire the same qualities. Her house is a bedlam, and she imparts to her children that which is almost certain to make them unhappy and unsuccessful in life. Next to virtuous principles a good temper is the greatest and the richest dowry a mother can bestow on her children. New York Whig.

SPINSTERS.—Formerly it was a maxim that a young woman should never be married till she had spun her self a set of body, table, and bed linen. From this custom all unmarried women, were termed spinsters, an appellation they still retain in England, in all deeds and law proceedings.

Beautiful Sentiment.—The modest deportment of those who are truly wise, when contrasted with the assuming air of the ignorant, may be compared to the different appearance of wheat, which, while its ear is empty, holds up its head proudly, but as soon as it is filled with grain, bends modestly down, and withdraws from observation.

A limner taking the portrait of a lady, perceived that when he was endeavoring to give a resemblance to her mouth, she was twisting her features in order to render it smaller, and put her lips in the most violent contraction. Impatient of this artifice, the painter at length said,—"Don't hurt yourself madam, in trying to make your mouth smaller, because if you choose, I will put none at all."

A singular feudal privilege appears in Du Cange, that of the lord being entitled to the table cloth, towel, &c. of the house where he dined. It seems that table cloths were made for the nobility and opulent gentry of great value; one would cost 18l. Damask table cloths are of great antiquity. La Brocquiere thus describes some used abroad:—"They are (says he,) four feet in diameter and round, having strings attached to them, so that they may be drawn up like a purse. When they are used they are spread out, and when the meal is over they are drawn up, so that all which remain over, to a crumb, is preserved."—Fosbrook's Antiquities.

GROUND OF RECOGNITION.—A man went to a restaurateur's (or chop house) in France, to dine. He perceived another man in the room and hurried away to tell the master. "If you do not, Sir, order that man, who is dining alone at the table in the corner, out of your house, a respectable individual will not be able to sit down in it." "How is that Sir?" "Because that is the executioner of R—," The host after some hesitation, at length went and spoke to the stranger, who calmly answered: "By whom have I been recognized?" "By that gentleman," said the landlord pointing out the former. "Indeed, he ought to know me, for it is not two years since I whipped and branded him."

An honest and sensible country parson, who, in the time of drought, was deared to pray for rain, answered, "I'll willingly do it to oblige you but it is of no purpose while the wind is this quarter."

CASUALTY.—On Saturday evening last, Mr. Asher Spencer, residing in the east part of this town, while returning home from the village, was thrown from his wagon and so much injured that he expired in a few hours. The night was very dark, and one of his horses was exceedingly restive. Mr S. was injured in the spine; and although his senses continued to the last moment, he was unable, from the time he received the injury, to move a limb.—He was a respectable inhabitant and an exemplary member of the Baptist Church.—Owego Advertiser.

Fire and loss of Life.—The dwelling house of Derrick Groat in the town of Copake took fire in the night about two weeks ago, and a son of Mr. Groat aged about thirty years, sleeping in an upper room, perished in the flames. Nearly every article of furniture was destroyed.—[Hudson Republican].

Look out for Altered Bills.—Sylvester & Co., of the New Reporter and Counterfeit Detector, have shown us a one dollar bill on the city "City Trust & Banking Company," ingeniously altered into a five,—the word and figure five being pasted over the original one. It would easily deceive.

THE FORTUNES OF THE GRENADEUR MOREAU.

Wonderful enough in all points of view, the victories of the French under the Empire were nothing so extraordinary as with respect to the great and eventful changes which they produce in the condition and fortunes of individuals of all ranks and classes, from the conscript peasant to the possessor of a throne.—No Arabian story-teller ever dreamt of inventing such things as were then seen to take place in real life, and of this truth the city of Tours, in the year 1829, witnessed one striking proof, in the history of the grenadier Moreau, whose name is prefixed to the present narrative. It was in the year 1806 that this individual, then a youth of twenty, was sent from the recruiting depot in his native town of Tours towards the Prussian frontier, where the Emperor Napoleon was at the time concentrating his forces, and preparing for the opening of a campaign. Eugene Moreau was descended from a family which had been once of provincial respectability, but had become latterly so much decayed that his immediate progenitors held a humble position of small farmers, or, to speak more plainly of peasants. As regarded personal appearance, Eugene would have done honor to the noblest ancestry. To say that he was merely handsome, would be disparaging and unjust. His person was tall and beautifully formed; his features remarkably fine and regular, and his eye dark, sparkling, and animated; while his air and gait were at once pleasing and noble. In short a sculptor would have had but to cover the youth's black and glossy locks with a Greek head-piece, to have in him a perfect model of the goddess-born Achilles, or the more graceful Antinous.

The eye of the Emperor was too searching and discriminative not to alight soon on such a figure as that of Moreau. On reaching Bamberg, a Bavarian town where the first head quarters of the grand army were established, the young recruit chanced to fall in Napoleon's way. After a momentary glance of admiration, the Emperor turned to an inferior officer behind him, and pointing with his finger to Moreau, exclaimed "That stripling is for my guard." Moreau heard the words, and imagined at the moment that he felt in his grasp the baton of a marshal of France. For the time, his fanciful anticipation was no further gratified than in his finding a place among the private grenadiers of the third regiment of the imperial guard. But youth and hope kept his fancy still at work in drawing magnificent pictures of the future. More particularly was this the case, when wrapped in his cloak and stretched on the ground by the side of the bivouac fire, he listened to the older soldiers going over their reminiscences of Egypt, and revelling in exaggerated descriptions of the riches which their eyes had there beheld, or perhaps their hands had touched, and of the dark-eyed sultans, glittering with pearls and diamonds, who had smiled upon the soldier's path, and offered, it may be, to follow him over the world. Moreau had received but an ordinary education, and simplicity was a natural characteristic of his mind. He knew not yet what was really was and his ear drank in such recitals, till he became accustomed to regard the hopes excited by them as certain to be realised in his own case.

The French army ran over a portion of Prussia, and came to the vast plain of Jena. There, as every one knows, was fought a mighty battle, which delivered over Berlin to the Emperor of France. This great conflict has nothing to do with the particular history of Moreau, but it is a matter of justice to say that he fought in it like a lion, and helped well to maintain the fame of the guard of which he was a member. Subsequently to the engagement the main army marched upon the Prussian capital, while a small division to which Moreau was attached, was ordered to take station temporarily at Weimar.

In the distribution of billets at Weimar, our young soldier got one fixing him singly upon a chateau about a mile distant from the town. As the light-hearted Eugene walked from the town to his destined abode, scarcely feeling the weight of his arms or his knapsack, his thoughts ran back over the changes which had taken place during the last six months of his life. In May, a peasant, labouring on his father's little field; in October, a soldier—a member of Napoleon's guard, and one of the conquerors of Jena; and who knew how grand the next change might be? His company had lost many men, and had performed prodigies of valor. The hour of reward was yet to come, and then his arm might be decorated by the corporal's or serjeant's stripes—the only honourable kind of them—and even the cross of honor might be planted on his breast. Such were Moreau's imaginings as he drew near the chateau, pointed out to him as the place designated in his billet. He rang the gate bell, and the door opened instantly. Stepping forward into the court, he saw no human being, but two furious dogs met him in the face, and threatened to tear him to pieces. In fact, the servants, seeing the soldier approach, had thought this a fit way to receive and repulse an enemy. But Moreau was not one to beat a retreat on such grounds as these. Keeping the dogs at bay with his musket, he cried, "Hollo!—down you vicious brutes! Hollo! you inside there! call off the dogs, else I shall be obliged to hurt them! Hollo!"

No one chose to hear the cry, however, and Moreau struck one of the dogs lifeless at his feet by a blow from the butt end of his piece. The other animal he dexterously contrived to seize by one of his hind legs, and swinging it above his head with a powerful arm, dashed out its brains against the court wall. He then tranquilly advanced to the inner entrance of the chateau, which was half open. As he pushed this door to the wall, he saw a whole posse of domestics flying out an opposite side of the lobby hall. Eugene thought to himself that a soldier of the emperor's guard had a right to better treatment than this, but he was patient and sweet-tempered; so he said nothing, but marched forward. Apartment after apartment showed him no living person, and he began to grow wearied of this style of reception, as well as a little irritated thereby, when all at once he heard the sound of a female voice. Following the direction, he soon found himself in a retired chamber, face to face with a young lady who was seated with her harp by her side, and her finger in the act of touching its chords.

"Mein herr," said the startled young lady, and then paused; for her eye had caught the tricoloured cockade in the soldier's cap, indicating that he belonged to the hostile army that had invaded her country. "Monsieur," said she, changing her address from her mother tongue to that of her visitor. But she carried her speech no further. Her fingers quitted her harp, and she remained motionless before the young soldier of France.

Often, often did Moreau in after years describe that first interview, and always with a degree of tenderness that affected the hearer, though circumstances might make him doubtful at the time of the truth of the narration. All Moreau's anger fled at the sight of the lady; his soul trembled in his hand; and that fair-haired beauty of the north, with her blue eyes and her snow-like skin, appeared to him far to surpass all the pictures which his older comrades had drawn of Egyptian loveliness. Her eyes were cast on him with an expression at once of entreaty and kindness, as if beseeching his protection and proffering a friendly reception. It would appear as if she had noticed his impatient look on entering the room. "My servants," said she, when after a pause, she followed up her first words, "mon sieur," my servants have received you inhospitably, but they are grieved at late events, and grief does not reason." But poor Moreau was already so far from feeling anger, that he could almost have knelt down and asked pardon for having killed the lady's dogs, though, had he not done so, they would probably have torn him to pieces.

The Countess Diana de Drucken was the name of the lady in whose chateau Moreau now took up his residence. She was a widow, and still extremely young having been married almost in childhood to a wealthy old noble, at the wish or rather the command of her proud and ambitious brothers and kindred. Her husband soon died, leaving no child to inherit his wealth. The young countess lived alone at the time when fortune brought Moreau to the chateau. Whether from the lady's desire not to provoke an invading enemy, or from other motives personal to Moreau (whose ancestral respectability she soon learnt from conversation with himself), certain it is that he was entertained, during his stay of several weeks, like an honoured guest. He occupied the apartments of the late master of the mansion, and the same domestics who had lately received him so curiously, became his devoted slaves. In his simplicity, the young soldier was no whit astonished at all this; he found it quite natural to live in a beautiful chateau, to walk (not alone) every morning in a magnificent park, to mount the finest horses for an evening ride, to be served by lacqueys covered with embroidery, and to dine on three courses daily with a countess. Had not he heard at the bivouac fires, that such was the soldier's common fortune in Egypt? Moreover he loved the countess, and, remembering the ancient honors of his family more than his present condition, he thought not of concealing his love. On him the passion took its usual effect; it softened his manners, gave inspiration to his tongue, and threw a grace and delicacy over his every thought and every action. The sincerity of his love was too obvious to be doubted for an instant. He was young (in truth almost a boy soldier), beautiful, and a conqueror. The Countess Diana could not help herself. Though seeing their true relative position much more clearly than Moreau did, the passion of the soldier found an echo ere long in her bosom. She had none about her to keep her pride of rank awake. An old infirm chaplain, verging on the grave, was her only present friend and counsellor, and he was too much attached to her to make any annoying opposition to her wishes. The issue may be guessed.

The happy Moreau saw nothing in the future but visions of pleasure and joy. He loved too sincerely ever to cast a thought on the fortune of the countess, but he had other ambitious thoughts. "It is true," said he, "that I am only one of the humble soldiers of the emperor, but it is from among them that he chooses his captains, and I feel assured that I shall become one of them." The countess was less hopeful of the future, but she could not cast a damp over these anticipations. And when the period of Moreau's stay came to a close, when his detachment was ordered to join head-quarters, she did not express to the young soldier the fears that filled her own mind whenever the thought of her haughty relatives, and of her reunion with them, crossed her memory. The last words of Moreau were, "It is but necessary that I should speak to my major, and he will speak to the emperor, and all will be arranged." The countess swore to be ever faithful; and Moreau promised that he would be careful of his life, and return with the cross of honor, and the epaulettes of an officer. Bathed with the countess's tears, the young soldier then took his way from the chateau, but often cast back his eyes, and gazed, as long as he could see it, on the hand of the lady of his love waving a kerchief in token of reiterated farewells.

The soldier of the guard rejoined his regiment as altered being. A marshal's baton no longer glittered before his eyes; a parchment, sealed with the great seal of the empire, and authorising his legal union with the Countess Diana de Drucken, was the object to which all his thoughts tended. He forbore to speak of the lady of the chateau to his comrades, but to his major he took an opportunity of revealing all. That officer replied briefly, "Ah! well, my fine lad, all this may be true, but we can say and do nothing about it till we come to the emperor's head-quarters." Soon afterwards, Moreau's regiment entered Potsdam only some hours before the expected arrival of the emperor, and was drawn up beside the palace of Sans-Souci, to be reviewed by him as he passed. Napoleon's visage was bland and smiling as he moved slowly on his white battle-horse along the ranks which had so bravely fought at Jena. When he came before the spot where Moreau stood, the latter, who had made up his mind to plead his own cause, stood forward from the ranks, presented arms, and begged permission to say a word. "Speak," said the emperor, who encouraged these personal appeals. "I wish to marry, sire, if it be your good pleasure," said Moreau. "What! in the middle of a campaign?" replied Napoleon; "what suttler gipsy has decoyed you to this?" "Sire!" said the simple hearted Moreau, "it is no suttler, but a lady near Jena, who is beautiful as an angel, and rich as the mayors of Tours." The emperor smiled, and the young soldier continued—"She has sworn her faith to me; and, for me I have promised to her to have one day the cross of honour and the epaulettes of a captain." "Her name?" said the emperor. "The Countess Diana of Drucken," was Moreau's answer.

At this name the emperor, showed a degree of displeased surprise. In a second or two he exclaimed, "Fy! you a soldier of France, to forget yourself thus and wish to degrade yourself and your comrades by an alliance with a stranger, an enemy of France! Think no more of it! Return to your place in the ranks!" As he spoke, he gave the spur to his charger, and flew at full gallop to another regiment. The exact motives which led him thus to crush the hopes of poor Moreau can scarcely even be guessed at with any certainty. It is possible that he doubted the statement of the soldier and thought there could be no true desire for such a marriage on the part of the Countess of Drucken. Whatever was the emperor's impression, his decision was ruinous to Moreau's hopes. The emperor's sanction alone could have removed all obstacles from the way of the lovers. Even a simple discharge could not be got without it, and the soldier would have died sooner than desert.

The campaign went on, and Moreau fought bravely through it. Another and another campaign followed, and he was still in the guards of Napoleon. The fearful invasion of Russia found him in the same position, and he was with his master till the abdication at Fontainebleau. By this time Moreau had won the cross of the legion of honor, and had risen in the service, though not to a commission; but hard toil and wounds had done much of the usual work of time upon him. The remembrance of the Countess Diana, however, remained ever fresh on his memory. He had written to Weimar, to Madame the Countess of Drucken, but either the post or the lady was faithless. He received no reply—not a word—not a token of reminiscence. When the Bourbons finally brought with them a general peace, Moreau visited his aged father and his native Tours. There he found many old friends, and they would have had him to marry a young and pretty girl, and settle himself for life; but he was the chosen bridegroom of a countess, and he refused all proffers of this kind; waiting always, with undiminished anxiety, for the appearance of the coronetted carriage, which he confidently expected to come one day and carry him to his beloved. At length weary, of waiting in vain, he set aside four or five quarters of his pension, and, with a staff in his hand, took the road to Prussia. Very different was he in appearance from the tall, erect, and noble-looking guardman, who had followed on his emperor's heels from victory to victory on the German plains. Moreau, though comparatively young in years, was in aspect a toil-worn veteran, with wrinkled brow and slightly stooping figure; but his heart was as simple as ever, and he had preserved all the bright hopes and illusions of youth, and one, in particular, in undying freshness. He reached Weimar, and, with beating heart, passed on to the chateau of the countess. Diana had disappeared; the chateau had long been possessed and inhabited by strangers, to whom nothing but the name of the former proprietors was known. About their abode and condition Moreau could learn nothing.

Tours saw our soldier return once more, poor and wearied, but hoping still. His relatives, and friends, to whom he talked confidently and freely on the subject, considered his expectations as completely illusory and resembling one of those curious instances of monomania which are not unusual in the world. All loved the veteran, nevertheless, for he was the most innocent of human beings.

In the year 1829, Moreau still remained at Tours, and still found the chief solace of life in the hopes which all who knew him considered vain and delusive. The summer of the year mentioned, however, was signalled by the arrival in Tours of a superb berlin (a particular species of German travelling-carriage), drawn by four horses. A young man was the sole occupant of this, and scarcely had he entered the town, when he left the carriage, and made enquiry "if Moreau, a grenadier of the old imperial guard, was still alive, and still resided in Tours?" The answer was in the affirmative, and the young man requested to be guided to his residence. A person readily offered to execute this task, and walked forward the veteran's dwelling, the carriage as well as its owner following. "Yonder is Moreau," said the guide, "seated on his stone bench." The young man moved forward alone to the side of the soldier, who was indeed basking his still noble-looking head in the rays of the evening sun "Are you Moreau of the old guard?" said the stranger with a faltering voice.

The German accent of the youth was instantaneously caught by the veteran's ear. Yes," cried he, starting up, "I am Moreau, of the third regiment of the old guard, whom the emperor at Potsdam prevented from marrying. Does my bride call me at length? Does Diana send to seek me? I am here!—I am ready!" It was an affecting sight to see a white-haired old man thus warming at the remembrance of a youthful love.

"It is you whom I seek," said the youth, clasping the old man's hand, and seemingly struggling to conceal his emotions from the public eye: "enter this carriage. I am come to conduct you to the chateau of Drucken." Half embraced by his conductor, Moreau, ascended the vehicle, and the postillions, at a signal, drove rapidly away. Moreau, the grenadier of the old guard of Napoleon, was no more seen in Tours or in his native France!

Diana Countess of Drucken was not unfaithful to the young soldier. But when rejoined by her family, after the terrors caused by the French visit, had a little subsided, they threatened her even with death if she attempted to prosecute her engagement with Moreau. Effectually to mar her purpose, they strove to induce her to marry again, but this they could not effect. It was only, however, when the truth could not be longer concealed, that she dared to tell them that the ceremony of marriage had already passed between Moreau and herself, the old chaplain being the officiating minister, and also the sole witness, on the occasion. Bitterly as the kindred of the countess cursed this secret connection, they agreed, on condition that she solemnly swore never to disgrace them by sending for Moreau, to torment her no more with schemes of re-marriage, and to permit herself to bring up the boy to whom she gave birth, under the character of her nephew and avowed heir. The very name of Moreau was sentenced to oblivion. The fear of endangering her son's welfare caused the countess to keep her engagement unbroken, though her unchanged affection for Moreau would often strongly tempt her to an opposite line of conduct. But, on her death bed, the countess revealed for the first time to her son his true history and parentage, and laid her dying commands upon him to go to Tours, and to render comfortable the old age of his father, if he still lived. Her own heart, at that truth-displaying moment, was wrung with remorse at the reflection that she had permitted any engagements whatever to separate her from one to whom she had solemnly and lastingly bound herself.

Arrived at Drucken, Moreau could only weep over the tomb of her for whom he had yearned for twenty-four long years. But the tender cares of his son, who had taken him from Tours, rendered the veteran's latter days happy. If he had not the object of his life's dream beside him, he had at least the satisfaction of knowing that she had not been unfaithful to him.

SALMAGUNDI.

QUEEN VICTORIA.—An American in London, draws the following picture of Victoria, which he asserts is correct. We find it in the U.S. Gazette.

The Queen's mouth is her most striking defect; the short upper lip can only be closed over the projecting teeth by an effort, which it is unpleasant to behold. Eyes prominent, but inexpressive, and, to borrow a sentence from one of her loyal subjects, (editor of the Sunday Times) 'she has the mournful vacuity of the Guelph face in her perfection.' Her bust is exceedingly fine, but the symmetry of the figure is defective, as she appears much taller in proportion, sitting, than when upon her feet. The ears are so remarkably large as to attract attention, as was observed by the artist who executed the bust. Her feet and hands are rather pretty.—Educated for the high station she fills, her natural powers have been drawn out to their utmost tension. Yet, to judge from many of her acts, she is proud and vacillating in her attachments, her mother is now less in her confidence than her maids of honor; a German woman, the Baroness Lehzen, near sixty years old, being first confidant, and exercises, over her an almost unbounded influence. In fine, 'Victoria' might have done very well in a lower station, but nature never intended her for any thing great. The accident of birth has placed her on the throne of England. With a good ministry, all will go on well—for the monarch is little more than a gilded puppet. She leans to the liberal side; but, as yet, pleasure and the trappings of state to which may now be added the prospect of a husband are more to her than the welfare and happiness of the people.

VALUE OF TIME. The difference of rising every morning at six and eight o'clock, in the course of 40 years, supposing a person to go to bed at the same time he otherwise would, amounts to 29,200 hours, or three years 121 days, 19 hours, which afford eight hours per day, for exactly ten years (a weighty consideration) were added in which we may command eight hours every day for the cultivation of our lives and the despatch of business.

THE DEVIL AND THE LAWYERS. The following anecdote may, in some measure, account for the generally received opinion, that there is a certain intimacy carried on between the inhabitants of the Inns of court and his Satanic Majesty:—Saint Evena, a lawyer of Brittain, went to Rome to entreat the Pope to give the lawyers a patron; the Pope replied that he knew of no saint not already disposed of to some other profession. His Holiness proposed, however, to St. Evena that he go round the church of Sionni Laterano blind folded, and, after saying a certain number of Ave Marias, the first saint laid hold of should be his patron. This the good old lawyer undertook, and, at the end of his Ave Marias, stopped at the altar of St. Michael, where he laid hold, not of saint—but unfortunately the Devil, under the saint's feet's, crying out—"this is our saint let him be our patron."

TART REPLY. A certain courtier to whom Queen Elizabeth had given her promise to promote him, began to grow impatient at the delay. One day the Queen perceived him in the palace garden, and looking out of the window, asked him, "What does a man think of who thinks of nothing?" to which, after a short pause, he replied, "madam, he thinks of a woman's promises."

A gentleman apt to be very witty when in liquor was asked by an acquaintance, if he belonged to the playhouse? he replied, "No; why did you ask me?" "Because," returned his friend, "you are so Dram-Attic!"

CAMP MEETING ANECDOTE.—At a camp meeting, a number of ladies continued standing on the benches notwithstanding frequent hints from the ministers to sit down. A reverend old gentleman, noted for his good humor, arose and said: "I think if those ladies standing on the benches knew they had holes in their stockings, they would sit down." This address had the desired effect—there was an immediate sinking into the seats. A young minister standing behind him, and blushing to the temples, said: "O, brother, how could you say that?" "Say that?" said the old gentleman, "it's a fact, if they had 'nt holes in their stockings, I'd like to know how they could get them on?"

A surgeon being called as a witness, for the purpose of proving damages upon an action of assault, deposed that he had bled the plaintiff, and being asked, upon oath, if bleeding was necessary, candidly answered, "We always find it NECESSARY to do SOMETHING when sent for."

A sprightly young widow had just received addresses of a tender sort from two gentlemen, both virtuous, respectable and amiable; one of them however, a most accomplished scholar, the other a child of Peru; when her brother entered the room where she was sitting in an attitude of more profound cogitation than was usual with her. My dear sister, said he, are you going to astonish the world with a perpetual motion or the quadrature of the circle; or are you plotting to blow up oxygen and hydrogen with a new nomenclature. Neither, George, she replied, I was merely resolving a question of dollars and sense.

Alexander the great, seeing Diogenes, looking attentively at a large collection of human bones, piled one upon another, asked the philosopher what he was looking for? "I am searching," says Diogenes, "for the bones of your father, but I cannot distinguish them from those of his slaves."

AMERICAN MASONIC REGISTER.

ALBANY, SATURDAY, JAN. 11, 1840.

CRIME—AND ITS REWARD.—On New Years Eve, a party of rioters in New York, went into a German house, destroyed the furniture, and outrageously abused two of the female inmates. After a desperate fight the rioters were finally driven off. In a few hours however, they returned with a reinforcement, and on attacking the house, the Germans discharged a volley of muskets among them, which fortunately killed their leader, a vagabond by the name of Armstrong and wounded several of his gang. Renewed attempts were made during the night to destroy the house which was defeated by the vigilance of the police.

The daily occurrence of scenes like this cannot fail of striking dismay and terror into the hearts of every reflecting mind. There is fault, grievous fault, somewhere. Our laws are trodden under foot, with impunity, and we appear to be fast approaching that state of society, when the only safety of the citizen will be in the weapons he must necessarily carry for the purposes of self-defence. Our laws have been brought into contempt by the uncertainty of their execution—the manslaughter roams at large among us, and the midnight rioter is suffered to pass unpunished, either by a sympathizing jury, or by a clemency almost criminal. The unrighteous acquittal of Robinson, has done more positive injury to the moral tone of society, than any other occurrence within the last fifty years. By its influence three other murders are untoned for, in our state, and its influence is more or less felt in the utter recklessness to unenforced law. The very case before us, affords an instance of criminal apathy, in the holding of one of these rioters to $300 bail!! The New York Sunday Morning Atlas, holds the following language in relation to this disgraceful affair.—

“Rowdyism and riot, rarely existing save in a sacked city, was daily growing and increasing in strength: a man's house was no longer his castle; his property was no longer secure; the honor and chastity of his wife and daughter was exposed to the tender mercies of a ruthless mob. An example was required. The press, inimical in almost all cases to the extreme penalty of the law, saw that mercy here would be extreme cruelty, and advised and called for the carrying out of the fearful penalty incurred. The evil, not checked by the arm of the law, has grown in magnitude; and who shall say, after the acts enacted on New-Year's Eve, that if the law will not protect our property and our lives, we shall not put our castles, as our houses under the proper administration of the law are and ought to be a state of defence, and shoot down the first person who seeks to invade our rights.”

INSTALLATION.—Phoenix Lodge, No. 58, at Lansingburgh, was publicly installed on the 27th, with becoming solemnity. The Lodge met at their Hall, and proceeded in procession to the Phoenix Hotel, where a large number of brethren from Troy and other places were assembled to receive them. The procession having been formed, moved to the M. E. Church, where the Rev. Br. Phineas Whipple, offered up a prayer to the Throne of Grace, after which an appropriate Masonic Hymn was sung by the choir.

The R. W. G. W. John D. Willard then proceeded to the Installation of the officers of the Lodge, in due form. After an Ode had been sung, Br. H. T. Eddy, delivered an eloquent and appropriate Address, which was again followed by an Ode, and a short, but pertinent address from Br. Rayner. The Choir, then sung an original piece, adapted to the occasion, and the services were closed by a benediction from Br. Whipple.

A large and respectable audience was in attendance.

who were evidently gratified with the solemn and impressive services of the occasion.

The following Officers installed, were,

A part of our edition of last week was any thing but creditable to typography. This was owing to the intense cold weather, which made it impossible to obtain warm enough to work the ink, although two stoves were kept up to nearly welding heat. The thermometer 20 degrees below 0 troubles printing offices astonishingly.

THE LEGISLATURE, of the state assembled on Tuesday last, and was organized by the choice of Geo. W. Patterson, of Livingston, as Speaker. Philander Prindle was chosen Clerk, Minos M'Gowen, Sergeant at arms, and Samuel Francis and Abraham Grovstein Doorkeepers. Our limits will not permit us to give more than a bird's eye view of some of the heads, which the Governor treats on. The Message occupies nearly eleven columns of small type, a large proportion of which is devoted to the currency and internal improvements.

The revenues of the State have increased during the fiscal year. The auction duties of the present year, have exceeded those of the last, $83,000. The duties on salt also exceed those of last year, by $80,000. The amount of tolls on the various canals during the past year is $1,656,902, being an excess of the previous year, of $165,592.

The productive capital of the Common School Fund, at the close of the last fiscal year, was $1,932,421.99, to which has since been added the sum of $45,646.64, making an aggregate of $1,978,069.63.—The revenue during the year, including $165,000 appropriated from the income of the United States Deposit Fund to the support of common schools, was $282,472.26. The amount paid out of the Treasury was $275,000.04.

The capital of the Literature Fund's $268,164.38. The revenue during the year, including $28,000 appropriated from the income of the United States Deposit Fund, was $48,109.07. The amount paid from this revenue was $47,978.46.

The bank Fund has a capital $818,820.59. Its revenue during the year was $36,638.20. There has been paid during the same period, to contributing banks, on account of dividends, $29,618.51.

Two hundred and nine convicts were received, within the year, into the state prison at Mount Pleasant.—The whole number of convicts in that prison is eight hundred and five. The amount received for labor during the past year, including the value of marble furnished for the construction of State Hall, was $73,203 34. The expenditures, including moneys paid for the completion of the prison for female convicts and the expense of transportation of convicts, were $73,440 81.

The number of convicts in the state prison at Auburn is six hundred and sixty-five. The number received during the year was two hundred and twenty-eight. The earnings of the prison, during the year, were $60,161 46, and the expenditures $51,671 21.

The Institution for the instruction of the Blind continues to discharge its responsibilities with good success. It has sixty-six pupils, of whom fifty-nine are State pupils, and there are sixty-nine vacancies to be filled from the different counties, in pursuance of the law passed at the last session. The Institution for the Deaf and Dumb administers its inestimable benefits to one hundred and seventy pupils, maintains its high reputation, and enjoys the unmeasured confidence and kindness among whom it is located. One hundred and twenty of these pupils, being the full number allowed by law, are supported at the expense of the State.

Our Scientific institutions continue to maintain their high reputation. Twenty-five students graduated at Columbia College, during the past year. This institution numbers 138 members. The number of graduates, at the city of New York is 28,—under graduates, 80. Union College has now 278 members.—Hamilton College, has 92 students, and Geneva College 63. The law providing for the establishment of libraries in school districts, has been carried into successful operation. The governor recommends that the children of foreigners should have the same advantages of education as is given to other children and that teachers should be employed to teach them in their own language.

The whole number of the militia of the state is 190,103, of which 7,427 are cavalry and horse-artillery, 9,256 are artillery. 160,420, are infantry, including light infantry and riflemen, and 3000 are cavalry and artillery attached to brigades of infantry.

The Message enters into a somewhat detail of the Manor difficulties, and concludes by recommending that some measures may be adopted, which without the violation of contracts, or injustice to either party, will assimilate the tenures in question to those which experience has proved to be more accordant with the principles of republican government, and more conducive to the general prosperity and peace of society.

The general policy of prohibiting the transportation of freight on rail roads which run parallel to the canals, is not altogether without question. There can however be one sentiment as to the expediency of suspending the prohibition during the season in which the navigation of the canals operates injuriously to the agricultural interests, and tends to produce a monopoly of the necessities of life, at a time when want and misfortune are felt most severely by the inhabitants of our populous cities.

DISTRESSING CASUALTY.—Four gentlemen of Cincinnati, Mr. P. Brooks, Hiram Barber, David Cline, and Samuel Fox, were returning from hunting on the Kentucky side of the river, on the evening of the 25th ult., in a skiff. A cake of ice came with such force against it, as to cause an upset, and all the persons were drowned with the exception of Mr. S. Fox, who was rescued from the water much exhausted, and was alive the following morning.—[N. Y. Sun.

A WHOLE FAMILY POISONED.—The Philadelphia papers of Saturday evening, bring us the melancholy intelligence of the family of Mr. Gigot, 148 Pine-street, having been poisoned by Indian meal pudding—whether accidentally or otherwise, has not yet transpired. Mr. Gigot, and a Swiss servant girl, have since died, and six others are in a critical condition.—[idem.

ASSASSINATION.—Charles W. Salter, of Philadelphia, a promising man of 20, was assassinated at Key West, on the 28th Nov. He was on the eve of returning home after an absence of many months, when he was inhumanly stabbed in the back and abdomen, by a wretch of the name of Edwards, which terminated his earthly existence.—[idem.

A NOBLE ACTION.—Whilst some boys were playing at the foot of Oliver street, on Saturday last, one of them accidentally fell overboard, and would have drowned had it not been for Capt. Walter Smith, of schooner Repeater, who immediately leaped overboard and rescued the boy.—idem

WOMEN BURNED TO DEATH.—Mrs. Hannah Langdon, daughter of Rev. Joseph L. of Portsmouth, N. H., was burnt to death by her clothes taking fire at the grate on Sunday week. A widow named Crockett, aged 70, left a candle burning by her bed curtains, and in the morning her corpse was found among the ashes nearly consumed.

THE GREAT SNOW STORM.—At Canandaigua the fall of snow was to the depth of two feet on an average. A stage was 36 hours from Rochester to Canandaigua.

At Buffalo the storm was still more severe. The B. Com. Adv. of Monday says:

The Late storm has been severe almost beyond precedent. It commenced snowing Friday night, and continued, with slight intermission, till yesterday afternoon. From every quarter we hear that the roads are so filled up as to be nearly impassible. No eastern or western mail has arrived since Saturday morning, and there is no telling when we shall get one. The average depth of the snow is probably 30 inches; it is very solid, and in many places much drifted. Several days must elapse before the travelling will become tolerable."

We copied from the Norfolk Beacon, on Saturday, a brief paragraph announcing the decease of Susan De-az, widow of the late gallant Commodore. It gives us sincere pleasure to state that the annunciation was incorrect. Although very ill, Mrs. D. still lives, and we are happy to learn, is thought somewhat better than she was a week ago.—[National Intelligencer.

A powder mill belonging to the American Powder Company, at Sudbury, Mass., was blown up on Sunday morning last, and Mr. Joseph Lamson killed.

At a meeting of twenty individuals at the Tract House in N. Y. on Monday evening, seventeen hundred and fifty-five dollars were subscribed to aid the American Tract Society, especially in completing the $40,000 designed for foreign distribution.

The store of Tiffany & Young in Broadway, was entered by some unprincipled rascals on New Year's night, and robbed of fancy goods to the amount of between $1,500 and 2,000.

ITEMS OF FOREIGN NEWS.

An arrangement has been concluded between Messrs. Rothschild and M. Jaudon of the U. States Bank, by which the former have contracted to advance £1,000,000 sterling upon the deposit of state stocks, to the same amount of issues and debentures, bearing interest at the rate of 6 per cent, per annum; the price of these debentures has been fixed at 94, with 2 per cent, commission; and they are redeemable at par in two years.

The most important intelligence is from Algiers.—The French have suffered some severe defeats from Abd el-Kader, which have been glossed over by the French reports.

The Tories are in a high rage because the queen has not stated whether Prince Albert be Protestant or not. This furnishes good long arguments as to whether Victoria, marrying a Papist, and turning Papist, could or could not be ejected from the throne.

A lunatic, John Stockbridge, got over the gates of Windsor castle, and demanded admittance to the building as the King of England. He was taken into custody. He said, "he was looking after a wife, being King of England, and impelled by the spirit."

The count de Survilliers (Joseph Bonaparte) has taken a mansion in Cavendish Square for the winter.—He intends to reside in England twelve months.

Sir John Colborne's promotion to the peerage is notified in the Gazette by the name, style, and title, of Baron Seaton of Seaton, in the County of Devon.

Lord Palmerston has written to the East India and China Trade Association, declining to give the intentions of government in regard to affairs with China, and stating that "the merchants must take such steps as they may think proper to secure their interests."

A son of O'Connell has been performing at the Colchester theatre.

A method of printing stuffs with madder has been found in Vienna. France offers 30,000 francs for the discovery.

The famous American trotting horse Rattler has beaten the Glasgow mare over the Aintree course. On a subsequent match he ran 11 miles to the mare 10 for $350.

Abd el-Kader by latest accounts was within five leagues of Algiers with 10,000 men. He is supported by the Sultan of Morocco.

Abd-el-Kader's movements seem to have been rapid, and his invasion of the Eastern portion of the French possessions had filled the country with terror. Algiers, at the last advices, was filled to repletion with colonists from the plain of Metidja, who had fled from the Arabs for their lives, leaving houses, flocks, lands, and every thing they possessed.

LIGHT! LIGHT! LIGHT!!! REMEDY FOR THE LAMES. G. W. Knowlton & Co., Manufacturers of Camphine Oil, Lamps, Spirit Gas Lamps, Oil Lamps, &c. Feel grateful for favors hitherto received. Respectfully acquaint their friends and the public that they have a good assortment of lamps of all kinds, from one dollar upwards to suit the emergency of the times. They therefore respectfully invite those who are desirous of studying economy in lighting their stores, houses, &c., by the most brilliant and cheap light, to call and examine their new substantial, and well manufactured lamps, which have given universal satisfaction to the many thousands who now use them. Remember that by adopting these lamps, you have a better light, and save on an average 50 per cent. They would also say to the public, that they can always depend upon a first rate article of Camphine Oil, and Spirit Gas, as they manufacture it themselves.

THE TEACHING OF THE DEAD.

"I feel that the dead have conferred a blessing on me, by helping me to think rightly of the world."

REV. ORVILLE DEWEY.

Call'st thou the dead, teachers?

Must we come,
And sit among the clods, and lay our ear
To damp crannies of the loathsome tomb;
And listen for their lore? There breathes no sound
From all those stern and stone-bound sepulchres,
Save that through rustling grass, the low winds sweep,
And stir the branches of yon dark-browed pines.
In sullen undulation.

Yet, thou say'st,

The dead are teachers.

Would they stretch their hands,
And on our tablets write one pencil-trace,
How would we hoard it in our heart of hearts!
All motionless! All passionless! All mute!

Oh, Silence, twin with Wisdom! I would press
My lip upon yon cradled infant's grave,
And drink the murmur of its smitten bloom.
A mother's young pride in her beautiful,
Laid low! Laid low! How slight the aspen-stem Round which her heart's joys twined! Ours too are frail,

Like hers. The flowret in the reaper's path
Hath as good hope to greet the golden morn.

Read I thy lesson right, my little one?

Lo, by thy side the strong man sleepeth well,
The tall, proud man, who towered like Israel's king,
With head above the people. Yet, his wail,
Was it not weak, as thine, when Death launched home
The fatal arrow? 'Dust to dust!' should be
The mournful watch-word of the born of earth,
And the deep teaching of such lonely creed
Best cometh from the dead.

Ah, let me kneel

Here, on this mound, where sleeps my early friend,
And wait her words, in lowliness of soul.
Speakest thou not to me?—thou, whose loving voice
Gav'st the sweet key-tone to our fond discourses,
When lost in lonely haunts, we wandered long.
Shunning the crowd?

Dear as thou wert to me,

In that cementing time, when school-day sports
Make lasting sisterhood, even now, it seems
I loved thee not enough. Say, was it so,
My lost companion? Were there tender words
I might have said to thee, yet said them not?
Where there not higher flights of gloriously thought,
And nobler trophies on life's rugged steep,
To which I might have urged thee?

Blind! and weak!

I thought to have thee ever by my side;
And so the hours swept by, till thou didst spread
A hidden wing, and prove thine angel-birth.
Oh, teach me, with a firmer grasp, to seize
The passing day, nor with omitted deeds,
Nor the defrauded sympathies of love,
Load the uncertain future. So thy tomb
Shall be my blest instructor, and I'll go
Sadder, yet wiser, to my work again.
Amid the changeful ministries of life.

L. H. S.

WINTER.

BY MRS. SIGOURNEY.

"I deem thee not unlovely—though thou com'st
With a stern visage. To the tuneless bird—
The tender flow'et—the rejoicing stream,
Thy discipline is harsh. But unto man
Methinks thou hast a kindlier ministry—
The lengthened eve is full of fire-sides joys,
And deathless linking of warm heart to heart;
So that the hoarse stream passes by unheard.
Earth rob'd in white, a peaceful Sabbath holds,
And keepeth silence at the Maker's feet.
She ceaseth from the harrowing of the plough,

And from the harvest shouting.

"Man should rest

Thus from his fevered passions—and exhale
The unbreathed carbon of his festering thought
And drink in holy health. As the tossed bark
Doth seek the shelter of some quiet bay
To trim its shattered cordage and repair
Its riven sails—so should the toil-worm mind
Refit for time's rough voyage. Man, perchance, Soured by the world's sharp commerce, or im-
pair'd

By the wild wanderings of his summer way,
Turns like a truant scholar toward his home,
And yields his nature to sweet influences
That purify and save.

The rudy boy.

Comes with his shouting school-mates from their sport

On the smooth frozen lake, as the first star
Hangs pure, and cold, its silver crescent forth;
And throwing off his skates, with boisterous glee
Hastes to his mother's side. Her tender hand
Doth shake the snow-flakes from his glossy curls,
And draws him nearer, and, with gentle voice,
Asks of his lessons—while her lifted heart
Solicits silently the Sire of Heaven
To bless the lad.

"The timid infant learns

Better to love its father—longer sits
Upon his knee, and with velvet lip
Prints on his brow such language as the tongue
Hath never spoken.

"Come thou to life's feast,

With dove-eyed meekness and bland charity—
And thou shalt find even winter's rugged blast
The minstrel-teacher of the well-tuned soul;
And when the last drop of its cup is drained,
Arising with a song of praise, go up
To the eternal banquet."

THE ANGEL'S WING

There is a German tradition that when a sudden silence takes place in a company, an angel at the moment makes a circuit among them and the first person who breaks the silence is supposed to have been touched by the wing of the passing seraph.

And why should wisdom smile at this?

Are not those perfect beings nigh

To witness and to share our bliss,

To hear and hush the secret sigh?

Yes, they may Heaven's solace bring.

Then scorn not thou, the Angel's Wing!

Thou' who alone, thyself dost deem,

A solitary in thy grief—

List! soft as footfall of a dream,

Come one to bear the sweet relief;

And fled is all thy hoarded care.

The passing Seraph's Wing is there!

Thou, who, forgiven, dost possess

The penitent's intense delight,

When the dark cloud of guilt's distress

Reveals to thee its edge of light—

Think! as unhallowed tempests fly,

Thy soul is touched, the Wing is nigh!

And thou, of contemplative mood

Who dost at eve in wild woods stray,

Where nought of this world may intrude

Where fancy might in others play,

And hearest the voice which zephyr flings—

No! 'tis the rush of Angel Wings.

Oh, I have paused a space as'twere,

Bewildering thoughts to gather up—

To put aside the draught of care

And taste of mind's exalted cup:

Nor knew what o'er my soul could bring,

Such calmness was the Seraph's Wing.

When brooding tempters caused me shame,

And in its company of sin

My spirit sat—the Angel came,

And swept with wings the heart within

A moment made its circuit there
And broke my silence into prayer.

I knelt beside my precious boy,
Who went at childhood's fairy time,
My hope, my life, my being's joy—
From this to Love's unclouded clime;
And while around wept pitying men,
I joyed—the Angel touched me then!

And oh when at my own last hour
The world recedes and follies fly,
That near me with supporting powers
Might plume some herald of the sky—
And while of victory I sing,
Bear me away on upward Wing! TAPPAN.

RETROSPECTION.

From the Knickerbocker.

Oh! Memory turns to vanished days,
Despite of present pain,
And in their sunshine fancy plays,
Till they seem ours again;
With all their unalloyed content,
With friends sincerely prized,
With joyous heart and innocent,
And hopes unrealized,
Before we jostled with the crowd
That ne'er for others feel,
When every thought we spoke aloud,
Uncareful to conceal.
For then, unlearned in worldly art,
Too credulous, we deemed
That every one was in the heart
As honest as he seemed.
But Time hath in his ceaseless tread
Unhappy changes wrought,
And we have lived to doubt and dread,
By disappointments taught.

We once had friends, but now must weep
They are no longer ours;
They sleep, where we at last shall sleep,
Among the perished flowers,
The gentle and the beautiful,
The manly and the brave,
Are mouldering now within the dull,
Inexorable grave!
A chill hath o'er our feelings come,
And o'er our hearts a blight;
Unblessed and cheerless is the home
That once was our delight;
For they are gone, the cherished pride
And pleasure of our days;
How happy were we by their side,
To listen and to praise!
And sorrow oft, with poignant sting,
A tribute tear will claim,
As we behold each treasured thing
Familiar with their name.

When twilight, herald of repose,
Attends the sun to rest,
A sable robe she gently throws
O'er the empurpled west.
We dedicate that solemn hour
To those love could not save,
And yielding to affliction's power,
We visit oft their grave.
The sod hath felt our deep distress,
The zephyr borne our sigh,
That all their worth and loveliness
Is but a memory!

THE HISTORY OF FREEMASONRY,

DRAWN FROM AUTHENTIC SOURCES OF INFORMATION.

No. IX.

That Freemasonry was introduced into Scotland by those architects who built the abby of Kilwinning is manifest, not only from those authentic documents, by which the existence of the Kilwinning lodge has been traced back as far as the end of the fifteenth century, but by other collateral arguments, which amount almost to a demonstration. In every country where the temporal and spiritual jurisdiction of the Pope was acknowledged, there was a continual demand, particularly during the twelfth century, for operative masons, proportional to the piety of the inhabitants, and the opulence of their ecclesiastical establishments: and there was no kingdom in Europe where the zeal of the inhabitants for popery was more ardent, where kings and nobles were more liberal to the clergy, and where, of consequence, the church was more richly endowed, than in Scotland (a). The demand, therefore, for elegant cathedrals and ingenious artists, must have been proportionably greater than in other countries, and that demand could be supplied only from the trading association on the continent. When we consider, in addition to these facts, that this association monopolized the building of religious structures in Christendom; we are authorised to conclude, that those numerous and elegant ruins which still adorn the villages of Scotland, were erected by foreign masons, who introduced into this island the custom of their order (b).

It was probably about this time, also, that Freemasonry was introduced into England; but, whether the English received it from the Scotch masons at Kilwinning, or from other brethren who had arrived from the continent, there is no method of determining. The Fraternity in England, however, maintain, that St. Alban, the Proto-Martyr, was the first who brought masonry to Britain (c); that the brethren received a charter from King Athelstane, and that his brother Edwin summoned all the lodges to meet at York, which formed the first Grand Lodge of England (d). But these are merely assertions, not only incapable of proof from authentic history, but inconsistent, also, with several historical events which rest upon indubitable evidence (e). In support of these, opinions, indeed, it is alleged, that no other lodge has laid claim to greater antiquity than that of York, and that its jurisdiction over the other lodges in England has been invariably acknowledged by the whole fraternity. But this argument only proves that York was the birth place of Freemasonry in England. It brings no additional evidence in support of the improbable stories about St. Alban, Athelstane, and Edwin. If the antiquity of Freemasonry in Britain can be defended only by the forgery of silly and uninteresting stories, it does not deserve to be defended at all. Those who invent and propagate such tales, do not, surely, consider that they bring discredit upon their order by the want of their zeal; and that, by supporting what is false, they debar thinking men from believing what is true.

After the establishment of the Kilwinning and York lodges, the principles of Freemasonry were rapidly diffused throughout both kingdoms, and several lodges were erected in different parts of the island. As all these derived their authority and existence from the two mother lodges, they were likewise under their jurisdiction and control; and when any differences arose, which were connected with the art of building they were referred to the general meetings of the fraternity, which were always held at Kilwinning or York. In this manner did Freemasonry flourish for a while in Britain, when it was completely abolished in every part of the world. But even here it was doomed to suffer a long and serious decline, and to experience those alternate seasons of advancement and decay, which mark the history of every human institution. And though during several centuries after the importation of Freemasonry into Britain, the brethren of the order held their public assemblies, and were sometimes prohibited from meeting by the interference of the legislature, it can scarcely be said that it attracted general attention till the beginning of the seventeenth century. The causes of this remarkable retardation which the progress of masonry experienced, is by no means difficult to discover. In consequence of the important privileges which the order received from the church of Rome, many chose the profession of an architect, which, though at all times, an honourable employment, was particularly in the highest request during the middle ages. On this account, the body of operative masons increased to such a degree, and the rage, as well as the necessity of religious edifices, was so much diminished that a more than sufficient number of hands could, at any time, be procured for supplying the demands of the church, and of pious individuals. And, as there was now no scarcity of architect, the very reason which prompted the church to protect the fraternity, no longer existed; they, therefore, withdrew from them that patronage, and these favours which they had spontaneously proffered, and denied them even the liberty of holding their secret assemblies,—the unalienable privilege of every free-born community. But these were not the only cause which produced such a striking change in the conduct of the church to the masonic order. We have already mentioned, that the spirit of Freemasonry was hostile to the principles of the church of Rome. The intention of the one was to enlighten the mind; the object and policy of the other to retain it in ignorance. When Freemasonry flourished, the power of the church must have decayed. The jealousy of the latter, therefore was aroused; and as the civil power in England and Scotland, was almost always in the hands of ecclesiastics, the church and the state were both combined against the principles and practice of Freemasonry. (f) Along with these causes, the domestic and bloody wars which convulsed the two kingdoms from the thirteenth to be to the seventeenth century, conspired in a great degree to produce that decline in the fraternity for which we have been attempting to account.

But notwithstanding these unfavourable circumstances, Freemasonry seems to have flourished, and attracted the attention of the public in the reign of Henry VI. who when a minor, ascended the throne of England in 1422. In the third year of his reign, indeed the parliament passed a severe act against the fraternity, at the instigation of Henry Beaufort, Bishop of Winchester, who was then entrusted with the education of the young king. They enacted that the masons should no longer hold their chapters and annual assemblies; that those who summoned such chapters and assemblies should be considered as felons and that those who resorted to them should be fined and imprisoned (g). But it would appear that this act was never put in execution; for, in the year 1429, about five years after it was framed a respectable lodge was held at Canterbury, under the patronage of the Arch Bishop himself (h). When King Henry was able to take into his own hands the government of his kingdom, and to form an opinion of his own respecting the use and tendency of the masonic fraternity, in order to atone for the rigorous conduct of his parliament, he not only permitted the order to hold their meetings without molestation, but honored the lodge by his presence as a brother. Before he was initiated, however, into the mysteries of the order, he seems to have examined with scrupulous care the nature of the institution, and to have perused the charges and regulations of the fraternity, as collected from their ancient records. These facts are contained in a record written in the reign of his successor, Edward IV. and confirmed by a manuscript in King Henry's own hand writing, which is familiar to every person who has studied the history of our order (i). This manuscript consists of questions and answer concerning the nature and tendency of Freemasonry and seems to be the result of the king's examination of some of the brethren before he became a member of the fraternity. It was procured from the Bodleian library by the celebrated Mr. Locke, which was transmitted to the Earl of

(f) As a proof of the hostility of the church of Rome to secret associations which pretended to enlighten the mind, was mentioned (p. 53. supra) its treatment of the Academy of Secrets instituted in the sixteenth century for the advancement of Physical Sciences. When a local and temporary institution drew down the vengeance of the Roman See, what must have been the conduct to a lodge of masons? A farther account of the Academy of Secrets may be found in Priestly's History of Vision vol. 2.

(j) We have hitherto been careful to bring forward no facts upon the sole evidence of the records, or the opinions of Freemasons; such evidence, indeed, can never satisfy the minds of the uninitiated public. But when these records contain facts, the fabrication of which could be of no service to be fraternally, they may, in this case, be entitled to credit; or, when facts which do reflect honor upon their order, are confirmed by evidence from another quarter, the authority of the record entitles them to a still greater degree of credit. With respect to the facts mentioned in the text, we have not merely the authority of the record and manuscript alluded to, but we have proof that there was no collusion in the case; for the record is mentioned in the book of constitutions by Dr. Anderson, who had neither seen nor heard of the manuscript.

(b) It is a curious fact, that one of these towns where there is an elegant abby, which was built in the twelfth century the author of this work has often heard that it was erected by a company of industrious men who spoke in a foreign language, and lived separately from the town's people. And stories are still told about their petty quarrels with the inhabitants.

Pembroke, with several explanatory notes(j). In the title of the manuscript, it is said to have been faithfully copied from the hand writing of King Henry VI. by John Leland, antiquarian, who, according to Mr. Locke, was the celebrated antiquary of that name who lived in the sixteenth century, and was appointed by King Henry VII. at the dissolution of monasteries, to search for, and save such books as were worthy of preservation. As this manuscript was originally printed at Frankfort, I was led to inquire what grounds there were for believing that the explanatory notes, and the letter to the Earl of Pembroke which accompany it were the production of Mr. Locke. But I found that this had uniformly been taken for granted by every writer on the subject, though the circumstance is not mentioned in the folio edition of Mr. Locke's works. The style of the letter however, and the acuteness of the annotations, resemble so much that philosopher's manner of writing, and the letter is so descriptive of Mr. Locke's real situation at the time when it was written, that it is impossible to deny their authenticity. In the letter itself, which is dated 6th May 1696, Mr. Locke remarks that he composed the notes for the sake of Lady Masham, who was become very fond of masonry, and that the manuscript had so much excited his own curiosity, that he was determined to enter into the fraternity the next time he went to London, which, he adds, will be very soon. Now Mr. Locke was at this time residing at Oates, the country seat of Sir Francis Masham, as appears by one of his letters to Mr. Molyneux, which is dated Oates, March 30th, 1696; and it appears, that he actually went to London a short time after the 6th of May; for another letter to the same gentleman is dated, London 2d July, 1696(k). Notwithstanding these facts, Dr. Plot maintains that Freemasonry was not patronized by King Henry VI.(l) and that those who have supported a different opinion, were ignorant of the laws and chronicles of their own country. Dr. Plot may have been a good chemist and natural historian, but when our readers hear upon what foundation he has established his opinion, they will agree with us in thinking that he was a bad logician. He observes, that an act was passed in the king's minority, prohibiting all general assemblies and chapters of Freemasons, and that as this act was not repealed till 1562, by 5th Elizabeth, chap. 4, it was impossible that Freemasonry could be patronized in the same reign in which it was prohibited. The fact is, that the act was not repealed by 5th Elizabeth, chap. 4, which does not contain a single word about Freemasons. If Dr. Plot's argument, therefore, proves any thing, it would prove that Freemasonry has not been patronized since the reign of Henry VI. for that act has never yet been repealed. But supposing that it was repealed, the prohibitory statute in Henry's reign might never have been in execution, as is very often; and Dr. Plot himself remarks, that the act 5th Elizabeth was not observed. It is plain, therefore, that instead of being impossible, it is highly probable that King Henry patronized the fraternity. When they were persecuted by his parliament, he was only three years of age, and could neither approve nor disapprove of its sentence; and it was very natural, when he came to the years of maturity, that he should undo a deed which his parliament had dishonourably done.

CEREMONY.

It is remarked by some writer that excess of ceremony shows want of good breeding. This is true. There is nothing so tiresome as an overdone politeness; it is worse than an overdone beef steak. A truly well bred man makes every person round him feel at ease; he does not throw civilities about him with a shovel, nor toss compliments in a bundle, as he would fly with a pitchfork. There is no evil under the sun more intolerable than ultra politeness.

CHARACTER.

OLIVER CROMWELL.

The figure of Oliver Cromwell was, as is generally known, in no way prepossessing. He was of middle stature, strong and coarsely made, with harsh and severe features, indicative, however, of much natural sagacity and depth of thought. His eyes were gray and piercing, his nose large in proportion to his other features.

His manner of speaking, when he had the purpose to make himself distinctly understood, was energetic and forcible, though neither graceful nor eloquent. No man could on such occasion put his meaning in a fewer and more decisive words. But when, as it often happened, he had a mind to play the orator, for the benefit of the people's ears, with out enlightening their understanding, Cromwell was wont to veil his meaning, or that which seemed to be his meaning, in such a mist of words, surrounding it with so many exclusions and exceptions, and fortifying it with such a labyrinth of parenthyses, that though one of the most shrewd in England, he was perhaps one of the most unintelligible speakers that ever perplexed an audience. It has often been said by the historian, that a collection of the Protector's speeches would make, with a few exceptions, the most non-sensical book in the world; but he ought to have added, that nothing could be more nervous, concise, and intelligible, than what he really intended should be understood.

It was also remarked of Cromwell, that though born of a good family, both by father and mother, and although he had the usual opportunities of education and breeding, connected with such an advantage, the fanatic democratic ruler could never acquire, or else disdained to practice the courtesies usually exercised among the higher classes, in their intercourse with each other. His demeanour was blunt, and sometimes might be termed clownish, yet there was in his language and manner, a force and energy corresponding to his character, which impressed awe, if not impose a respect; and there was even times when that dark and subtle spirit expanded itself, so as almost to conciliate affection. The turn for humour, which displayed itself by fits, was broad, and of a low character. Something, there was in his disposition congenial to that of his countrymen; a contempt of folly, a hatred of affectation, and a dislike of ceremony, which joined to the strong intrinsic qualities of sense and courage; made him in many respects not an unfit representative for the Democracy of England.

His religion must always be a subject of much doubt, and probably of doubt which he himself could hardly have cleared up. Unquestionably there was a time in his life when he was sincerely enthusiastic, and when his natural temper, slightly subject to hypochondria, was strongly agitated by the same fanaticism, which influenced so many persons of the time.

On the other hand, there were periods during his political career, when we certainly do him justice in charging him with hypocritical affectations. We shall probably judge him and others of the of his same age, most truly, if we suppose that their religious professions were partly in flight from their own breast, partly assumed in compliance with their own interest. And so ingenious is the human heart in deceiving itself as well as others, that it is probable neither Cromwell himself, nor those making similar pretensions to distinguished piety, could exactly have fixed the point not at which their enthusiasm terminated; and their hypocrisy commenced; or rather, it was a point not fixed in itself, but fluctuating with the state of health, of good and bad fortune, of high or low spirits, affecting the individual at the period.

MISCELLANY.

SCENE IN A POLICE OFFICE.

A CHILD, of ten years old, of a mild and interesting countenance, was placed at the bar. His meagre limbs were covered by the ample coat of an unbleached linen, the usual uniform of the young prisoners. The crimes of which he was accused, were mendicancy and vagabondage.

President. You had no regular occupation it seems, and so you went a-begging?

Child. I have an occupation, but I don't like it, and would rather do something else.

President. What is your occupation then?

Child. I was a musician. I played the organ in the streets. It's tiresome to be all day long twisting a handle, and hearing the same tunes. And then, instead of amusing people, it only vexes them, and one gets nothing. I'd rather be a carpenter, or any thing else.

President. Very well, have you asked your parents to put you apprentice to a trade?

Child. I've asked my mother twenty times to do so, but she won't. She says to me, "Go and play the organ; it's much easier to learn." But I don't like the music, so I left my mother to try and get some work; but people said I was too little; so I begged for a half-penny to buy myself some bread, and lay down to sleep under the gateway.

A dry masculine woman here made her appearance. She was arrayed in a voluminous cap, plentifully adorned with yellow ribbons. She advanced towards the bar, darting a threatening look at the little malefactor, who assumed a sulkily men, and began to roll his red cap between his hands. This was Madame Papelon, the mother of the boy, and she immediately began in a sonorous and shrill voice:—"Look at the little vagabond, who dares to rebel against the author of his life, and pretends to teach me what is best for him! Where's the respect which every honest son owes in France to his virtuous and legitimate parents?"

President. Why do you refuse to give your son a trade?

Woman. I have given him something better; I have taught him one of the arts, the art of his father and of his mother—a noble and glorious art—the art of music. But the little wretch refuses to take to it, and would rather be a mechanic, it seems, than an artist. Little fool!

Child. A pretty artist, to twist an organ from morning till night! Oh, tis so tiresome. If it was only a spit I might learn to be a cook one day, and get a place as kitchen-boy, when I was a bit bigger.

Woman. (with a look of the most profound contempt). If it isn't enough to make heaven and earth blush to hear such sentiments.

President. These are honourable sentiments, and it is you who ought to blush.

Woman. (in utter astonishment). If? What is that you say? I!

President. Yes, you. The child, young as he is, feels the want of learning something that may enable him to get a livelihood, and you oppose so excellent an impulse, wishing him to continue a wretched paria, which can only lead him to become a beggar and a vagabond.

Woman. Well, to be sure! As if one hadn't a licence from the police to sing in the streets. The king himself can't prevent one from singing, nor from making one's son sing if one likes. M. Papelon chooses his offering to be a musician, and I choose it too. There's no law, there's no law, I say, to prevent it.

President. Your child has been arrested as a vagabond, he is a minor, and the law authorises the tribunal to—

Woman. The child is no minor as long as his father lives. I know the law as well as you, and insist on having my boy.

President. He shall be given up to you if you promise to put him apprentice to a trade.

Woman. Oh, that Papelon was here! He would know how to obtain justice. How unfortunate that he would just happen to be on his circuit through the provinces!

President. Will you engage to do what justice requires of you?

Woman. The most I can do is to buy a monkey for him. Will that satisfy you?

Child. No, I don't want a monkey, I want to learn to read and write.

Woman. What need have you of learning to read, you little ragamuffin, as long as I can teach you your sonnet?

Child. Well but I won't sing.

President. The court acquits your chief, and by virtue of the power which the law gives us, we shall order that he be educated till the age of sixteen, in the prison school.

Child. (in a tone of reproach to his mother). There I'm glad of that; now I shall learn something.

Madame Papelon was most vociferous in her excla-inations against the wise decision of the magistrate, till one of the municipal guards took her by the arm and led her out of the office. "Yes, I'm going," she exclaimed, half choked with rage, but I shall go this instant to my poet, and order him to draw up an appeal against this revolting sentence."

HOME.

The editor of the New York Star, thus feelingly discourses of, and beautifully illustrates domestic happiness.

He who 'tempers the wind to the shorn lamb,' who causes the dew to descend, and the earth to bring forth its fruits, will provide for each created being. The place on earth left vacant by death is supplied by the birth of the living. Let Man be only industrious and frugal, trust to Providence for bread, and his children will not want. How many married Men have been saved from ruin—from being plunged into bad habits, wanton extravagance, and debased pleasure by the sacred ties which is in wife and children! How many unhappy dissensions have been reconciled between Man and wife, through the powerful influence of attachment to their offspring! How many crimes have been prevented by parents, from apprehension of entailing their infamy on their children! When we see married persons unhappy, avoiding each other, and indulging in perpetual jars, how frequently do we trace the cause to their having no children! What can be more gratifying to the just pride of parents, than seeing the tender flower, "their ~~best~~ ^{best} ~~corolla~~ ^{corolla} grew," unfolding its beauties, and throwing around them its rich perfumes; or in rearing the tender plant, until it becomes a noble tree: watered by care and watchful attention? When in sickness, who smooths your pillow—whose hand presses more affectionately over your fevered brow than your child's? And when on the confines of eternity, whom do we enfold in our parting embrace and parting benediction more affectionately than our children? What can be more desolate than age sinking into the grave unmourned, solitary, and childless! How earnestly did our mothers in Israel pray to the Lord to take from them the curse of barrenness!

I was never more forcibly struck with the beautiful results of a well governed marriage, than on a recent occasion in my own family. Among the anniversaries of joyful events and Providential blessings, to be gratefully remembered and celebrated, first in importance is my wedding day—the day which, of all others, changes our relations in life. My little ones always kept count of the arrival of that day as their jubilee; and in their holiday attire, with smiling, jocund face, they came from school to offer their congratulations, and celebrate the anniversary. One spoke a new piece; and another had a new song; a third, some offering of a flower or some compliment; and when the whole six, with rosy cheeks and sparkling eyes surrounded the dinner table, and the boys grove with their glass of foaming champagne (an indulgence granted but once a year) to drink to the long life and continued happiness of the father and mother, and when looking on the company which surrounded them, their hale and hearty appearance, the well spread board, and the family party around it, who could resist from returning thanks to the Giver of All Good, for his bountiful and manifold blessings, in having reflected these images around us, in health, in happiness, and in comfort; and who afforded the means giving them instruction, and "daily bread!"

ABSURDITIES.

To attempt to borrow money on the plea of extreme poverty. To lose money at play, and then fly into a passion about it. To ask the publisher of a new periodical how many copies he sells per week. To ask a wine merchant how old his wine is. To make yourself generally disagreeable, and wonder that nobody will visit you, unless they gain some palpable advantage by it. To get drunk, and complain the next morning of a headache. To spend your earning on liquor, and wonder that you won't have a fire till November. To suppose that reviewers generally read more than the title-page of the works they praise or condemn. To judge of people's piety by their attendance at church. To keep your clerks on miserable salaries, and wonder at their robbing you. Not to go to bed when you are tired and sleepy, because "it is not bed time." To make your servants tell lies for you, and afterwards be angry because they tell lies for themselves. To tell your own secrets, and believe other people will keep them. To render a man service voluntarily, and expect him to be grateful for it. To expect to make people honest by hardening them in a jail, and afterwards sending them adrift without the means of getting work. To fancy a thing is cheap because a low price is asked for it. To say that a man is charitable because he subscribes to an hospital. To keep a dog or a cat on short allowance, and complain of its being a thief. To degrade human nature in the hope of improving it. To praise the beauty of a woman's hair before you know whether it did not once belong to somebody else. To expect that your tradespeople will give you long credit if they generally see you in shabby clothes. To arrive at the age of fifty, and be surprised at any vice, folly, or absurdity, their fellow-creatures may be guilty of.

BROKER.

The origin of this word is contested; some derive it from the French broyer, "to grind"; others from broader, to civil or riggle; others deduce broker from a trade broken, and that from the Saxon broc, "misfortune," which is often the true reason of a man's breaking. In which view, a broker is a broken trader, by misfortune; and it is said that none but such were formerly admitted to that employment. The Jews, Armenians, and Banians are the chief brokers throughout most parts of the Levant and the Indies. In Persia, all affairs are transacted by a sort of brokers, whom they call "dela," i. e. "great takers." Their form of contract in buying and selling is remarkable, being done in the profoundest silence, only by touching each other's fingers:—The buyer, loosening his pamcrin, or grille spreads it on his knee; and he and the seller, having their hands underneath, by the intercourse of the fingers, mark the price of pounds, shillings, &c. demanded, offered, and at length agreed on. When the seller takes the buyer's whole hand, it denotes a thousand, and as many times he squeezes it, as many thousand pagols or roupies, according to the species in question demanded; when he only takes the five finger, it denotes five hundred; and when only one, one hundred; taking only half a finger, to the second joint denotes fifty; the small end of the finger, to the first joint, stands for ten.

A SAVING OF FIVEPENCE A-DAY.

At a late meeting in Birmingham of a Total Abstinence Society, the following statement was made by a working coach-painter, who was called on his turn to speak on the subject of temperance. "He had made a few calculations, which he wished to communicate, with the view of showing the pecuniary benefit he had derived during the four years he had been a total member. Previous to that time he had been in the practice of spending an average of an intoxicating drink fivepence per day, or £2, 2s. 1d. per annum, and which in four years would amount to £30, 8s. 4d. He would now show how this sum had been expended during the four years he had abstained from all intoxicating drinks. First, it had enabled him to allow an aged father £3.5s. per annum towards his rent, or in the four years, £13. Secondly, he had entered a benefit society, and paid one shilling and sevenpence per week or £4, 2s. 4d. per annum, or £16, 9s. 4d. for the four years. For this payment he secured the following advantages, namely, in case of his being disabled from doing his accustomed work by illness or accident, the society will pay him eighteen shillings per week, until restored in health; in case of death, his widow or rightful heir is entitled to a bonus of $9, besides half the amount paid into the society by the deceased up to the time of his death, with the interest due thereon. Thirdly, it left him four shillings and ninepence per annum, or nineteen shillings for the four years, to be expended in temperance publications. I might further be added, that when the sum of 54, had been paid into the society's funds, no further payment would be required, that the contributor would be entitled to all benefits before enumerated; medicine attendance were included in the arrangement. His brother, a coach-smith, has pursued the same course, for the same length of time, contributing to his aged father, and providing against a day of need." Reader, how much may be done with fivepence a day.

MATHEW CAREY AND HIS WIFE.—It would be well, if young men starting in business, would take heed to the good advice conveyed by the example of Mr. Carey and his wife, as displayed in the biographical notice contained in the last number of the Merchant's Magazine and Commercial Review. It appears from this that Mr. Carey married a Miss Flaharan, the daughter of a highly respectable citizen of Philadelphia, who, like thousands of others, was ruined by his devotion to the cause of the principles of the Revolution.

She had no dowry but that of prudence, intelligence, and industry, and these are far richer than any other that can be bestowed. She had united herself to a man whose whole fortune consisted of a few hundred dollars worth of furniture, and some back numbers of his magazine, comparatively valueless as soon as the work was abandoned. But what of that? Both husband and wife had minds filled with good common sense. They had no false pride to retard their efforts. They were persevering and economical, and together they resolved to make their way in the world. "We early," says the husband, "formed a determination to indulge in no unnecessary expense and to mount the ladder so slowly, as to run no risk of having to descend. What a salutary example is here written in one sentence for the young of our day! How altered is the mode of beginning the marriage life now a days. Large debts, routes and rounds of fashion, are at once launched into, the young couple live on, so long as petty shifts, contrivances and expedients will sustain them, and then sink into homeless misery, from which perchance, they never recover.

A scholar of Dr. Bushy's coming into a parlor where the doctor had laid down a fine bunch of grapes for his own eating, takes it up and said aloud, "I publish the banns between these grapes and my mouth; if any one knows any just cause or impediment why these two should not be joined together, let them declare it." The doctor being in the next room, overheard all that was said; and coming into the school, he ordered the boy who had eaten the grapes to be taken up, or as it was called, horsed on another boy's back; but before he proceeded to the usual discipline, he cried out aloud, as the delinquent had done, "I publish the banns between my rod, and this boy's back; if any one knows any just cause or impediment why these two should not be joined, let them declare it." "I forbid the banns," cried the boy. "Why so?" said the doctor. "Because the parties are not agreed," replied the boy. Which answer so much pleased the doctor, who liked to find any readiness of wit in his scholars, that he ordered the boy to be set down.

A GONE 'COON. I'm a gone 'coon, implies 'I am distressed—or ruined—or lost.' I once asked the origin of this expression, and was very gravely told as follows:

"There is a Captain Martin Scott in the United States army who is a remarkable shot with a rifle. He was raised, I believe, in Vermont. His fame was so considerable through the State, that even the animals were aware of it. He went out one morning with his rifle and spying a raccoon upon the upper branches of a high tree, brought his gun to his shoulder, when the raccoon perceiving it, raised his paw for a parley, 'I beg your pardon, mister,' said the raccoon, very politely; but may I ask of you if your name is Scott?"

"Yes," replied the captain.
"Martin Scott" continued the raccoon.
"Yes," replied the captain.
"Captain Martin Scott?" still continued the animal.
"Yes replied the Captain, 'Captain Martin Scott.'
"Oh! then," says the animal, "I may just as well come down, for I'm a gone 'coon."

THE NAUGHTY PLACE.—A Scotch paster recognised one of his female parishoners sitting by the side of the road a little fuddled. "Will you just help me up with my bundle, gude mon?" said she as he stopped. "Fie, fie, Janet," cried the paster, "to see the like o' you in sic a blighty do!" you know where all drunkards go?" Ay, sure," said Janet, "they just go whar a dipp o' gude drink is to be got."

THE HERETIC.

'Twas the hour of twilight—in the bright clime of Italy. Who that has ever seen an Italian sky at sunset,—can describe it? The bright assemblage of crimson and purple reflected from the setting sun and falling on the varied landscape of that sweet clime, forms a scene on which the imagination might long dwell with delight. The last rays of that beautiful luminary were gilding the castle wherein resided the noble Count Flodoardo. The light streams gently through an open lattice in the back part of the castle, and discovers a lady's boudoir richly furnished.—A female form of perfect symmetry is seated near the window with her arm resting on a marble table, and her face buried in her small white hand. The door of the apartment opens, and a light graceful young girl of perhaps fifteen summers attired in a robe of white velvet beautifully embroidered, bounds in the room and exclaims—

"What! Aurelia, not dressed yet—father has twice summoned us to the saloon, and I have been impatiently waiting for you to call at my chamber as you passed. I thought you would chide me for negligence; yet here I am, quite ready, while my punctual sister has not yet doffed her robe of the afternoon."

"Carolie," said Aurelia, shaking back her tresses that she might look in her sister's face, "has Count Peloski arrived?"

Carolie's musical laugh resounded through the chamber, as she exclaimed. "This from our dignified sister" but suddenly checking herself why Aurelia what ails you; I declare your cheeks are almost scarlet, and your eyes they are so very bright. I verily believe you have fallen in love with the Count, and that too without ever seeing him. Don your best robe, and arrange your brown tresses and in the mean while I will descend to the saloon and account for your absence to my father by telling him that you had fallen asleep before your mirror while surveying your charms, and I have just awakened you—mind you, I'll not give one glance of these eyes which the young cavaliers swear are so bewitching, to the Count lest first impressions may not be easily worn off."

And away the mischievous girl bounded like a young fawn, leaving Aurelia to her own unpleasant thoughts.

The father of these maidens, the noble Count Flodoardo had inherited from a long train of ancestors, with their name, immense wealth. Born and bred in Italy, its peculiar religion had been instilled in his mind almost when an infant upon his mother's bosom. It had grown with his growth, and strengthened with his strength, so that at the age of seventy he was as bigoted a religionist, as could be found in Italy. He not only revered but loved the papal See, with a passion amounting to idolatry. When about twenty five years of age, he had united himself to a daughter of the house of Rolandi. She was in every way worthy of the affection he lavishly bestowed upon her. In ten years she had imparted to him the happiness of a wedded life, and he was now in the prime of life, with all the joys of a family, when he determined to make an effort to shake off the yoke that surrounded him, and find a worthy object on which he might again centre his affections. In a few years he paid his addresses to a lady of respectable though not noble family, and was accepted. They were married, and the lovely maidens we have introduced to our readers, were her children. But how vain is all earthly happiness, she too made the spirit land her home, soon after the birth of Carolie.

As we have before stated, Count Flodoardo loved his religion and its Head above all else in the known world. Next in his affections came his lovely daughters. The lady Aurelia, resembled her mother both in personal beauty, and the endowments of her mind. She was now just twenty. Her complexion was very fair, which is rarely seen in Italy; her eyes, the deep blue fringed with jetty lashes, and an expression of hauteur about her small and finely formed mouth, gave almost a stern cast to her countenance. She was generally pale, but it was rather the paleness of high thought, than of sickness. Her broad high brow where "intellect had set its seal," was placid as the summer's sky of her own bright clime.—Nor had nature bestowed all upon the Casket, without enriching the gem within; she was as intelligent and noble minded as she was beautiful.

Carolie was a bright joyous creature with laughing black eyes and Grecian lips, which slightly parting, disclosed teeth of unrivalled whiteness. Her complexion was dark and rich and her raven hair clustered around a pair of lovely shoulders, and fell in shining ringlets to her slender waist. She was generous and noble to a fault, but lacked that dignity which so well became her sister's; life to her seemed a long bright dream of bliss; for always of a happy temperament, she flung away the bitter and only tasted the sweets of life.

Among the young nobles that crowded the brilliant assemblies of the Count Flodoardo none approached the lady Aurelia with the language of love; not that her beauty was unregarded by them but they felt an awe in her presence unaccounted for even by themselves. One of those gallant epithets which almost invariably calls a blush of gratified pride to a young maiden's cheek, was met by her with coldness, and a look of gentle reproof in her deep searching eyes.

Things were in this position when it was rumoured that a young Polish nobleman, the Count Peloski, had taken up his residence in Italy and was to appear at a grand entertainment given by the Count.

We left Aurelia in her apartment a prey to unpleasant thoughts, and the reader perhaps will guess the cause by her own unguarded words to Carolie.

"Ah!" thought she, "how foolish I have been to betray myself to that wild girl, but what are my feelings? I know I have not myself truly thought of the Count, a perfect stranger whom I have never beheld, could not so have excited me. Where is now my self-possession? All—all has left me, and Aurelia Flodoardo, the stately woman who has seen princes at her feet and rejected them with scorn, is prepared to love an unknown foreigner.—O! no it cannot be, I will strive to regain my self-possession and none shall know my weakness."

She crossed the apartment and placed her hand on a small silver bell, then recollecting herself, she said "no I shall betray by word or look my feelings—I'll be my own true woman this time," and braiding the abundant tresses, she fastened the plait in a coil upon her head as she was wont to wear it, and placed on her white brow a coronet of pearls; then hastily throwing over her shoulders a robe of pale blue satin confined it to her waist, with a girdle wrought with the same gems, that cast their soft light among her braided hair. She turned to the mirror and the high born beauty saw an image there reflected, that might well have become an empress; then with a palpitating heart descended to the saloon. All there was life and beauty—immense lamps, suspended from the ceiling, reflected their light on the richly wrought and profusely ornamented sofas and divans. Statues of Grecian and Roman architecture crowned with the most rare and beautiful exotics, were placed around the vast apartment. Tables of the most curious workmanship groined under the costly vases with which they were laden—in short all that wealth could procure had been prepared by the Count to entertain his friends.

Murmurs of admiration ran through the crowd as the Lady Aurelia entered. She heeded them not, but cast an anxious glance around, and blushed as she beheld a tall young foreigner of noble bearing, standing beside her father; then with a quick nervous motion compressed her lips which gave almost an air of haughtiness to her face. The count came forward a few steps, and in a tone of gentle reproof chided her for tardiness; then taking her hand said,

"Allow me my daughter to present you to the Count Peloski, from Poland, who having as it were only caught a glimpse of our country and its fair daughters; has resolved to take up his residence here for some time and become better acquainted with them."

The lady bowed haughtily.

"Nay, nay my daughter, will you not give the Count your hand, and welcome him to our fair country."

She coldly presented her white hand, and murmured a few almost unintelligible words, and then turned away. The Pole followed her with his eyes, until accepting the offered arm of her cousin, Signor Francesco Cordona, mingled with the crowd.

A week had passed during which time Peloski saw the Lady Aurelia every evening, either at the assemblies of her father, or those given by their noble neighbors. He marked her haughty mien, but his discerning eye soon saw that she wore it as a mask to silence the gay and flippant young flatterers that would otherwise have surrounded her, and beneath it were all those gentler qualities that should adorn her sex.

"Well, Aurelia what do you think of your handsome foreigner?" said Francesco, as they were pacing the splendid saloon one evening. "For my part I think his queer suit of velvet clasped with such superb diamonds, favors too much of display.—I wonder if he always wears such apparel, or whether he is dressed thus in Italy, to captivate it dark-eyed daughters."

"I surely cannot answer for him," said she endeavoring to speak carelessly, and forcing a smile, "but pray cousin reach me a bouquet from Flora's garden; for certainly she can spare one."

He stepped lightly on the pedestal, and showered upon the marble floor a profusion of the lovely flowers that were entwined around the statue.—The lady culled from them her favorites, and the cousins passed on.

"Come" said Francesco, let us join that group yonder. See! the Lady Palmiro beckons us, and as I live, those splendid eyes of the Count grace her coteries.

"No, Francesco I have no desire to do so, but I will not detain you if you wish to go, said she relinquishing his arm.

"Farewell then my stately cousin, for in truth I am almost wearied of thy studied air and haughty brow: ah! you need not frown, 'tis the truth."

When Francesco left her, she crossed the saloon and opening a door that led in a splendid apartment, she entered and threw herself on a low embroidered ottoman. She had sat there for some time, lost in thought, and reckless of the time that flew by, when she heard her name pronounced in a low musical tone; she raised her eyes, and to her utter astonishment, beheld the Polish Count with his beaming eyes fixed upon her with a degree of admiration, which brought the color to her pale cheek.

"Why this intrusion Count Peloski?"

"Pardon me, noble lady" said the Pole respectfully. "I was not aware you were here—the saloon is so crowded, and seeing the door only partially closed I thought I would enter and breathe the fresh air, and was about to retire when I first saw it occupied. But tell me who sweet lady would be contented with one glance at thy noble beauty?"

She fixed her dark blue eyes intently on his face, and he read on her pale brow reproof as she said—

"I have a mirror that tells me all I wish to know about my person."

Two long hours had flown, and still the Count lingered. The town had passed from off the lady's brows, and no attempt was made to withdraw the snowy hand that rested in his; the conversation had taken a gentler turn, and kindred beings understood each other.

"We shall be missed from the saloon if we tarry longer," said Aurelia rising.

They entered together, and the sweet contented expression that shone in the eyes of the lady, was marked by all; the violets of her bouquet had disappeared, and those placed in the bosom of the Count certainly resembled the truants.

Days, weeks, and months had rolled by. In the mean time Peloski had demanded the hand of the Lady Aurelia. This old Count previous to his second marriage had travelled through a greater part of Europe, and while in Poland, had been received and treated as his rank deserved by the family who were proud of their untarnished name, which had descended to them by a long line of ancestors; and this Fredrico Peloski and a younger brother who was now in Poland were the last scions of that noble race—and it is not to be wondered at that the old Count received his proposals not only with acquiescence but with heart-felt joy. The marriage day was fixed and the wedding suits of the noble couple prepared, but a cloud sat upon the brows of the intended bridegroom; the cause of which Aurelia endeavored in vain to fathom; he evaded her tender enquiries, until she almost feared she might be the innocent cause, and gave up all endeavors as fruitless.

They were sitting alone one evening in their favourite balcony overlooking the garden; the Count persisting in a gloomy silence for some time, when suddenly with a resolute expression on his features.

"Aurelia dearest," said he "I have been wanting in my duty to thee and thy noble father. He paused. I have reason to believe that I have gained thy heart's first and best affections. I have looked in thy mild eyes and when words of love and eternal fidelity fell from thy lips, have read there than hast opened thy whole soul to me—and yet—and yet, lady I have deceived thee—it must be told; he that has gained thy heart is a—PROTESTANT."

She answered not, but the small hand which the Count held in his grew cold as marble, a suppressed groan half-parted her lips and she fainted. Two moments had scarcely elapsed ere she opened her eyes. Raising herself from the arm that had supported her in her swoon she rose with flashing eyes and form drawn to its full height—her voice faltering not, as she said—

"The struggle has passed—my own heart is in my bosom and I return yours—think you Count, that Aurelia Flo-lar is an apostate from her father's religion? Can she love the man—a HERETIC, who basely came first deceiving her only parent and then gained her heart thinking when that was his, he could reveal his deceit and she would smile because she loved him."

The latter part of her sentence was spoken in a sarcastic tone, which left not a doubt in the Count's mind, but in that few moments every spark of love had fled.

"Farewell then lady," cried he while the anguish that rent his heart showed plainly on his manly features. "I deserve this but I did not expect it."

Aurelia spoke not or moved, and the count proceeded. "Lady I plead guilty—yes, I have deceived thee and that grossly—before I came here I had heard of thy noble father, and knew that our belief was widely different. Fame too spoke of thee. I came and loved: yes, lady, loved as man never did before—mine was not that passion which for a short time, continues, and then like wild-fire is eaten up by its own intensity—but a deep undying flame, that shall last as long as life endures—even thou' you look cold upon me and say you love me not. I had determined to acquaint thy father of our religious differences, before he gave his princely word that we should be united, and perhaps you will call me weak-minded, when I say that love for thee deterred me, for I was certain I should lose thee, and a wild hope that thy father would never know of my religion led me on, yet I knew that I was doing wrong, and to-day had determined, come what would, to decide thee no longer. I shall return to Poland, for I cease thee no longer. I shall never be before me and shall act as a talisman to lead me on to honor and glory." Farewell, Aurelia, may the God of my fathers protect thee and make thy lot happier than my own.

The lady had not moved from their first position and her eyes which were fixed upon the Count, almost startled him by their wild expression.—A deadly color had spread itself over her features—she clasped her hands and exclaimed with passionate emotion.

"Would we had never met!" then suddenly as though a thought crossed her she checked herself and waving her hand with a queenly air.

"Peloski said she almost calmly leave me now and forever—forgive the rash words I have spoken—farewell!"

The Count threw himself on his knees before her, pressed her hand passionately to his lips—murmured an adieu—and was gone.

SKETCH OF TRAVEL.

EGYPTIAN CAVERNS.

It was early in March, 1812, that Mr. Legh, a celebrated English traveller and his companions entered Egypt, and continued his voyage down the river Nile. A Greek, named Demetrio, had reported to them the existence, near Manfalout, of certain pits or caverns, containing the mummies of crocodiles, of which they had hitherto seen no specimens in Egypt. Desiring to examine those, they quitted the banks of the river, and at the village of Amaldi engaged four Arabs to be their guides to the caverns, which they found at a short distance, but within the confines of the desert. A circular pit, about 18 feet in depth brought them down to the level of the excavations three of the Arabs descended with them, and with lighted torches they made their way through various winding passages, without finding more than a few fragments of crocodile mummies. The following part of the narrative we may best give in Mr. Legh's own words.

Our curiosity was still unsatisfied. We had been wandering for more than an hour in low subterranean passages, and felt considerable fatigued by the irksomeness of the posture in which we had been obliged to move, and the heat of our torches in those narrow and low galleries. But the Arabs spoke so confidently of succeeding in this second trial, that we were induced once more to attend them. We found the opening of the chamber which we now approached, guarded by a trench of unknown depth, and wide enough to require a good leap. The first Arab jumped the ditch, and we all followed him. The passage we entered was extremely small, and so low in some places as to oblige us to crawl flat on the ground, and almost always on our hands and knees. The intricacies of its windings resembled a labyrinth; and it terminated at length in a chamber much smaller than that we had left; but, like the latter, contained nothing to satisfy our curiosity. Our search hitherto had been fruitless; but the mummies might not be far distant; another effort, and we might still be successful.

The Arab whom I followed, and who led the way, now entered another gallery, and we all continued to move in the same manner as before, each preceded by a guide. We had not gone far before the heat became excessive;—for my own part, I found my breathing extremely difficult; my head began to ache most violently, and I had a most distressing sensation of fullness about the breast. We felt we had gone too far, and yet were almost deprived of the power of returning. At this moment the torch of the first Arab went out. I was close to him, and saw him fall on his side; he uttered a groan,—his legs were strongly convulsed, and I heard a rattling in his throat—he was dead. The Arab behind me, seeing the torch of his companion extinguished, conceiving he had stumbled, passed me, advanced to his assistance, and stooped. I observed him appear faint, totter, and fall in a moment—he also was dead. The third Arab came forward, and made an effort to approach the bodies, but stopped short. We looked at each other in silent horror.—The danger increased every instant: our torches burnt faintly: our breathing became more difficult; our knees tottered under us, and we felt our strength nearly gone.

There was no time to be lost. The American, Barthow, cried to us to take courage, and we began to move back as fast as we could. We heard the remaining Arab shouting after us, calling us Caffres, imploring our assistance, and upbraiding us with deserting him. But we were obliged to leave him to his fate, expecting every moment to share it with him. The windings of the passages through which we had come, increased the difficulty of our escape, we might take a wrong turn, and never reach the great chamber we had first entered. Even supposing we took the shortest road, it was but too probably our strength would fail us before we arrived. We had each of us separately and unknown to one another, observed attentively the different shapes of the stones which projected into the galleries we had passed, so that each had an imperfect clue to the labyrinth we had now to retrace. We compared notes, and only on one occasion had a dispute, the American differing from my friend and myself;—in this dilemma, we were determined by the majority, and fortunately were right.—Exhausted with fatigue and terror, we reached the edge of the deep trench, which remained to be crossed before we got into the great chamber. Mustering all my strength, I leaped; and was followed by the American. Smelt stood on the brink, ready to drop with fatigue. He called to me—"for God's sake to help him over the fosse, or at least to stop, if only for five minutes, to allow him to recover his strength." It was impossible—to stay was death, and we could not resist the desire to push on, and reach the open air. We encouraged him to summon all his force, and he cleared the trench. When we reached the open air, it was one o'clock, and the heat in the sun about 160 degrees. Our sailors, who were waiting for us, had luckily a bardak full of water, which they sprinkled upon us; but though a little refreshed, it was not possible to climb the sides of the pit: they unfolded their turbans, and slinging them round our bodies, drew us up to the top.

Our appearance alone, without our guides, naturally astonished the Arab, who had remained at the entrance of the cavern; and he anxiously inquired for his friends. To have confessed they were dead, would have excited suspicion; he would have supposed we had murdered them, and have alarmed the inhabitants of Amaldi, to pursue us, and revenge the death of their friends. We replied, therefore, they were coming, and were employed in bringing out the mummies we had found, which was the cause of their delay.—We lost no time in mounting our asses, recrossed the desert, and past hastily by the village, to regain the ferry at Manfalout.

A FIELD OF BATTLE.

Field of Waterloo at noon on the day after the Battle.—On the surface of two square miles, it was ascertained that 50 thousand men and horses were lying! The luxurious crop of ripe grain which had covered the field of battle was reduced to litter, and beaten into the earth; and the surface, trodden down by the cavalry and furrowed deeply by the cannon wheels, strewn with many a relic of the fight. Helmets and cuirasses, shattered fire arms and broken swords—all the variety of military ornaments—lancer caps and Highland bonnets; uniforms of every color, plume, and pennon; musical instruments, the apparatus of artillery, drums; bugles—but, good God! why dwell on the harrowing picture of a foughten field? Each and every ruinous display bore mute testimony to the misery of such a battle.

Could the melancholy appearance of the scene of death be brightened, it would be by witnessing the researches of the living amidst its desolation for the objects of their love.—Mothers and wives, and children, for days were occupied in that mournful duty; and the confusion of corpses, friend and foe intermingled as they were, often rendered the attempt of recognizing individuals difficult, and in some cases impossible.

In some places the dead lay four deep upon each other, marking the space occupied when exposed to a French battery. They were scattered, attempting to force the bayonet, they had fallen in the ranks, the cavalry, Chasseur and Hussar, were mingled, a Norman horse of the Imperial Guard, speared with the grey chargers which had carried the lion's chivalry. Here the Highlander and tirailleur lay side by side together, and the heavy dragoon, with green Erin's badge upon the helmet, was grappling in death with the Polish lancer.

On the summit of ridge, where the ground was cumbered with dead and trodden fetlock deep in mud and gore by the frequent rush of rival cavalry, the thick strewn corpses of the Imperial Guard pointed out the spot where Napoleon had been defeated. Here in column, that favored corps on whom his last chance rested, had been annihilated; and the advance and repulse of the Guard was traceable by a mass of fallen Frenchmen. In the hollow below, the last struggle of France had been vainly made for the Old Guard, when the middle battalions had been forced back, attempted to meet the British, and afford time for their disorganized companions to rally. Here the British left, which had converged upon the French centre, had come up, and here the bayonet closed the contest.

THE GATHERER.

BEN JOHNSON INSPIRED BY WINE.—The following curious memoranda, by Ben Jonson, are now preserved at Dulwich college:

Mem. I laid the plot of my "Volpone," and wrote most of it, after a present of ten dozen of palm sack from my very good Lord T——; that play I am positive will live to posterity, and be acted—when I and my friends—with applause.

Mem. The first speech in my "Catiline," spoken by Sylla's ghost, was writ after I parted with my friend at the Devil Tavern [near Temple Bar, where Child's Place now stands.] I had drank well that night, and had brave notions. There is a scene in that play which I think is flat. I resolve to drink no water with my wine.

Mem. Upon the 20th of May, the King (heaven reward him) sent me a hundred pounds. At that time I went often to the Devil; and, before I had spent forty pounds of it, wrote my "Alchemist."

Men. "The Devil an Ass," "The Tale of a Tub," and some other comedies which did not succeed, written by me in winter; honest Ralph died, when I and my boys drank bad wine at the Devil.

The Georgia Historical Society is in possession of a pair of "Old Put's" snow shoes—a medal struck by Congress in honor of General Green—a box made from the keel of the "Enterprise," in which Captain Cook first sailed round the world; and, most valuable of all, a musket which was Paul Jones' and used by him in the action with the "Serapis." He gave it to Dr. Franklin, from whom it descended to the late Mr. Bache, of Philadelphia, who bequeathed it to his nephew, Mr. Harwood, of the Navy, and he it was who presented it to the Society.

WINTER BUTTER IMPROVED BY CARROTS.—When cows are not fed on roots or other succulent food in winter, the cream generally produces butter of a light color, which greatly lessens the value of the article for market. As the juice of carrots was recommended for giving a good color to butter, we made the experiment, supposing that it would be merely a matter of disguise by improving its appearance and not injuring its flavor, but to our surprise we found that the carrot juice not only improved the appearance of the butter, but added to its quality, by rendering it more sweet, rich, and of a finer flavor. There was no taste of the carrots in the butter. It may be that butter colored in this way will not keep so well in hot weather, but this can be no objection in the making of winter butter, which is usually consumed in a short time.

DIRECTIONS.—Altringham, Long Orange, or any other rich yellow carrots are good for improving butter. Wash them clean, then grate them fine, and cover them with new milk; after they have stood ten or fifteen minutes, put them into a cloth and squeeze the juice into the cream. Use a carrot of middling size to cream enough for two pounds of butter.

BENEVOLENCE.—A physician who advertised that he would heal the poor gratis, received an accession of practice on that account. One of his intimates asked him how he could afford time to devote to the poor.

"I'll tell you," said the doctor; "when a poor man or woman calls on me, I make their poverty so notorious, or express so many insidious doubts of their inability to pay, that they seldom trouble me a second time. If they felt ashamed of their poverty before, they go away from me under such a crushing sense of degradation, that, I verily believe I have fewer non-paying patients than any other practitioner in the country. This doctor was more candid than some of his contemporaries.—Boston Magazine."

IRISH REASONING.—A poor fellow who was on his death bed, and who did not seem quite reconciled to the long journey he was going to take, was kindly consoled by a good natured friend, with the common place reflection, that we must all die once. "Why my dear sir," answered the sick man, "that is the very thing that vexes me; if I could die half a dozen times, I should not mind it."

"Daughters, tenderly reared, and who have brought handsome fortunes to their husbands, are often obliged to return home to their aged parents, who have to maintain them, their husbands, and their children—a deplorable fate of old age." Fathers have the unspeakably misery of beholding their sons in whom the hopes of after years were centered, broken down indolent, reckless, dissipated—hanging on society as pests and nuisances, instead of becoming ornaments and examples of it.

A fellow who wrote a wretched hand, and made almost as bad a fix at spelling and grammar, gave as an excuse for the deficiencies of his education, that "he never went to school but one afternoon and then the master wasn't there."

NEWSPAPERS.—Out of thirteen thousand papers in the civilized world upwards of eleven thousand are issued in the United States.

DREADFUL DEATH.—A man named Hewdee, while engaged in oiling the wrist of an engine in one of the Mississippi boats, thrust his arm through the arms of one of the fly wheels, and was carried by them between the wheels and the staunchcons, and ground to mince meat.

Something Singular.—We conversed, yesterday with a little girl of five years, who has a mother of 25, a grandmother of 45, a great-grandmother of 65, and a great-great-grandmother of 85, all living! It adds to the singularity of the event, that each of the parties, from the youngest to the oldest, is the "only daughter" of her parents. We should be right glad to see the whole five taking tea together. It would warm the heart.—Boston Transcript.

AMERICAN MASONIC REGISTER.

ALBANY, SATURDAY, JAN. 18, 1840.

The Original Tale, in our paper of this week, is from the pen of a young lady of this city under 16 years of age, and is a performance that would not discredit riper years. The effusions of "FLORA," are from the same source, and many of them written before our pretty little correspondent, had attained her 13th year.

THE GRAND CHAPTER of the State of New York, will convene at St. John's Hall, in this City, on the first Tuesday of February inst.

NOTICE.—The Companions and Mark Masters of Temple Chapter, are informed, that meetings for improvement, under the instruction of Com. WADSWORTH will be held at the Hall, commencing on Monday morning next. The room will be opened, from 9 A. M. to 12, from 2 to 5, P. M. and from 7 until 9, in the evening. The Companions of the Legislature, and all others in regular standing, are invited to attend.

Considerable damage was done by fire, on Sunday morning last, to the Athenaeum building, lately erected for the N. Y. Society Library, corner of Broadway and Leonard streets. The damage is estimated at $5000.

"BITTER COLD WEATHER."—We are not aware how the expression of bitter came to be applied to a cold day. But it is so, and if the thermometer is to be taken as an index, Friday the 17th may be put down as a day of the bitterest kind. The mercury stood this morning at 1/2 past 7, at 26 degrees below 0.

This weather together with the pressure of the times, cannot fail of bringing, what we understand does exist—extreme suffering and distress among the poor; and if there is any of the "milk of human kindness" in the human breast, now is the time to shew it. The Almighty has made the rich only as stewards to dispense His bounties entrusted to their care, and the present moment is well calculated to call forth the tender mercies of those who have been blessed in their store.—The whole duty of man is to his neighbor: "If a man say he loveth God, whom he hath not seen, and hateth [neglecteth] his brother, whom he hath seen, he is a liar and the truth doth not abide in him."

We trust the public authorities will immediately open a soup house, as this charity affords much relief at a cheap rate.

Close Vote in Massachusetts.—We understand unofficially, says the Boston Centinel, that the returns of votes for Governor, from all the towns have been counted, and that, should none of the returns be rejected for informality, Mr. Morton will have been elected Governor by a majority of one vote, from an aggregate of about one hundred thousand. So close a contest is unparalleled in the history of the Commonwealth.

At the annual meeting of the Fire Department of the city of Albany, held at the City Hall, on the 9th ult., the following officers were elected for the ensuing year:

Alfred Southwick, president; John H. Trotter, Vice President; Peter G. Dox, Secretary; Vischer Ten Eyck and Robert S. Cushman, Trustees; Jas. E. McClure, treasurer, and Jos. Parker, Collector.

INTELLIGENCE.

[From the N. Y. Evening Daily Herald—Extra Jan. 14.]

MOST DREADFUL DISASTER!!

THE STEAM BOAT LEXINGTON BURNT, AND NEARLY TWO HUNDRED OF THE PASSENGERS AND CREW DESTROYED.

By a gentleman who left Greenwich, (Fairfield co., on the Sound) this morning, we have the distressing intelligence that the steam boat Lexington, when opposite or near Huntington, on the Long-Island shore was found to be on fire. The alarm being given every exertion was made to preserve the boat and passengers, but a series of untoward events produced the dreadful tragedy which ensued.

We have the particulars, of course but imperfectly—yet enough to pall the stoutest heart, and carry dreadful apprehensions to unheeding friends. The fire was discovered a little after 7 o'clock, under a tier of cotton bales, piled amidship, against the wooden box or frame which enclosed the pipe leading from the fire-room below, this boat having her boiler on her keelson, or under deck.

This pipe led through the freight above, and the ignition of the cotton had become so extensive before the fire engine and hose of the boat could be put in operation, that both crew and passengers were overwhelmed in smoke, and the natural agitation of the moment that all efforts to subdue the fire were unavailable.

A rush was then made for the boats—but in the agitation of the time, they were filled to overflowing, and were swamped along side of the burning boat. There were, as we understand, four boats, for the preservation of the sufferers—but the life boat was lost, and the others met the fate which we have stated.

The persons saved were Capt. Hilliard, of Norwich the pilot of the boat, and one of the hands. Capt. H. placed himself on a bale of cotton, and, with one of the crew, was afloat 15 hours before he was taken up, by a sloop from Southport, which went to the rescue this morning as soon as it was in the power of those on shore to render assistance. His companion died on the bale of cotton before they were taken up.

The sloop with rescued the survivors was met on Bridgeport this morning by the steamer Nimrod, Capt. Brooks, who took Mr. Hilliard on board, from whom these particulars are derived, the other persons saved being too much exhausted to be transferred.

The Lexington is supposed to have been commanded by Capt. Childs, with the crew before employed in the Narragansett, all of whom perished with the passengers. We also learn that there were five or six ladies on board, one of whom was seen in the water with an infant at her breast.

Capt. Hilliard states that the number of persons on board must have been nearly two hundred, and he knows of none saved but himself and the two we have named. There were at least 150 passengers, beside the crew—all lost!

We give these imperfect particulars as we have heard them, with the melancholy reflection that though imperfect, they are true.

[From the New York Sun.]

BRISK TIMES AT CONEY ISLAND—GIBBS AND WANSLEY'S BURIED MONEY FOUND.

We learn from a gentleman who returned from the scene of action last evening, with a pocket full of the "spoils," that Coney Island has been alive for a couple of days past with people digging up and collecting the treasure buried there by the pirates Gibbs and Wansley: part of the $54,000 plunder obtained by the murderous crew of the Vineyard, in November 1830, the horrors of which transaction must be still fresh in the recollection of many of our readers.

After getting possession of the vessel, and ascertaining the value of her cargo, the specie was divided, and the share of each was about $5000; and the course of the vessel (which was bound for Philadelphia) was changed for Long Island. When about 15 miles from Southampton light, they got the boats out, and put half the money in each—they then scuttled the vessel, set fire to it in the cabin, and took to the boats. Gibbs, Wansley, and two or three more, took the long boat, which was foundered, and nearly all the money lost with it.

Gibbs and his comrades buried the principal part of the money brought in the long boat, on the beach very lightly covering it, and although almost immediately after, and several times since, search was made for it, no trace of it was discovered till a couple of days since, when a number of Mexican dollars were discovered on the beach by a citizen residing on the island—the action of the water having washed away the sand with which the money had been covered, and scattered the coin considerable distance along the shore.

The same individual continued his search, and has, we learn, himself collected, by picking up on the beach and digging near a thousand Mexican dollars; and the fact coming to the knowledge of others, the beach has since presented a busy scene of diggers and searchers for a mile or more extent; and, as we learn, several thousand dollars in all have been found. Some of the pieces are much discolored, and others are still quite bright.

Loss of the Ship Havell by Fire and Five Persons by Drowning.

Mournful tidings were received in this city on Saturday morning, by Mr. Austin, Jr., the consignee of the vessel, of the destruction by fire of the liner ship Havell, Capt. Howe, from C. Latta for Boston, on the 25th of October last, in lat. 4 30 S., lo 12, 25 25 W., together with five persons by drowning, viz: Messrs. Henry Parkman, of this city, supercargo; Henry Irving and Bell of New Hampshire, passengers; Mr. Samuel Nash, of this city, 1st officer, and one seaman. Captain Howe, Mr. Davidson, Mr. William Austin, supercargo, Mr. Blunt, 2nd officer, and the remainder of the crew, in all seventeen in number, after seven days in the long boat, landed at a place about 30 miles north of Pernambuco; and thence proceeded to the latter place where Mr. Austin, under date of November 5, communicates this melancholy shipwreck in a letter received via Liverpool and New York. A previous letter forwarded via Rio Janeiro, detailing the particulars, has not yet come to hand. There was insurance on the vessel and cargo at different offices in this city, to a large amount.

ARMY OPERATIONS IN FLORIDA.—We have learned from an authentic source, that the campaign in Middle Florida has fairly opened.

Col. Garland, in command of the 1st column composed of 11 companies of the 1st and 2d infantry, is ordered to scour all the hammocks between the St. Augustine road and the Georgia line, and has already, with nine companies, passed through Patterson's hammock, from west to east, without discovering any indication of Indians.

Col. Davenport, in command of the 2d column, composed of dragoons, artillery, and 6th infantry, has commenced operations south of the St. Augustine road, between it and the Gulf.

It is feared, and by many believed, that notwithstanding the whole of Middle Florida is thus, as far as the small force in Florida will admit, covered with troops from the Georgia line to the Gulf, the campaign will terminate without discovering Indians.—Savannah Georgian, Jan. 5.

DISTRESSING RAIL ROAD ACCIDENT.—As the Cars were coming up from Syracuse on Sunday last, the following fatal accident occurred. As Mr. George Williamson, the travelling collector on the road, was handing out and receiving the way-mails at Nine-Mile Creek, his foot slipped, causing him to fall upon the snow bank, at that place about five feet high. One of his legs was thus brought upon the rails, and the cars being slowly moving, it was broke in two places below the knee. Dr. Pitney was called, who advised amputation; but to this the sufferer could not bring himself to submit; and after a night of intense suffering, death ensued. The deceased was a worthy and industrious individual—by whose death a wife and several children are left in indigent circumstances.—Auburn Journal.

SHOCKING.—A little girl about seven years of age the daughter of Mr. John Gilles, living near this village, was so shockingly burned, on Christmas day in the absence of the parent, by her clothes (which were of cotton) accidentally taking fire, that she survived only a few hours. The screams of the little sufferer brought a neighbour to the house, who found her standing in the door, literally roasted alive; but what renders the circumstance of her death more painfully aggravating, is, that her sister, a girl 14 years old, was sitting by rocking a young child, but who never made an effort to save her, although a pail of water was standing near her; and when asked by the neighbour, why she had not, sullenly replied, "because she hadn't a mind to."—St. Catharines (U. C.) Journal.

Suspicion of Murder.—It is stated in the Jamaica Farmer of Thursday, that a man named Lewis, who is a coach trimmer, and lately in the employment of Gilbert Hicks, at Lakeville, was lately found dead in the woods, "having a deep cut across his throat." On Sunday afternoon, the deceased and William Robbins a Blacksmith, left Flushing for Lakeville, during a snow storm. Robbins states that they got bewildered and Lewis became unable to proceed. Robbins made no attempt to search for Lewis, whose body was found on Wednesday. The Coroner's jury returned a verdict of "death from cause unknown;" but this has not removed the suspicion of foul play, and there is some excitement on the matter.—N. York Sun.

OHIO.—The Cleveland Herald states that some farmers of Stark County who wanted money to pay their taxes falling due in a few days, recently visited Massillon, carrying their wheat for sale. After hawking it through the town for some time, the best offer they could get was 43 cents a bushel in barter for goods which would not pay taxes, but could not get a cash offer at all, and were obliged to return as they came.

INCENDIARISM.—By the schooner Arcot, which arrived at New York on Saturday last, from Savannah-Jamaica, we learn of a destructive fire, done by the negroes, at that place on the 23d of November last. Property lost upwards of $150,000; and no insurance.

A locomotive on the Pennsylvania railroad recently drew a train of eighty cars, containing 240,000 pounds of freight, consisting of 1,500 barrels of flour and the remainder in iron and nails.

The abolition paper, started a few months since at Rochester, has died for want of support. Rather significant.

25,000 Canadians emigrated to the Western States during the last year.

POETRY.

A QUESTION OF THIS LIFE'S IMPORT.

BY ONE WALKING IN TWILIGHT.

BROTHER, brother, speak me kindly!
I am journeying, without end;
Dark myself, I wander blindly—
To no bourne my footsteps tend.

Meaning signs I see around me,
Earth in secret worketh near;
But my searchings all confound me,
Canst thou tell what wait we here?

In the work, the Earth is working,
In her forms and in her powers
Kindred likeness still is lurking,
To these frames and forms of ours.

Through all life and through all being,
Parts familiar to our own,
Hearing, breathing, feeling, seeing,
Pass, united or alone;

In the great life-mould are scatt'erd
Elements in man's mobin'd;
But the first close bound is shatter'd—
They are strange and we unkind.

Inner heat the earth is burning,
Breaking outward here and there;
Sireams are flow'g, and returning,
Seek their courses through the air:

And within us, warmth is glowing,
Till the room is chill'd by death,
And life's streams are ever flowing,
Newly changed at every breath.

In the waters reflected Forms around and in the sky,
Like the image-form reflected
In the waters of the eye.

To Earth's ear all sounds are given,
Echoing ere they cease to be,
As the burdened air is driven
With its sound to rest in me.

Love, and Life, and Reason gloweth
In the eyes of every brute;
But their secret no man knoweth,
For to us their tongue is mute.

Is there language for all creatures,
Read or spoken, or but felt?
Or must these familiar features
Into unknown outlines melt?

Now Man sits, a brief existence,
Sidelong glancing at the earth,
Sunder'd by unsocial distance
From her love, and toil, and mirth.

To God's eye, we loiter vainly,
With a secret at our feet,
In whose lines are written plainly,
Where the ends of all life meet.

Half unknown to one another,
Strange to every thing beside,
Gloomily we wander, brother,
Hath this crowded way no guide!

BLESSED ARE THEY THAT MOURN.

BY WILLIAM C. BRYANT.

Oh, deem not they are blessed alone
Whose life a peaceful tenor keeps;
The power who pities man, has shown;
A blessing for the eyes that weep.

The light of smiles shall fill again
The lids that overflow with tears,
And weary hours of woe and pain
Are promises of happy years.

There is a day of sunny rest
For every dark and troubled night;

And grief may hide, an evening guest,
But joy shall come with early light.

And thou, who o'er thy friend's low bier,
Sheddest the bitter drops like rain,
Hope that a happier, brighter shore,
Will give him to thy arm again.

Nor let the good man's trust depart,
Though life its common gift deny,
Though pierced and broken be his heart,
And spurned of men, he goes to die.

For God has marked each sorrowing day
And numbered every secret tear;
And heaven's language of bliss shall pay
For all its children suffer here.

THE MARINER'S CHILD TO HIS MOTHER.

Oh, weep no more, sweet mother,
Oh, weep no more to-night;
And only watch the sea mother,
Beneath the morning light.

Then the bright blue sky is joyful,
And the bright blue sky is clear,
And I can see, sweet mother,
To kiss away thy tear.

But now the wind goes wailing,
O'er the dark and trackless deep;
And I know your grief sweet mother,
Though I only hear you weep.

My father's ship will come mother,
In safety o'er the main;
When the grapes are dyed with purple,
He will be back again.

The vines were put in blossom,
When he bade me watch them grow,
And now the large leaves, mother,
Conceal their crimson glow.

He'll bring us shells and sea weed,
And bird of shining wing;
But what are these, dear mother?
It is himself he'll bring.

Our beautiful Madonna,
Will mark how you have wept,
The prayer of early morning,
The vigils you have kept.

She will guide his stately vessel,
Though the sea be dark and drear,
Another week of sunshine—
My father will be here.

I'll watch with thee sweet mother,
But the stars fade from my sight;
Come, come and sleep dear mother,
Oh, weep no more to night. [MISS LONDON]

LOVE AND FRIENDSHIP.

BY WILLIAM LEGGETT.

The birds, when winter shades the sky,
Fly o'er the seas away,
Where laughing isles in sunshine lie,
And summer breezes play.

And thus the friends that flutter near
While fortune's sun is warm,
Are startled if a cloud appear,
And fly before the storm.

But when from winter's howling plains
Each other warbler's past,
The little snow-bird still remains,
And cherubs midst the blast.

Love, like that bird, when friendship's throng
With fortune's sun depart,
Still lingers with its cheerful song,
And nestles on the heart.

TO MY SISTER.

I love thee sister, and I wish
That thy frail bark might glide along.

O'er such a changing sea as this,
Upon a smooth, unbroken calm.

I wish—but ah! I know 'tis vain—
That thy light heart, and fair bright brow,
Might ever, while on earth, remain
As free from anxious care as now.

Oh! could a sister's wishes guide
Thou onward o'er life's fickle sea,
Securely should thy shallop glide,
From every storm and danger free.

But dearest girl, it is the lot
Of mortals, while below, to taste,
Mixed with each cup of life, the drop
Of sorrow, and of bitterness.

Then learn, oh! early learn, to bear
With resignation every ill;
Though great thy earthly sorrows are,
Submit—it is God's righteous will.

TO A BROTHER AT PARTING.

BY MISS MARGERET L. EATON.

Farewell, my brother; yet before we part,
And grasp the hand and shed the urgent tear.
Come to thy Mother's picture. Her's the heart
That would surpass our kindness, were she here.
Come every one—ye innocent and gay,
Who once around her dying chamber stood.
But since to life's green isles have sought the way,
And found the path with much of earthly good.
She bade us live in love; and though the land
Be distant far, that marks thy destiny.
Still we shall miss thee from our cheerful band,
And love shall move us when we mention thee.
We can't retain thee brother; but the earth,
With all its varied scene, is God's alone,
He can in wisdom guide thy goings forth,
And light thy guardian angel from his throne!
We veil the picture, and we say, "Farewell!"
But years are fleet, and thou wilt yet return.
Oh, may we hope in one kind home to dwell,
When old oblivion hides the sable urn!

THE HISTORY OF FREEMASONRY,
DRAWN FROM AUTHENTIC SOURCES OF INFORMATION.

No. X.

While Freemasonry was flourishing in England under the auspices of Henry VI. it was at the same time patronised, in the sister kingdom, by King James I. By the authority of this monarch, every Grand-Master who was chosen by the brethren, either from the nobility or clergy, and approved of by the crown was entitled to an annual revenue of four pounds Scots from each master mason, and likewise to a fee at the initiation of every new member. He was empowered to adjust any difference that might arise among the brethren, and to regulate those affairs, connected with the fraternity, which it was improper to bring under the cognizance of the courts of law. The Grand Master, also appointed deputies or wardens, who resided in the chief towns of Scotland, and managed the concerns of the order, when it was inconvenient to appeal to the Grand Master himself.

In the reign of James II. Freemasonry was by no means neglected. The office of Grand master was granted by the crown to William St. Clair, Earl of Orkney and Caithness, Baron of Roslin, and founder of the much admired chapel of Roslin. On account of the attention which this nobleman paid to the interests of the order, and the rapid propagation of the royal art under his administration, King James II. made the office of Grand-Master hereditary to his heirs and successors, in the barony of Roslin; in which family it continued till the institution of the Grand Lodge of Scotland. The Barons of Roslin as hereditary Grand Masters of Scotland, held their principal annual meetings at Kilwinning, the birth place of Scottish Masonry, while the lodge of that village granted constitutions and charter of erection to those brethren of the order, who were anxious that regular lodges should be formed in different parts of the kingdom. These lodges all held of the lodge of Kilwinning; and in token of their respect and submission, joined to their own name, that of their mother lodge, from whom they derived their existence as a corporation. (a)

During the succeeding reigns of the Scottish monarchs, Freemasonry still flourished, though very little information can be procured respecting the particular state of the fraternity. In the Privy Seal Book of Scotland, however, there is a letter dated at Holyrood-house, 25th September 1590, and granted by King James VI. "to Patrick Copland, "of Undaught, for using and exercising the office of Wardenrie over "the art and craft of Masonrie, over all the boundis of "Aberdeen, Banff, and Kincardine, to had warden "and justice courts within the said boundis, and there "to minister justice(b)." This letter confirms what has already been said concerning the state of Masonry in Scotland. It proves beyond dispute, that the Kings of Scotland nominated the office bearers of the order; that these provincial masters, or wardens, as they were then called, administered justice in every dispute which concerned the "the art and craft of masonrie;" that lodges were established in all parts of Scotland, even in those remote, and, at that time, uncivilized counties of Aberdeen, Banff, and Kincardine, and it completely overtures the unfounded assertion of Dr. Robinson, who maintains(c), that the celebrated antiquary Elias Ashmole, who was initiated in 1646, is the only distinct and unequivocal instance of a person being admitted into the fraternity who was not an architect by profession.

The minutes of St. Mary's chapel, which is the oldest lodge in Edinburgh extend as far back as the year 1598; but as they contain only the ordinary proceedings of the lodge, we can derive from them no particular information respecting the customs and condition of the fraternity. It appears, however, from these minutes that Thomas Boswell, esq. of Auchinleck, was made a warden of the lodge in the year 1600; and that the Honourable Robert Moray, Quartermaster-General to the army in Scotland, was created a master mason in 1641. These facts are deserving of notice, as they show, in opposition to Dr. Robinson, that persons were early admitted into the order, who were not architects by their profession.

When James VI. ascended the throne of England he seems to have neglected his right of nominating the office-bearers of the craft. In Hay's Manuscript in the Advocate's Library, there are two charters granted by the Scottish monarchs, appointing the Sinclairs of Roslin their hereditary Grand Masters. The first of these is without a date, but signed by several masons who appointed William St Clair of Roslin, his heirs and judges." The other is, in some measure, a ratification of the first, and dated 1630, in which they appoint Sir William St Clair of Roslin his heirs and successor, to be their "patrons, protectors, and overseers in all time coming." In the first of these deeds which seems to have been written a little after the union of the crowns, it is stated, that the want of a protector, for some years had engendered many corruptions among the masons, and had considerably retarded the progress of the craft; and that the appointment of William Sinclair, Esq. was with the advice and consent of William Shaw, Master of Work to his Majesty. After presiding over the order for many years, William St Clair went to Ireland, where he continued a considerable time; and, in consequence of his departure, the second charter was granted to his son Sir William St Clair, investing him with the same powers which his father enjoyed. It deserves also to be remarked that in both these deeds, the appointment of William Sinclair, Earl of Orkney and Caithness, to the office of Grand Master, by James II. of Scotland, is spoken of as a fact well known, and universally admitted. These observations will set it in a clear point of view what must hitherto have appeared a great inconsistency in the history of Scottish Masonry. In the deed by which William Sinclair, Esq. of Roslin, resigned the office of hereditary Grand Master in 1736, it is stated that his ancestors, William and Sir William St Clair of Roslin, were constituted patrons of the fraternity by the Scottish Masons themselves; while it is well known, that the grant of hereditary Grand Master was originally made by James II. of Scotland, to their ancestor, William Sinclair, Earl of Orkney and Caithness. But, when we consider that James VI. by not exercising his power, virtually transferred to the craft the right of electing their office bearers, the inconsistency vanishes; for Mr. Sinclair and his predecessors, as far back as the date of these charters, always held their office by the appointment of the Fraternity itself.—Least any of Mr. Sinclair's posterity, however, might after his resignation, lay claim to the office of Grand Master, upon the pretence that the office was bequeathed to them by the grant of James II. to the Earl of Caithness and his heirs; he renounces not only the right to the office which he derived from the brethren, but any right also, which as a descendant of the Earl of Caithness, he might claim from the grants of the Scottish monarchs.

Notwithstanding those civil commotions which disturbed Britain in the seventeenth century, Freemasonry flourished in Scotland, under the auspices of the Sinclairs of Roslin. No particular event, however, which is worthy of notice, occurred during that time, or even during the remainder of the century. The annual assemblies of the fraternity, were still held at Kilwinning, and many charters and constitutions were granted by the lodge of that village, for the erection of lodges in different parts of the kingdom.

In the year 1736, William St Clair, Esq. of Roslin who was then Grand Master of Scotland, was under the necessity of disposing his estate, and as he had no son of his own, he was anxious that the office of Grand-Master should not be vacant at his death. Having, therefore, assembled the Edinburgh and neighboring lodges, he represented the utility that would accrue to the order, by having a gentleman or nobleman of their own choice, as Grand Master of Masonry in Scotland; and, at the same time, intimated his intention to resign into the hands of the brethren, every title to that office which he at present possessed, or which his successors might claim from the grants of the Scottish Kings, and the kindness of the fraternity. In consequence of this circular letters were despatched to all the lodges inviting them to appear, either by themselves or proxies, on next St. Andrew's day, to concur and assist in the election of a Grand Master. When that day arrived, about thirty-two lodges appeared by themselves, or proxies, and, after receiving the deed of resignation from William Sinclair, Esq. proceeded to the election of another Grand Master, when, on account of the zeal which William Sinclair, Esq. of Roslin had always shown for the honor and prosperity of the order, he was unanimously elected to that office and proclaimed Grand Master of all Scotland. Thus was the Grand Lodge of Scotland instituted.

We have already brought down the history of masonry in England to the end, nearly, of the fifteenth century. During the whole of the sixteenth and the beginning of the seventeenth century, no events occurred which can be inserted in a general history of the order. The lodges continued to meet but seem neither to have attracted the notice, nor to have excited the displeasure of the Legislature.

During the civil wars, however, between the King and the Parliament, the fraternity appears to have been better known; and many were initiated into its mysteries, who were equally distinguished by their literary talents, and their rank in life, Elias Ashmole informs us, that he and Colonel Mainwaring were admitted in to the order at Warrington in October 1646(d). This gentleman was the celebrated antiquarian who founded the Ashmolean museum at Oxford. His attachment to the fraternity is evident from his diligent enquiries into its origin and history, and his long and frequent attendance upon its meetings(e). Charles II. too, was a member of the fraternity, and frequently honored the lodges with his presence(f). From this fact, chiefly, Dr Robinson asserts, that Freemasonry was employed by the royalists for promoting the cause of their sovereign, and that the ritual of the master's degree seems to have been formed, or twisted from its original institution, in order to sound the political principles of the candidate(g). The strained and fanciful analogy by which this opinion is supported is perhaps one of the most striking instances that could be adduced to show, to what pureile arguments the most learned will resort, when engaged in a bad cause. But though Dr. Robinson maintains, that all who witnessed the ceremonies of the master's degree during the civil wars could not fail to show, by their countenances, to what party they belonged, yet he observes, in another part of his work, that the symbols of masonry seemed to be equally susceptible of every interpretation, and that none of these entitled to any decided preference. For such inconsistencies as these we leave our readers to account.

An opinion of an opposite, though equally extravagant nature, has been maintained by Privari, and the author of "Freemasonry Examined." These writers assert, that Freemasonry originated in the time of the English Commonwealth; that Oliver Cromwell was its inventor; that the level was the symbol of republican equality; and that the other signs and ceremonies were merely arbitrary, and formed for concealing their political designs. It would be ridiculous to enter into a serious refutation of such opinions as these, which are founded on the most unpardonable ignorance.—That Freemasonry existed before the time of Cromwell is as capable of demonstration, as that Cromwell himself ever existed. It is really entertaining to observe what inconsistency in opposite opinions are formed upon the same subject. According to one writer, Freemasonry was invented and employed by the adherents of the King; according to another, it was devised by the friends of Parliament. In the opinion of some, it originated among the Jesuits, who used it for the promotion of their spiritual tyranny and superstition; while others maintain, that it arose among a number of unprincipled sceptics, who employed it for destroying the spiritual tyranny and superstition of the Jesuits!

THE REPOSITORY.

THE POPE.

The Pope is elected by the College of Cardinals, being seventy-two in number, including the six suburban Bishops, whose principal and most honourable privilege is that of electing the Pope, and it is easy to conceive that their dignity and importance increased with that of the Roman See itself; and that they share alike its temporal and its spiritual pre-eminence. As the Cardinals are the counsellors, so they are the officers of the Pontiff, and are thus entrusted with the management of the Church at large, and of the Roman State in particular. The grand assembly of the Cardinals is called the Consistory; where the Pontiff presides in person. Here they appear in all the splendor of the purple, and form a most majestic Senate. Here, therefore, public communications are announced, foreign Ambassadors received, Cardinals created, formal compliments made and answered; in short, all the exterior splendour of Sovereignty is displayed. But the principal prerogative of a Cardinal is exercised in the Conclave, so called because the members of the sacred college are then confined within the precincts of the great halls of the Vatican Palace; where they remain immured, till they agree in the election of a Pontiff. As soon as the holy father has expired, the Cardinal Chamberlain, in a purple dress, presents himself at the door of his chamber, and knocks three times with a golden hammer, calling each time the Pope by his Christian, family, and papal names. After a short time he says, in the presence of the Clerks of the Chamber and his apostolical votaries, who take account of that ceremony, "He is then dead." The fisherman's ring is then brought to the Cardinal, who breaks it with the same hammer. He then takes possession of the Vatican, in the name of the Apostolical Chamber. After having established his authority in that palace, he sends guards to take possession of the gates of the city, and of the Castle of St. Angelo; and when he has provided for the safety of Rome, he quits the Vatican in a carriage, preceded by a Captain of the Pope's guard, and having by his side the Swiss who generally accompany his Holiness. When this march begins the great bell of the Capitol is tolled, and as it only tolls on this occasion, announces to the whole city the death of the Sovereign Pontiff. The body, having been embalmed, is clad in its pontifical dress, and, with the mitre on its head, lies in state during three days on a bed of parade. It is next carried with great pomp to the Church of St. Peter, where it remains nine days exposed to public view; after which the burial takes place. The next day the Cardinals assemble in the same Cathedral, where the oldest of them celebrates the Mass of the Holy Ghost for the election of a new Pope. Another Prelate, in a Latin oration, exhorts the Cardinals to choose an individual worthy of so eminent a station; after which they all march in procession behind the Papal cross, the musicians singing the hymn Veni Creator! to the Hall of the Conclave, which occupies a large portion of the Vatican. The large rooms are divided by temporary partitions into what are called cells, which are subdivided again into little rooms and closets. Every Cardinal has his own, for him and his assistants, and it is only large enough to hold a bed, five or six chairs, and a table. The hour of holding the Conclave being come, a bell is rung to cause the Ambassadors, Princes, Prelates, and other persons of distinction who may be present, to retire. When they are all gone out, the doors and windows are walled up, with the exception of one, which throws but a dim light upon the Conclave. The only communication with the exterior is by the means of towers, in the same shape as those used in convents of nuns. One door is also kept for the removal of any Cardinal who may be ill, but who loses the right of giving an active vote if he retires. The mode of election now in use is by a secret ballot. Two chaises stand on a long table in the Chapel of Sixtus, into which the Cardinals deposit their bulletins, containing the name of the individual for whom they vote. One of the Scrutators reads it aloud, while two others mark the number of votes for each individual, by the side of his name, on the large tablet where all those of the Cardinals are inscribed. Whoever obtains two-thirds of the votes, present is canonically elected. His name is immediately proclaimed aloud, and the Cardinals sitting on his right and left rise and quit their places. His consent is asked, and, when it is given, the Cardinals, beginning by the oldest, perform the first adoration; that is to say, kiss his foot, and then his hand. The first Cardinal Deacon now announces the election to the people, and the artillery of the Castle of St. Angelo and the bells of the city spread the news afar. The people are then allowed to break into the Conclave, and to carry off all they can.

No person is eligible to the Papacy under 55 years of age, or that is not an Italian by birth, having already obtained a place in the College of Cardinals, or who is a Prince by birth, or allied to a reigning house, lest such a Pope should dismember the patrimony of St. Peter, or abandon that neutrality which a common father should observe towards all Christian Princes; or, finally, should treat the Cardinals with too much hauteur: thirdly, no one promoted to the degree of Cardinal at the nomination of some Crown, especially that of France or Spain, or being a natural-born subject of either of those Powers, lest gratitude or national attachment should render him too devoted to the interest of one or the other, is eligible. Even youth, and a good complexion and figure, are considered as obstacles. But all these maxims and rules vary and change according to the inconstant and precarious impulse of policy and faction. Hence it often happens that, in the numerous College of Cardinals, a very small number are permitted, upon a vacancy, to aspire to the Papacy, the greatest part being generally prevented by their birth, their character, their circumstances, and by the force of political intrigues, from flattering themselves with the pleasing hope of ascending the towering summit of ecclesiastical power and dominion.

THE GATHERER.

THE ROYAL HOUSE OF STUART.

By reverting to the history of England, it will be seen that a singular fatality appeared to follow in the train of the royal line of Stuarts. History does not record a race that were so steadily unfortunate. Their calamities continued with unabating succession during three hundred and ninety years.

Robert III. broke his heart, because his oldest son Robert, was starved to death, and his youngest, James was made a captive. James I. after having beheaded three of his nearest kindred, was assassinated by his own uncle who was tortured to death for it. James II. was slain by the bursting of a cannon. James III. when flying from the field of battle, was thrown from his horse and murdered in a cottage, into which he had been taken for assistance. James IV. fell in Flodden field. James V. died of grief for the wilful ruin of his army at Solway Frith. Henry Stuart—Lord Darnley—was assassinated and blown up in his castle. Mary Stuart was beheaded in England. James I. and VI. died, not without suspicion of being poisoned by Lord Buckingham. Charles I. was beheaded at Whitehall. Charles II. was exiled for many years. James II. lost his crown and died, in banishment. Anne, after a reign which though glorious, was rendered unhappy by party disputes, died of a broken heart, occasioned by the quarrels of her favourite servants. The posterity of James II. died wretched wanderers in foreign lands.—Scotch Paper

CAUSE OF THE DEATH-WATCH.

The influence of superstition and ignorance is astonishingly great. As one proof, what dismay and uneasiness has not the watchlike ticking of the grub often excited among all description of persons? and indeed, as a writer in a certain periodical remarks, "that this insect, almost invisible, should, in regularity of time and distinctness of sound, imitate a machine which has employed so many hands in its construction, and composed of wheels and springs, with the utmost ingenuity, is above all ordinary comprehension. It was only within a few years past that I considered these visitors as solitary and nightly disturbers, since which I have accidentally discovered that this is by no means the case. Having occasion to stretch a piece of silk paper, moistened with glue water, on a square frame, I was frequently surprised, at different hours of the day, by a noise similar to what we are accustomed to hear in a watchmaker's window full of watches, and distinctly audible at five or six yards distance. I soon found that my frame was occupied as a drum by numbers of these little grey mites, and was thus enabled to identify the performers, and witness the harmlessness of their music; and I think it is more than probable that, could these little creatures oftener meet with a proper tympanum, we should much more frequently hear them at certain seasons, when their little drumming, which no doubt concerns their own social community, constantly heard by their own companions, though inaudible to us."

MANKIND IN THE 15TH CENTURY.

They had neither looked into heaven nor earth, neither into the sea nor land, as has been done since. They had philosophy without experiment, mathematics without instrument, geometry without demonstration.

They made war without powder, shot, cannon or mortars; nay the mob made their bonfires without squibs or crackers. They went to sea without compass, and sailed without the needle. They viewed the stars without a telescope, and measured altitudes without barometers. Learning had no printing-press, writing no paper, and paper no ink. The lover was forced to send his mistress a deal board, for a love letter, and a billet-doux might be of the size of an ordinary trencher.—They were clothed without manufactures, and the richest robes were the skins of the most formidable monsters. They carried on trade without books, and correspondence without posts; their merchants kept no accounts, their shop-keepers no cash-book; they had surgery without anatomy, and physicians without materia medica; they gave emetics without ipecacouana, and cured agues without bark.

WHAT IS MAN.

Ninety years hence not a single man or woman now twenty years of age will be alive. Ninety years! alas! how many of the lively actors at present on the stage of life, will make their exit long ere ninety years shall roll away! And be we sure of ninety years, what are they? "A tale that is told!" a dream, an empty sound that passeth on the wings of the wind away, and is forgotten. Years shorten as men advance in age, like the degrees in longitude, man's life declines as he travels towards the frozen pole, until it dwindles to a point and vanishes forever. Is it possible that life is of so short duration? Will ninety years erase all the golden names over the door in town and country, and substitute others in their stead? Will all the now blooming beauties fade, and disappear, all the pride and passion, the love, hope and joy pass away, in ninety years, and be forgotten? "Ninety years!" (says Death,) "do you think I shall wait ninety years? Behold! to-day, and to-morrow, and every one is mine. When ninety years are past, this generation will have mingled with the dust, and be remembered not."

ORIGINAL ANECDOTE.

The husband was continually finding fault with his wife for her want of neatness—that his house was not always kept like a bandbox, nor his tables polished like mirrors. This was one day very warmly expressed and comparisons were instituted between her management and that of a neighboring quakeress, whom the husband had seen on that day. The wife promised compliance with his wishes; and on the husband's leaving the house, she put every thing in the most exact and neat order; not an odious particle of dust being suffered to appear. The husband returned rather later than usual, with a friend whom he had invited to dine with him. To his surprise he found the front door of his house locked—he knocked loudly, and with great vehemence demanded immediate admittance, when an upper window was raised and out popped the head of his beloved spouse.—"Thou cannot come in at the front door—these must go round by the gate to the kitchen. The husband sheepishly complied, and ever after suffered the wife to manage her household affairs as she saw fit.

MATRIMONY.

The whole secret of choosing well in matrimony may be taught in three words—explore the character. A violent love-fit is always the result of ignorance; for there is not a daughter of Eve that has merit enough to justify romantic love, though thousands and thousands may reasonable inspire gentle esteem, which is infinitely better. A woman-worshipper and a woman, hater both derive their mistakes from ignorance of the female world; for, if the characters of woman were thoroughly understood: they would be found too good to be hated, and yet not good enough to be idolized.

A PROOF OF FILIAL AFFECTION.

A man swearing the peace against three of his sons, thus concluded his affidavit:—"and this deponent further saith, that the only one of his children who showed him any real filial affection was his youngest son Larry, for he never struck him when he was down."

REPORTERS AND REPORTING.

Although the duties of reporters are both important and arduous, it is only of late years that a disposition has been shown to afford them facilities for the discharge of their. Formerly they had no means of entering the gallery of the Commons beyond those enjoyed by the public generally; and on days when an interesting debate was expected they were frequently obliged to take their places on the stairs early in the forenoon, and, after standing there for many hours, to depend upon their chance of getting in, by battling their way in the crowd when the door opened. The first arrangements for the express purpose of accommodating the reporters were made a few years before the death of Mr. Pitt. Previously to that time note books had been very generally introduced; but in the Commons from the crowded state of the gallery, they were comparatively of small use. It happened one night, when the premier was to make a leading speech, that the gallery was more than usually thronged, and neither by force nor entreaty could the reporters procure even tolerable accommodations. They took counsel together, and the result was a secession.—Next morning, instead of the rounded periods of the minister, there appeared nothing but one dire blank, accompanied by a strong comment on the grievances in which it had been originated. The almost immediate result was the appropriation, under the direction of Mr. Speaker Abbot, of the uppermost bench of the gallery to the reporters' exclusive use, with a door in the centre, by which they alone had a right to enter.—Soon after, a small room at the end of the gallery passage, which bore on its glass panels the "Reporters' Room," notwithstanding the standing order and its penalties, were added for the convenience of the gentleman previous to taking their places in the gallery and during the division. The Lords followed the Commons in their accommodation of the press, at the due distance which befitted their dignity. It was not until about twenty years ago that a note-book was permitted to make its appearance at the bar of the Upper House. If a young or forward reporter ventured to display the implements of his trade to the eyes of their lordships, they were immediately struck from his hand by one or other of the messengers. The first person who ventured to rest his book on their lordships' bar is said to have been Mr. Windyer, who now is, or lately was, a justice of the peace, in Sydney, New South Wales. His example was followed, and only two sessions after, the name of Lord Eldon, while his lordship was proceeding to the bar to receive a deputation of the Lower House, having accidentally caused Mr. Windyer to drop his book within the bar, the noble earl checked his onward step, picked up the fragments of the passing debate, and presented them, with an engaging smile, to their collector. In the session of 1828-9, when, from the intense interest to which the Catholic question gave rise, the press found it difficult to maintain their station, a portion of the space below the bar was railed off for them; and a season or two after, when a strangers' gallery was added to the Lords, a seat was set apart for their use. In the present temporary erection, the privilege of an exclusive place for the press is provided in both Houses; in the Commons behind the Speaker's chair.—Wade's British History.

Eccentricity.—Eccentricity is sometimes found connected with genius, but it does not coalesce with true wisdom. Hence men of the first order of intellect have never betrayed it; and hence also men of secondary talents drop it as they grow wiser; and are satisfied to found their consequence on real and solid excellency, not on peculiarity and extravagance. They are content to awaken regard and obtain applause by the rectitude and gracefulness of their doing, rather than to make passengers stare and laugh by leaping over the wall or tumbling along the road. True greatness is serious, trifling is beneath its dignity. We are more indebted to the regular, sober, constant course of the sun, than to the glare of the comet: the one, indeed, occupies our papers, but the other enriches our fields and gardens; we gaze at the strangeness of the one, but we live on the influence of the other.—Rev. H. Jay.

Bassompierre. It was customary with Marshal Bassompierre, when any of his soldiers were brought before him for heinous offences, to say to them, "brother, you or I will certainly be hung;" which was a sufficient annunciation of their fate. A spy who was discovered in his camp, was addressed in this language; and next day, as the wretch was about to be led to the gallows, he pressed earnestly to speak with the marshal, alleging that he had somewhat of importance to communicate. The marshal being made acquainted with his request, said in his rough manner, "It is always the way of these rascals; they pretend some frivolous story, merely to reprove themselves for a few moments; however, bring the dog hither." Being introduced, the marshal asked him what he had to say. "Why, my Lord," said the culprit, "when I first had the honor of your conversation, you were pleased to say, that either you or I should be hung; now I am come to know whether it is your pleasure to be so; because, if you want, I must, that's all." The marshal was so pleased with the fellow's humor that he ordered him to be released.—Percy.

TIME TO GO HOME.—Paniding in his life of Washington, gives the following little anecdote of the mother of this great man:

"She was once present and occupied the seat of honor, at a ball given to Washington at Fredericksburg, while in the full measure of his well earned glory, and when 9 o'clock came said to him with perfect simplicity, 'Come, George, it is time to go home.' It will, perhaps, be well if many, to day, would remember when it is 'time to go home.'"

Gen. Washington's Opinion of profane swearing, Dedicated to all Officers whether Military or Civil.—

Extract from the Orderly Book of the army under command of Washington, dated at Head Quarters, in the city of New York, August 3, 1776.

"The General is sorry to be informed, that the foolish and wicked practice of profane cursing and swearing, a vice heretofore little known in an American army, is growing into a fashion;—he hopes the officers will, by example as well as influence, endeavor to check it, and that both they and the men will reflect that we can have little hope of the blessing of Heaven on our arms, if we insult it by impiety and folly; added to this, it is a vice so mean and low, without any temptation, that every man of sense and character detests and despises it."

MARRIAGE.

Look at the great mass of marriages which takes place over the whole world; what poor, contemptible, common place affairs they are! A few soft looks, a walk, a dance, a squeeze of the hand, a popping of the question, a purchasing of a certain number of yards of white satin, a ring, clergyman, a stage or two in a hired carriage, a night in a country inn, and the whole matter is over. For five or six weeks two sheepish looking persons are seen dangling about on each other's arm, looking at waterfalls, or making morning calls and guzzling wine and cake; then every thing falls into the most monotonous routine. The wife sits on one side of the hearth, the husband at the other, and little pleasures, little cares, and little children, gradually gather round them. This is what ninety-nine out of a hundred find to be the delights of love and matrimony.

A letter received in this city last evening from Jackson, in this State, advises that a gentleman had just arrived at that place direct from Texas, with the news that General Houston had been shot, in a personal rencontre, by the Speaker of the Texas House of Representatives—no hope entertained of his recovery. Houston was a member from St Augustine County.

FACTORY BURNED.—On Friday morning 17th between the hours of 5 and 6 o'clock, the Sattinet Factory situated in the village of Pascoag, Burellville; R. I., was discovered to be on fire. The building and machinery, and the principal part of the stock were entirely destroyed. The building and machinery were owned by Messrs. O. & E. Eddy, who were insured at the Etna office, in Hartford, Conn. for $5000. Probable loss about $8000. Mr. Dudley, (the occupant) has no insurance, loss $1500.

THE HERETIC.

The Lady Aurelia's heart was breaking, but she wept not. She had told the Count she loved him not, still her actions belied her words. Her hand pillowed her brow, and she sat gazing on vacancy—time wore away, and she arose and was about leaving the room—when her foot struck something as she passed the place where the Count had been seated. Stooping down, she found a small book which she had often seen in his possession, but she had never known the title, being satisfied when he told her it was a precious gift from his mother on her death-bed, and he valued it for her sake.

The "noon of night" was approaching, but still the Lady Aurelia sat poring over a small volume. It was a copy of the Holy Scriptures. The duty of man so simply, yet beautifully told in the expressive sermon which Christ delivered on the Mount of Olives, had arrested her attention. A single lamp burned dimly by her side—slowly it diminishes, but she heeds it not; her lips half-parted, and her eyes intently fixed on the book, as though it was one deeply interesting. As the lamp wanes, she unconsciously draws closer to it, but lifts not her head—suddenly it expires, and darkness shrouds the chamber. She starts—places her hand upon her brow. "Can this be the book?" thought she "that I have been to taught to believe is such a sin to read? What religion would be corrupted by it? I surely cannot be doing wrong by obeying these precepts; here it speaks not of confessions to priests, and prayer to the Virgin, who was but a woman—but of deep heart-felt prayer and confession before the Maker of all." She arose, and bent her knees—no cross was pressed to her lips—no rosary told—but her hands were clasped, and her words were not those that had been oft repeated, but from the heart they came.

Many and deep were the struggles ere she could renounce the religion in which she had been nurtured; but they passed away, and a new light broke upon her as she prayed. The morning sun found her still kneeling. When she arose, a sweet calm filled her breast, and she felt happy; she thought not of the Count—but a reconciled Saviour stood before her.

The next evening the sisters were seated in a beautiful little arbor formed by jasmine and honeysuckles entwined together. Corolie had been for some time busily employed in wreathing a garland of white Provence huds, that she heeded not the employment of Aurelia, until wearied of her graceful task she languidly raised her dark eyes to her sister's face.

"Why Aurelia," exclaimed she, "what book is that you are so intently reading?" "ah I see! where did you find it? I have been rummaging in the library two hours for that book, and at last gave it up as a hopeless search."

"This book" dear sister inquired Aurelia with eagerness, while a joyful smile played around her placid lips "have you really been searching for this book—what do you think is the name of it?"

"Why do you look so earnestly upon me," said Corolie, "is there any thing so very strange in my wishing to find the Arabian Nights Entertainments—for that is the book you are reading, is it not?"

"No" said Aurelia and the bright flush of joy which had irradiated her face for a moment, was succeeded by a look of saddened disappointment, as she slowly raised the volume, holding the title page to her sister's face—one glance sufficed—Corolie shrieked, as she saw upon it in large characters, the "Holy Bible."

"O! Aurelia, where did you get that book" she exclaimed. "Do you not know the fearful consequences of reading it," and the young girl's lips were white as her brow as she spoke. "What will our father say—what will the Count—"

"Hush, Corolie, you need not speak of him."

"Well dear sister," continued the trembling girl, if you'll not allow me to speak of him, think of our father, our only parent; think how he would rend those grey locks with anguish too deep for utterance, to see his darling child led to the stake, condemned to die a heretic. Dearest sister, "and the beautiful pleader fell on her knees with the excess of her emotion, give it to me, and let me burn it; or promise me you will never open it again."

"No, Corolie" answered Aurelia, striving to speak calmly. "I cannot promise you that, my conscience disapproves it, but dry those tears, and I'll promise one thing.—I will not open it again without my father's permission."

"Will you not, said Corolie," her beautiful eyes brightening as she spoke; "that is my own dear sister," and she wound her arms around Aurelia's neck, and imprinted a long kiss upon her cheek.

Corolie was satisfied with this, and well she might be, for she knew that when her father heard that Aurelia possessed a bible, he would forbid her ever reading it again, and her own inclinations were so entirely moulded to his will, that she had not a doubt but her sister would forget these sentiments, and all would yet be well. But Corolie had yet to learn the bold resolution of the heroic girl.

"Come Corolie," said Aurelia "tis time—high time we were returning, the sun has gone behind the distant hills and the ground is wet with dew."

And she placed her arm around her sister's waist, and thus they entered their father's splendid mansion.

"Good night sister," said Corolie as they parted for their respective chambers, "now remember your promise dearest—to-morrow morning."

"Yes" returned Aurelia and as the sister's kiss was given and a low good night repeated, Corolie marked the resolute expression of her face, but said nothing, thinking it was called there by the thought of the morrow's confession.

Words cannot portray the feelings of the Count when he left the lady Aurelia. All night he paced his chamber in an agony of thought beyond description. The morning dawned, but brought with it no consolation. Twice he had attempted with pen and paper in hand to bid farewell to the Count, and assign other reasons than the true one for leaving—but the pen dropped from his trembling fingers.—He could not dissemble—still he dared not tell the truth. Now he would determine to leave without bidding an adieu—but his name would be branded with cowardice. The day wore away, and the next night in gloomy reflections. At length he determined to gain an interview with the Lady Aurelia if possible—confess his deceit to the Count, and then leave them forever. No sooner was his determination taken than a servant entered and handed him a note. Instantly recognizing the hand of the Lady Aurelia he tore open the seal and read.—

Dearest Fredrico,

The little volume you accidentally dropped in the balcony has effected a great change in me. I have seen the errors of my faith and now kneel to the same altar with yourself. I have acknowledged it to my father who treated it at first as a mere freak of fancy and demanded the bible. On my refusal he became enraged—swore vengeance against you as the cause of my retaining it, and I have heard unknown to him that he is now preparing to send me to a convent. Sooner would I die—but my resolve is taken hasten and claim your own.

AURELIA.

Joy for the conversion of the Lady Aurelia, and indignation at the measures of her father, filled his breast and he sat for some time as one palsied. He then hastily arose, threw on his mantle, and mounting his fleet horse proceeded to the castle. All there was silent as the grave. A clock from a neighboring tower told the hour of midnight. With one bound he cleared the wall in the rear of the building, and cautiously entered a path in the garden. Suddenly he stopped—drew from his bosom the billet and by the light of the moon read it again. "She has told me not where to find her" he murmured, and I dare not enter the castle.—Something rustled among the bushes—he turned and clasped again to his heart the Lady Aurelia.

"We shall never again be separated by a cruel father. I shall return to Poland; but say, dearest," said he, smoothing back the locks that shaded her brow, "will I return alone."

She heeded not the latter part of his sentence, but said, while tears rolled down her cheeks.—

Call him not cruel, Fredrico, he is my father, and I have left him without even bidding him farewell; and dear Sister Corolie, I left her sleeping. As I entered her chamber—I kissed her cheek, and murmured a prayer over her young head; her lips moved and I heard her say, "father she will give you the book, send her not away—I could bear it no longer, but flew down the stair-case, not daring to trust a look behind, lest I should be tempted to remain."

"But," said Fredrico, "will you drag out a weary existence in a convent for the sake of remaining a few days at home, or will you renounce the religion which has brought with it the anger of a father, but at the same time an approving conscience."

"I cannot, I will not do either," cried she, "farewell still beloved though erring father—farewell dear sister, I leave thee perhaps forever." She turned, and gave one long lingering look at the castle, wherein she had spent many a happy hour; then took a massive key from beneath the folds of her dress, and handed it to the Count, whowith it unlocked the gate of the garden. His steed stood pawing the ground, as though impatient for action. The lady had almost fainted from the excess of her emotions. Peloski wound a nervous arm around her waist and sprung upon the saddle; the graceful steed seemed scarcely to touch the ground, so rapid was his course.

Our tale has already reached its intended limits—and suffice it to say, they crossed the gulf of Venice in safety and in Austria were united by a Protestant minister, and then proceeded to Poland.

The feelings of the Count Flodoardo, when he knew of the flight of the lovers, may better be imagined than described; yet his anger was not unmixed with reproach against himself.

"Why did I not," said he, the feelings of a father rising in his breast, "endeavor by kind entreaties to draw her gently to the path of duty, instead of railing out against the Count as the instigator of it;" then as though the thought of the Count fired him, clenching his hands—his brow darkening, "but he was a base designing villain, coming to me with his bland smile, while in his heart was black deceit; decoying my darling daughter—my first born—the image of her departed mother;" and the old man torn by conflicting emotions, buried his face in his hands, and wept like a child. At this moment Corolie entered—she too had heard the sad news, and her cheeks through which the warm blood had scarcely ever checked its flow, were now blanched, and her eyes had lost their wonted brilliancy with weeping; but when she saw the big tears roll down the cheeks of her aged father, she forgot her own grief, in sympathy for him.

The Count Flodoardo made no attempt to find out the retreat of his daughter and her lover. "It is useless," said he, to pursue them, for they have gone a long distance ere this, and doubtless the marriage vows have been taken: so that if we should overtake them and bring her back, she would perhaps pine away and die. "No, no, I will not molest them. But O! she is a Protestant—I can bear all but that."

Three years rolled by, and nothing was heard of the lovers. The Count had forbidden the name of Aurelia to be mentioned in his presence; endeavoring if it were possible to drive from his mind the painful truth that he had a daughter who had embraced the Protestant religion.

Corolie for the first few months was sad, but it gradually wore off, and her light buoyant spirits, as it were, bounded back almost to their former gaiety. The memory of Aurelia would sometimes come to her as a dream, which had commenced brightly but had suddenly changed and had ended with darkened shadows.

It was now about the year 1796 General Bonaparte, at the head of the republican troops of France, entered Italy. The Italian Imperialists flew to arms, but their resistance was of no avail. Of Bonaparte, as of the English Marlborough, it may be said that he chained victory to his chariot wheels.

The Count Flodoardo was too old to take any part in the war, and not wishing to remain where all was confusion and bloodshed proposed to his daughter a travelling tour through some of the countries of Europe. Joyfully did Corolie hear of this proposition, and prepared to accompany her father.

In the year 1794, Poland overwhelmed by a foreign despotism, was blotted out from the numbers of European kingdoms, and its territories were divided between Prussia, Austria and Russia, the three powers that had conspired and effected her ruin.

Peloski, had at the first of the conflict, moved his Countess to a beautiful country seat some miles from Warsaw, and then was obliged to leave her to aid in fighting the battles of his country. She was lonely, and mourned his absence, but he returned often to cheer her solitude.

When Poland was dismembered, the spirits of her noble, but unfortunate countrymen, were crushed.—Fredrico, and his brother Gustavus, returned to the seat of the Countess and there in rural retirement endeavored to forget his country's wrongs.

"Aurelia," said Gustavus one day entering the room where she was seated, I presume you have heard of the Italian who with his daughter was travelling thro' this part of the country."

The lady almost started from her seat, in her eagerness as she said:

An Italian did you say—no I had not—pray what of him?"

He was taken ill some months ago, and suddenly died, leaving his daughter alone, with the exception of a few servants, in a foreign land. She is very young—only eighteen—and the most beautiful creature that eyes ever rested upon. She has taken up her residence within a few miles of us. Her father's death appears to have affected her sadly; for her countenance, which before, had all the joyful brightness of a Hebe, has sadly changed, and she sobs and weeps hour after hour in a little summer house, which she fancies resembles one that she loved in her native land."

"Just the age of my sweet sister, if she be living" said the Countess, musingly. "Did you say eighteen and beautiful, would that I could see her. Think you not that my being a country-woman of hers would be sufficient apology for obtruding upon her hours of sorrow."

"I am sure of it sister," answered Gustavus; "she loves every thing Italian, even the flowers in her garden which bloom in Italy, are regarded by her with interest."

"Why then does she not return to her native country," asked the lady.

"She would rather remain than travel, so far without a protector," answered Gustavus.

"Poor soul! I would love her for the sake of my sweet sister."

"And you would love her for her own sake could you see her, said the youth."

"Doubtless I should; but Gustavus; you take quite an interest in the young stranger; have you seen her, or where did you obtain your information respecting her."

"Yes, Aurelia, I have seen her. The first time, was before her father died, when she was all life and gaiety. Last summer I attended a masquerade.—She was there leaning upon the arm of her parent, unmasked. It is needless to equivocate. I love her; our hearts beat in unison—she has promised to be mine—to-morrow I bring her home as a bride."

"But," said the Lady, I understand she is in such grief at the loss of her father. Will she consent to be married so soon after his death."

"You forget Aurelia, that she has no protector—her father has been dead these ten months, and during that time she has lived alone. Surely, under such circumstances, there can be no impropriety, for no pomp shall attend the nuptial ceremony."

The next evening the Count and Countess were sitting together, waiting anxiously for the return of Gustavus with his bride, when a train of carriages were seen approaching. They both went out to welcome the new comers. The foremost carriage stopped and the bride and bridegroom descended and walked up the avenue. Gustavus with an air of one who possessed a priceless gem, and was proud of displaying it lifted the long veil that fell to the feet of the lady who raised her eyes and Corolie fell in the arms of her sister.

ELORA.

MISCELLANY.

PRIDE MORTIFIED.

At a ball given in Pyrmont, a celebrated watering-place in Germany, the tutor of a young count, a Göttingen student, requested a young lady to dance with him. Just as the dance was about to commence, the lady inquired of him, "With whom have I the honour of dancing?" "I am the tutor of Count Von Z—," replied her partner. "And a commoner, I presume," she rejoined; to which he answered in the affirmative. "Oh, then," continued the lady, as she withdrew her hand from that of the tutor, "I beg you will excuse me, for mamma has forbidden me to dance with a commoner." This rebuff completely threw the modest preceptor out of countenance, for on the continent to be so deserted on the eve of a dance, is to lose caste for the rest of the night, if not longer. It is supposed to indicate the existence of some moral taint discovered by the person who quits the side of another, and which is exaggerated into something heinous by the company, particularly if they are utterly ignorant of what it is. The young man quitted the room, and sought the open air to breathe more freely and collect himself. His pupil followed him, and learned the cause of his distress.—"You shall soon have ample satisfaction for this mortification," said the generous count, and hastened back to the ball room, followed by his tutor. The moment was propitious. Preparations were going forwards for another waltz: the young count requested the retractor of his tutor to be his partner in the dance, and she eagerly accepted the proposal, no doubt greatly rejoicing at the immense stride which she had taken from ranking with the humble tutor, to pairing off with the wealthy noble. Just before the dance begun, he addressed to her the question which she herself had put, "With whom have I the honour of dancing?" "With Lady Von B—," she replied. "Oh, I beg your pardon," said the count, "but papa has forbidden me to dance with any but countesses," and instantly quitted her side. He had the satisfaction of hearing that his conduct was applauded by every sensible person in the room. Few will deny that it was a well, merited punishment.

HORBERG, THE CELEBRATED SWEDISH ARTIST.

Horberg was the son of a private soldier. At nine years of age he gained his living by tending sheep, but even at that age his taste for painting manifested itself in a remarkable manner. The vignettes which he had seen in old catechisms and almanacs were his earliest models. He imitated them from memory on the bark of birch trees. He also carved in wood all kinds of little figures, and ornamented his father's cottage with them. The only colours he possessed were ochre, chalk, and water, in which he steeped various earthen. By degrees, however, he improved these coarse materials, so as to form from them a tolerable set of crayons. If, fortunately, he obtained a sheet of paper, he attempted to colour his designs with the juice of wild plants. In the forest and in the fields, he sketched with charcoal on the trunks of green trees. At fourteen, he endeavored to obtain employment with a painter at Wexio, but his parents required his assistance, he was obliged to return, and resume the crook. The care of his flock did not prevent him from re-engaging in his old amusements, but one day, being too far advanced in the woods, a wolf devoured some of his sheep and not daring to re-appear before his master, he fled. After numerous obstacles, in 1763, he became the pupil of a painter of Gottenburg. Five years afterwards he began to be regularly occupied, married, and lived very comfortably. It was not until 1783 that he conceived the worthy design, in the execution of which he was assisted by some warm friends, of improving himself in his art at the Royal Academy at Stockholm. There, for the first time, he studied the great masters, and obtained several medals for his performances. In the exhibitions, his pictures were preferred to all others; his reputation rapidly increased, and orders poured upon him too thickly for execution. In 1790, he went and established himself at Olstrop, where he finished most of his church pictures. In 1797, he was elected a member of the Academy, and appointed painter to the King. He died in 1816, aged 70, leaving behind him a great many pictures, chiefly of scriptural subjects, and innumerable designs. In private life, Horberg was the best of men. He was distinguished by good humour and sociability.

A LUDICROUS SCENE.

Lately occurred at the theatre in a neighbouring town. A countryman who had determined to indulge his curiosity, made "his first appearance" to witness a performance, which chanced to be the play of the Iron Chest. After the usual wonderings and exclamations of astonishment at the novelty of the scene, his amazement ultimately subsided so as to allow his comprehension of the first two or three scenes of the play. As the performance proceeded, however, it is known to most of our dramatic readers that Orson and the robbers quarrel about a division of booty. In the beginning of this scene, the honest, artless, and ingenuous countryman, betrayed several strong symptoms of agitation and uneasiness, which apparently gradually gained ground upon him, until he could not control his awkward sensations any longer, when he suddenly rose and addressing the actors, to the astonishment of the whole house, burst forth into the following exclamation:—"I'll tell ye what, if you are agoing to quarrel among yourselves, give me my money again, and I'll go home, for you don't think I am going to be made a fool of!" This extraordinary speech, as may naturally be supposed, caused general mirth, while the unconscious cause of resibility gazed about him, still further amazed, wondering "what they could see to laugh at."—Bos. Gaz.

A DEXTEROUS KNAVE.

A Florentine notary, who had little employment, be-thought himself of the following expedient to raise money. Having called on a young man whose father was lately dead, he asked him whether he had received payment of a certain sum which his father had lent to another person who had also died shortly before.—"The son told him that he had not found any such debt among his father's papers. "I drew the obligation with my own hands," said the notary, "and have it in possession; you have only to make me a reasonable allowance for it." "The young man purchased the forged deed, and cited the son of the alleged debtor. The defendant maintained, that it appeared by his father's books that he had never borrowed a farthing, and immediately called on him to tax the notary with a forgery. "Young man," said the notary, "you were not born when the sum was borrowed; but your father paid it back at the end of six months, and I am in possession of the discharge. You have nothing to do but to make me a reasonable allowance for it." The young man did so, and thus the notary cheated both plaintiff and defendant.—Lon. Paper.

TRUE POLITENESS.

Politeness is a just medium between formality and rudeness; it is, in fact, good nature regulated by quick discernment, which proportions itself to every situation and every character; it is a restraint laid by reason and benevolence on every irregularity of temper, of appetite and passion. It accommodates itself to the frantic laws of custom and fashion, as long as they are not inconsistent with the higher obligations of virtue and religion.

To give efficacy and grace to politeness, it must be accompanied by some degree of taste as well as delicacy; and although its foundation must be rooted in the heart, it is not perfect without a knowledge of the world.

In society it is the happy medium which blends the most discordant natures; it imposes silence on the inquisitive, and inclines the most reserved to furnish their share of the conversation; it represses the despicable but common ambition of being the most eminent character in the scene; it increases the general degree of being mutually agreeable; takes off the offensive edge of railery, and gives delicacy to wit; it preserves subordination, reconciles ease with propriety; like other valuable qualities, its value is best estimated when it is absent.

No greatness can awe it into servility, no intimacy can sink it into a coarse familiarity; to superiors, it is respectful freedom; to inferiors, unassuming good nature, to equals, every thing that is charming; anticipating and attending to all things, yet at the same time apparently disengaged and careless.

Such is true politeness, by people of wrong heads and unworthy hearts disgraced in its two extremes; and by the generality of mankind confined within the narrow bounds of mere good breeding, which is only one branch of it.

AMERICAN MASONIC REGISTER.

ALBANY, SATURDAY, JAN. 25, 1840.

THE GRAND CHAPTER of the State of New York, will convene at St. John's Hall, in this City, on the first Tuesday of February inst.

PHRENEOLOGY—MR. COMBE.—The lectures, by this gentleman, are probably the most popular of any that have for years been delivered in this city. His clear style, and unaffected manner, is fascinating in the extreme; and predicating, as he does, all his opinions in experience, he says nothing without carrying conviction with it. Before he finishes his course in Albany, we are not certain but that Phrenology will be thought as positive a science as mathematics. However, we could wish that the time allotted to each lecture, was an hour, instead of two: for, beside becoming tedious from its great length, a confusion is created in the minds of the audience, by his going over a large number of faculties in a short space of time. We hope the course may be repeated, and more at leisure. From the character of the audience he now has, we are certain a repetition would meet with entire success.

PAINTING.—Our suggestions, some time since, in relation to this delightful art, seem not to have been entirely thrown away. Within a few days we have been gratified by the sight of an admirable composed family group, belonging to Mr. Prentice of this city, and executed by F. Fink. This kind of composition possesses the double merit of preserving a family collection of likenesses, and to the gallery, an agreeable picture. In this picture, Mr. F., has evinced great skill in uniting the parts, a fine delicate perception of colors, beside having well sustained his former reputation for good drawing. We understand that several gentlemen of this city, have in contemplation the getting of similar groups, and we certainly think such a feeling alike creditable to the city and to the individuals who propose possessing them.

MUSEUM.—This is the only place of amusement now open in this city. The proprietor has effected an engagement with Miss Randolph, who is extraordinary in her line. An evening can be passed away very agreeably in the lecture room of this establishment.

THE CULTIVATOR.—We have received the first No. of this well conducted, and widely circulated Journal. It is published by Jesse Buel, & Co. proprietors, and edited by Willis Gaylord & Luther Tucker, Esqs. The Genesee Farmer, which was published by Mr. Tucker, in the western part of this State, has been united with the Cultivator. From the appearance of the present No. we have no doubt but that the Cultivator, will sustain the high reputation which it has obtained in the land, under the management of its late talented and lamented editor.

WILLIAM TURRELL, captain of the Schooner Improvement, was the name of the unfeeling wretch, who was in sight of the burning Lexington, and who refused to allow his crew to go to their aid, because he would lose a tide! He deserves the highest seat in the Temple of Infamy.

FIRE—The dwelling house of Mr. Nathan Rice, in Oakham, Mass was entirely consumed by fire on Thursday 16th. Not a single article of furniture was saved, and the family who were aroused by their neighbors, had barely time to escape. The night was very cold, the thermometer being several degrees below zero. Some of the inmates, without clothes and barefooted, were obliged to seek shelter at a neighbor's house, about a quarter of a mile distant.—Five hundred dollars insured—the loss is much greater.

The Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania at the annual meeting held on the 2d of December elected the following Grand Officers.

M. W. Samuel H. Perkins, G. M.
R. W. Joseph R. Chandler, D. G. M.
" Cornelius Stevenson, S. G. W.
" William Bayer, J. G. M.
" Robinson R. Moore, G. Treas.
" Michael Nisbet, G. Sec'y.

The New York Commercial Advertiser announces the death of Stephen Price, the distinguished Dramatic Manager who has been so long a Manager of London and New York Theatres. He died of quincy at the Astor House. Mr. P. was an elder brother of William M. Price.

Br. L. G. Hoffman—

As you were kind enough to request an account of our proceedings on the 27th of December, the anniversary of Holy St. John, I will now give it you in as few words as I can. The Lodge met at 5 o'clock P. M. at their lodge room at Br. Joseph Blackburn's and proceeded to the installation. W. M. Ambrose Forman then installed the following Brethren for the ensuing year.—

Joseph Blackburn, W. M.
Thomas Welland, S. W.
John M. Goring, J. W.
Aaron M. Smith, S. D.
William Smith, J. D.
Robt. France, Treas.
Benj. Lawton, Sec'y.
Stringer White, }
Wm. Turner, } Stewards.
John Hart, Tyler.

After the business of the Lodge was over the brethren and a number of Friends from Po'keepsie, Fishkill, and other Places, sat down to a Splendid Supper, provided in B. Blackburn's best style. After the cloth was drawn, a variety of appropriate Songs and Toasts, were given, amongst the rest I must particularly mention Burn's farewell which was given with great effect; nor was Burn's request forgot.

"The night when yearly ye assemble, all &c."

The weather was very bad, a dreadful snow storm raging all the night, which prevented a number of Brethren and Friends, from being present on the occasion. The evening was spent in such a manner as will long be remembered with pleasure by all those present.

I must not forget to mention your Masonic Register; and I feel proud to inform you that I believe it has been the cause of several applications for the Honors of Masonry. It has already done much to disabuse men's minds of the prejudices they had imbibed, and I shall feel as much pleasures in forwarding a new list of subscribers for it, as you will have in receiving them." [We shall certainly have no objection.]

INTELLIGENCE.

MAINE BOUNDARY—This question was brought before the Senate on the 17th inst., on a resolution introduced by Mr. Williams, calling for certain correspondence between our own Government and that of Great Britain. The resolution, with an amendment respecting the British troops now in possession of the disputed territory, was passed after debate. We have only room for the remarks of Mr. Buchanan and Mr. Davis, as we find them in the N. Y. Times.

Mr. Buchanan, who is chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, said he had no objection to the passage of the amendment if it was pressed. But he thought it implied some censure on the President; and he therefore would prefer that the mover would withdraw it. The President had already stated in his annual Message that he had done nothing; that no case had arisen which made it proper for him to use the means which had been entrusted to him: Every senator, he added, must know what answer the President would give. It could be nothing more than what he had already said.

With regard to the general question, Mr. Buchanan said he was apprehensive of having serious difficulties with Great Britain before this controversy is ended. He had, however, entire confidence in the energy and prudence of the President. The question, he added, was a crisis at the opening of the present Congress. The President had not thought it prudent to communicate all the circumstance of the case, and, for his part he would have been better pleased, if the President had been trusted with the entire conduct of the negotiation, without being called upon to produce papers at this stage of the business.

Mr. Davis contended that the object of the call was a most proper one. In the Senate there was an entire unanimity of opinion in favor of maintaining the rights of Maine. He agreed with the President that the question had been too long delayed, and ought to be settled. He referred to the agreement which had been entered into, through the mediation of General Scott, that neither Great Britain nor the United States should take possession of the disputed territory.

The correspondence between the Governor of Maine and the Governor of Nova Scotia, now given to the public, shows that the territory is occupied by British troops; and the governor of Nova Scotia admits that the occupancy is in direct violation of the agreement, and explains that it is not under his authority, but under some higher authority.

Mr. Davis said that under these circumstances he could not sit still, he could not fail to raise his voice of inquiry at least, as to what had been done for the honor of the country. It ought to be made manifest to the world that this Senate is awake and vigilant on this subject, and is determined to maintain the rights of Maine.

The following paragraph is taken from the Montreal Herald. We give it for what it is worth, only remarking by the way that it would be very strange if the report of Messrs. Featherstonhaugh and Mudge were not in favor of the British claim. As for the United States she will never consent to yield the territory in dispute.

In the Quebec Mercury of Thursday last we find the following memorandum issued by His Excellency Sir John Harvey, the Lieutenant Governor of the Province of New Brunswick. We do not know the motives which have induced his excellency to issue it, but it may possibly be in consequence of information he has received from the Imperial Government, that, in the event of Messrs. Fatherstonhaugh and Mudge's report of their survey of the disputed territory agreeing with the position already maintained by Great Britain, the whole energies of the empire will be called into action to enforce our possession of it, even at the cost of a war with the United States. Although these gentlemen have not allowed the particulars of their report to transpire, it is more than probable that its details are in the possession of Sir John Harvey, and that they are in our favor. In case of a general war, the recommendations of Sir John are extremely judicious, and we understand they were acted upon with the most beneficial results during the war of 1812 and the subsequent years:

MEMORANDUM.

I am desirous of impressing upon the inhabitants of the frontier districts of this Province, that in the event of hostilities with the United States, the most prudent course to be pursued (on either side, for the measure to be effectual must be reciprocal) would, in my opinion, be that of a strict neutrality. Let the Borderers remember that as connected with the war, if we should unhappily be compelled to engage in one, no national object can possibly be advanced by any display on the part of hostile feelings towards each other—they might, it is true, mutually subject each other to constant alarms, great calamities, suffering and distress—but their utmost efforts must be as a drop of water in the determination of the great national questions at issue, which must be decided elsewhere by the naval and military resources of the great powers engaged in the conflict.—And let the inhabitants of this Province repose with confidence upon the protection of the parent State, which is alike able and willing to throw her powerful shield over all who have a just claim to her protection and defence.

AMISTED TIAL.—TERMINATION.

From the New York Express.

Having just returned from New Haven, where, on behalf of the Committee acting for the captured Africans, I have been attending the District Court, I hand you an Extra of the New Haven Palladium containing the opinion of the Judge, of which the following is an abstract. The opinion is not very accurately printed, owing to its being done in haste, and in the night.—On Wednesday the Judge read an elaborate opinion, in which he decided;

1. That the District Court of Connecticut has jurisdiction, the schooner having been taken possession of in a legal sense on the "high seas."
2. That the libel of Thomas R. Gedney and others is properly filed in the District Court of Connecticut.
3. That the seizers are entitled to salvage, and an appraisement will be ordered, and one third of that amount and cost will be decreed just and reasonable.
4. That Gree and Fordham of Sag-Harbor, who claim to have taken original possession of vessel and cargo, cannot sustain their claim; and therefore their libels be dismissed.
5. That Ruez and Montez, through the Spanish Minister, have established no title to the Africans, as they are undoubtedly Bozal negroes, or negroes recently imported from Africa, in violation of the Laws of Spain.
6. That the demand of restitution, to have the question tried in Cuba, made by the Spanish Minister cannot be complied with, as by their own laws, it is certain they cannot enslave these Africans, and therefore cannot properly demand them for trial.
7. That Antoine, being a Creole, and legally a slave, and expressing a strong wish to be returned to Havana, a resolution will be decreed under the treaty of 1795.
8. That these Africans be delivered to the President of the United States, under the 2d sect. of the Act of March 3, 1839, and the 1st sect. of the laws of 1818, still in force, to be transported to Africa, there to be delivered to the agents appointed to receive and conduct them home.

The Court stands adjourned to meet at Hartford on the 23d instant, and meantime the decree will not be entered, to give an opportunity to the parties to appeal, if they see fit.

Respectfully yours,

LEWIS TAPPAN.

[The opinion of Judge Judson in the Evening Palladium, fills nearly eight closely printed columns, the substance of which seems to be embodied in the abstract given above.]

ANNUAL AGRICULTURAL MEETINGS.—The New York State Agricultural Society, and the New-York State Agricultural Convention, are both to meet in Albany on the First Tuesday of February, 1840. The members and delegates are requested to meet at the City Hotel, at 11 o'clock, A. M., from which they will adjourn to a place which will be provided for the public meetings.

Editors throughout the state are requested to copy the above.

In connection with this notice, we are requested to remind the members of the different committees that were appointed last winter to report on the particular subjects assigned them, that much of the interest of the ensuing meetings will depend upon the fulfilment of their duties, and it is confidently expected that that there will be no disappointment in this respect. It is to be hoped, also, that the friends of agricultural improvement in the different counties will take measures to be represented in the Convention.—Cultivator.

ATTEMPTED SUICIDE AND MURDER.—Last night, about half past 7 o'clock, a man at No 124 Nassau street, who had but just taken his board there, attempted to cut his throat with a clasp knife, and on his wife interfering to prevent his purpose, he stabbed her in the breast. The man is apparently deranged, for no just cause can be assigned for the act. It seems an observation was made by some of the other boarders that some things belonging to them had better be removed from the room where he was to sleep.—On this he started up exclaiming "I'm suspected, am I? I'd better cut my throat," so saying, he drew his knife and inflicted a wound on his throat. His wife instantly sprang towards him, when he warded her off and stabbed as we have above said. The maniac was secured and taken to the watch house. His wound is not dangerous.—N. Y. Gazette.

Some six weeks since, we stated that Sergeant Young, of the Marine Corps, who had been many years stationed at Bedlow's Island had suddenly disappeared, and that it was supposed either he had been murdered, or wandered away under some aberration of intellect. The latter appears to have been the case, as letters have just been received from him, dated Cincinnati, where it would seem he first awoke to consciousness of his identity. He is now on his way to this city and on his arrival the causes of his absence will of course undergo investigation. There is no reason, however, to suppose that it proceeded from any improper motive, as he left some money at home belonging to himself, and a larger amount belonging to the government, with all his accounts regularly made up, and found correct.—Courier.

INCENDIARIES.—On Monday evening, the 6th inst., the Hay Press, containing a quantity of hay, of Abraham I. Hardick, one mile north of this city, was burnt to ashes, and about three hours afterwards, the Barn and outhouses of his brother Cornelius Hardick, about three miles distant, were set fire to and consumed, together with a quantity of hay, three Horses, an Ox and two or three young cattle. No doubt is entertained, we believe, that both these fires were kindled by an incendiary. Five hundred dollars reward, is offered by Cornelius Hardick, for the discovery of the guilty person or persons.—Hudson Republican.

NARROW ESCAPE.—During the alarm of fire, last evening, a female, who had retired to rest, and who had been some hours asleep, awoke alarmed by the noise in the vicinity of her residence, at the Boylston House and attempted to throw herself from a window of her chamber, in the third story. Fortunately, her night-robe was caught by some obstruction, and her fall was prevented, although she had thrown herself so far out as to be unable to return without assistance, which her shrieks soon called, and she was safely—although somewhat lacerated by a broken pane of glass restored to her bed, and to her senses, which had deserted her in a moment of fright, on being roused, by the alarm of fireman, from sound slumber.—Boston Transcript.

DEATH OF A RIOTER.—We have received information from several different sources, of the death of another of the rioters who was concerned with Armstrong in the unprovoked attack on Mager's house on New Year's eve. He was badly wounded at the time, and lingered until a few days since, when he died. The name of the dead rioter is carefully withheld, on account of the alleged respectability of some of his friends. The wounds of the survivors, we understood, are all nearly healed. One of them, however, has been absent from the city, or carefully concealed for ten days past. The names of a number of the most active are known at the police.—N. Y. Sun.

The Haverhill Whig mentions the death in the jail of that town of Mr. Ebenezer Eaton, at the age of sixty-five, a soldier of the last war, and who received a pension of $48 a year. He was confined for debt, and after having taken the benefit of the act for the relief of poor debtors, was retained as security for the payment of his board-bill. This debt he could not pay, and we suppose his merciless incarcerator told him if he would pay the debt of nature he would 'square up' with him. This he did, and has now a full and honorable discharge.—Claremont (N.H.) Eagle.

We learn there are several hundred Indians, mostly Winnebagoes, now encamped in the woods bordering on the St. Clair River. It is supposed they intend to pass into Canada, as their leaders are in treaty with the authorities on the other side. They prefer her Majesty's dominions to a western emigration.—Detroit Adv.

SUPPOSED SHIPWRECK.—The Schooner Victor was last seen on Lake Erie, in the latter part of Nov., bound for Buffalo. Her cargo consisted of about four thousand bushels of Wheat, shipped from Michigan City, Ind., and Chicago, Ill., belonging to the Hon. Thos. Kempshall of Rochester, N. Y. Said Vessel is supposed to be lost, and all hands on board perished.—Detroit Adv.

FIRE AT FULTON.—On the morning of the 3d inst., the extensive Tannery, the property of Messrs. Wilder Falley & Co. together with a large quantity of leather and hides, was destroyed by fire. The loss estimated at $8000—insurance $4000. By the exertions of the firemen we learn that the books and a large amount of property was saved.—Oswego Pallad.

THE LEAD REGION.—The Rev. D. P. OWEN returned with his party to New Harmony, (la.) recently, having been out hunting lead nearly two months. It appears that they have succeeded in making sixteen new discoveries of lead, where no diggings have heretofore been attempted—some of them exceedingly rich and pure.

NELSON COTHRAN, convicted of burning the Rail Road Bridge across the river Rouge, has been sentenced to ten years imprisonment in the State Penitentiary.

MARRIED.

Last evening, by the Rev. Dr. Wyckoff, William Updyke, Jr, to Mary F. Lisher, all of this city.

Yesterday morning, by the Rev. Dr. Wyckoff, Daniel B. Fenn, of Stockbridge, Mass to Georgiana, daughter of the late George Metcalf, Esq. of Staten Island.

DIED.

At Athens, Green county, on the 19th inst. Mr. Thomas Spencer, aged 88 years. Mr. Spencer was for many years a merchant in extensive business operations in this city, and was well known and much respected by many of its old inhabitants.

In New-York, on the 18th inst. Mrs. Elizabeth Mulligan, wife of John W. Mulligan, Esq. aged 63 years.

On the 4th inst. at Quincy, Florida, Prof. Edward Savage, of Union College, Schenectady, aged 16 years.

THE PORTRAIT.

Little Know
The cold unfeeling world how strong the love
The first warm love of youth; how long it bears
Absence, and still looks calm.—
Percival.

Supported by the easel there
The pictured life of beauty bright—
The brow—its gentle glow of care,
The form, the grace, and dark brown hair,
Soft mingle as the stars and night,
And one deep glance so glads the sight,
I turn, with thought entranced, to know
If not of such is bliss below.

Yet not the form dwelt on by me,
Nor e'en the eye, so softly set,
But something like to minstrelsy,
Which few can sing and none forget—
That gem bright radiance of the soul,
Whose smile can win, whose look control.

Why lingers there, with gaze intent,
One sad, and pale, and motionless,
As with his very life were blest
That look, that form, and every tress—
He seems to envy light and air
The privilege of passing there,
As though the Canvass could reveal
The lips to move and heart to feel?

Anon, as Memory's viewless flame,
Sweeps thrilling through his heart and frame,
And heaves his breast, as heaves the sea,
Long prisoned thoughts, which may not rest
Within the care-worn sufferer's breast,
In low-breath'd words find liberty.

"Sweet art divine! Thy tints give back
Her look as some neglected treasure,
And carry through my pulses track
A gush of warm and living pleasure.

"How swift upon the wings of thought
Return bright years of deep devotion,
When hope's fair brow, with love unwrought,
Blush'd many a light and sweet emotion!

"But I awake to find no more
The smiles of hope around my pillow—
When list'ning for the voice of yore
I'm borne where mourns the waving willow.

"And here's a tear, and here's a sigh,
That death should press her cheek of roses,
And never sorrow's plant can die,
Its root deep in my heart reposes.

"But yet I am not lonely all,
For mem'ry tells a moving story,
And thou dost many a grace recall,
And lip, and eye, and smile restore me.

"Ay! now those features mild express,
A feeling warm, and deep, and tender,
To half remove my dark distress,
And half revive hope's wonted splendor.

"Still smile, oh smile, while I forget
The worms that mid the leaves are stealing,
The hopes that mid the ruin set
Of many a pure and cherished feeling!

"I may nor can look death upon,
As stifling thoughts of those that sever,
But as a cloud before the sun,
Which soon shall fade, and fade forever.

"And, emblem of my guiding star,
When earth before my view is vanishing,
I'd bear thy sad, sweet smile afar—
So much of joy, so much complaining,

"A joy that hearts can meet again,
A grief that shall no longer weary,
A soothing flow of bliss and pain,
To thrill this bosom cold and dreary!"

Albany, Jan. 1840.

CHARITY.

BY DOCTOR COSTILL.

Give to him that asketh thee, and from him that would borrow of thee turn not thou away.—Matt. v. 4.

O stay not thy hand when the winter winds rude,
Blow cold through the dwelling of want and despair.
To ask if misfortune has come to the good,
Or if folly has wrought the wreck that is there.

When the heart stricken wanderer asks thee for bread
In suffering he bows to necessity's laws;
When the wife mourns in sadness the children unfed,
The cup must be bitter—oh ask not the cause.

When the Saviour of men raised his finger to heal,
Did he ask if the sufferer were Gentile or Jew?
When the thousands were fed with the bountiful meal,
Did he give it alone to the faithful and few?

Oh, scan not too closely the frailty of those,
Whose bosoms may bleed on a cold winter's day;
But give to the friendless who tell thee his woes,
And from him that would borrow, oh! turn not away.

TIME.

Time hath a wonder working power,
And changes all beneath the sun,
Vicissitudes through every hour,
Through every moment run;
Nor fame, nor wealth, nor pride, nor force,
Can change, arrest, or speed its course.

Time o'er the infant that appears,
In babyhood so sweet to-day,
Shall bring and leave a weight of years,
And bear that weight away:
Leaving no traces on the scene,
Or only this that he has been.

Time shall impress oblivion's seal,
On many records of the brave;
And time hath mysteries to reveal,
Like secrets from the grave;
When men and ages yet unborn,
Antiquity's dark path have worn.

Time will the truest friendship prove;
Changes, confirm, or mark the fall,
Time is the genuine test of love
That knows no change at all;
But friendship, generous, pure sublime,
And love, true love, improves with Time.

Time wings the seasons in their flight;
Measurers e'en from Creation's birth;
But life and death, and day and night,
And all things upon earth,
Sun, moon, and stars, are set to be,
Time's way mark through eternity.

Time brings the increase of the world,
Fills up each chasm made by death;
And while from life are millions hurled,
Gives other millions breath;
Kindles aspiring manhood's fires,
And quells the vigor of its sires.

Time through the gayest breast may fling,
A poisoned, barbed, unerring dart;
Time may extract affliction's sting,
E'en from the saddest heart;
Pour balm into its wounds at length,
And clothe the spirit with new strength.

Time will impair the youth if young,
If old; will soon the age decay;
On Time, all hopes, all fears are hung,
O, then be wise to-day:
For Time, which changed all things before,
Thy state shall fix to change no more.

THE DYING MOTHER.

—She made a sign
To bring her babe—'twas brought, and by her placed;
She looked upon its face, that neither smiled
Nor wept, nor knew who gazed upon't, and laid

Her hand upon its little breast, and sought
For it with look that seemed to penetrate
The heaven—unutterable blessings, such
As God to dying parents only granted,
For infants left behind them in the world,
"God keep my child!" we heard her say, and heard
No more—the Angel of the Covenant
Was come, and, faithful to his promise, stood
Prepared to walk with her through death's dark vale.
And now her eyes grew bright, and brighter still,
Too bright for ours to look upon, suffused
With many tears;—and, closed without a cloud.
They set as sets the morning star, which goes
Not down behind the darkened west, nor hides
Obscured among the tempests of the sky,
But melts away into the light of heaven.

P O E M.

BY SIR WILLIAM JONES.

What power beyond all powers elate,
Sustains this universal flame!
'Tis not nature, 'tis not fate,
'Tis not the dance of atoms blind,
Etherial space, or subtle flame!
No—'tis one vast Eternal Mind,
Too sacred for an eternal name,
He forms, pervades, directs the whole;
Not like the microcosm's imag'd soul,
But provident of endless good,
But ways not seen nor understood,
Which even his angels vainly might explore,
High their highest thoughts above,
Truth—Wisdom—Justice—Mercy—Love,
Wrought in his heavenly essence, blaze and soar,
Wrapt in contemplation meek,
Him fear—Him trust—Him venerate—Him adore.

THE HISTORY OF FREEMASONRY,

DRAWN FROM AUTHENTIC SOURCES OF INFORMATION.

No. XI.

It was about this time according to Dr Robinson that Freemasonry was introduced among the continental kingdoms. After James II. of England had abdicated the throne, and taken refuge in France with several of his adherents, it is probable that they would communicate additional spirit to the French lodges; but that the English refugees were the first who exported Masonry from Britain, or that they employed it for re-establishing the Stuart family on the English throne, it is impossible to prove. Such assertions, Dr. Robinson has not only hazarded, but has employed them also as the foundation of defamatory conclusions without adducing a single proof in their support. Notwithstanding the difficulty, however, of determining the precise period when the principles of Freemasonry were imported into France, it is manifest, from the universal consent of the continental lodges, that it was of British origin: and it is more than probable, that the French received it from Scotland about the middle of the sixteenth century, during the minority of Queen Mary. It is well known, that there was at that time a freer intercourse between Scotland and France than at any other period. Mary Queen of Scots was then married to the heir-apparent of France; and Mary of Guise, sister to the French King, was at the same time regent of Scotland. In consequence of this intimate connection between the two kingdoms, French troops were sent to the assistance of the Scots, who, having resided many years in the kingdom, and being habituated to the manners and customs of their allies, would naturally carry along with them into their native country, those customs which afforded them pleasure; and none we know could be more congenial to the taste and dispositions of Frenchmen, than the ceremonial observances of Freemasonry. But it is not upon these considerations merely that our opinion depends. It receives ample confirmation from a fact, of which Dr. Robinson seems to have been totally ignorant. In the year 1645, a particular jurisdiction for Masons, called Maçonnerie or Masonrie, was established in France. All differences which related to the art of building, were decided by particular judges who were called Overseers of the Art of Masonry; and several counselors were appointed for pleading the causes, which were referred to their decision^(a). This institution has such a striking resemblance to the warden courts which existed in Scotland in the sixteenth century, that it must have derived its origin from these. In both of them, those causes only were decided which related to Masonry, and overseers were chosen in both for bringing these causes to a decision. But as tribunals were held in no other part of the world, and as the warden courts were first established in Scotland, it is almost certain, that the French borrowed from the Scots the idea of their Masonic tribunal, as well as Freemasonry itself, at that particular period when there was such a free communication between the two kingdoms. That the French received Freemasonry from Scotland may be presumed from the singular pre-eminence which was always given by foreigners to Scottish Masonry, and from the degree of Chevalier Mugon Ecossais, which as a mark of respect to Scotland, the French had added to the three symbolic degrees of masonry, about the beginning of the eighteenth century. Had Freemasonry not been introduced into France till after the revolution in 1688, as Dr. Robinson affirms, it is wonderful how such a fact should have been so soon forgotten; for it was unknown about thirty or forty years afterwards, at what period the French received it from Britain; and if the exiled family had employed Freemasonry for overturning the Hanoverian succession, it is still more strange that such a circumstance should be unknown in a country, where concealment was certainly unnecessary. When any new custom is introduced into a nation, the time of its introduction may be remembered for seventy or eighty years by one individual, without being committed to writing; and, though it be not of sufficient importance, tradition will preserve it from oblivion for a much greater length of time. If Freemasonry, therefore, never existed in France till after the revolution in 1688, it is not absurd to suppose, that the period when such a singular institution was established, should be utterly forgotten at the distance of thirty or forty years from its establishment, though during that time, it was never persecuted by the French Government.

But at whatever period, and from whatever source Freemasonry was introduced into France, it assumed there a very remarkable form. The attachment of that to invocation and external finery, produced the most unwarrantable alterations upon the principles and ceremonies of the order. A number of new degrees were created; the office-bearers of the craft were arrayed in the most splendid and costly attire; and the lodges were transformed into lecturing rooms, where the wiser brethren sported the most extravagant opinions, discussed the abstrusest questions in theology and political economy, and broached opinions which were certainly hostile to true religion and sound government. In the other countries of the continent, similar invocations, in a greater or less degree, prevailed, while the British lodges preserved the principles of the craft in their primitive simplicity and excellence. Such dangerous innovations have not the smallest connection with the principles of Freemasonry. They are unnatural excrescence formed by a warm imagination, and fostered by the interference of designing men. Those who reprehend Freemasonry therefore, for the changes which it underwent in the hands of foreigners may throw equal blame upon religion, because it has been a cloak for licentiousness and hypocrisy; or upon science, because it has been converted into an instrument of iniquity. The changes of which we have been treating, arose altogether from the political condition of the countries where they were made. In France, and the other kingdoms of Europe, where popery was the ecclesiastical establishment, or where absolute power was in the hands of their monarchs, the most slavish constraint was imposed upon the conduct, and conversation of the people. None durst utter his own sentiments, or converse upon such metaphysical subjects as militated against the theology and politics of the times. Under such restraints, speculative men, in particular, were highly dissatisfied. Those powers which heaven had bestowed, and on the exercise of which their happiness depended, were fettered by human laws; and that liberty of speech restrained, which tyranny had no right to controul. For these reasons the lodges were frequented by men of philosophical habits, eagerly embraced an opportunity of declaring their sentiments, and discussing the favorite objects of their study, without dreading the threats of government, or the tortures of the Inquisition. In this view the lodges may be compared to republics, enjoying the rational liberties of human nature, in the midst of an extensive empire, enslaved despotism and superstition. In the course of time, however, that liberty was abused, and doctrines were propagated in the French and German lodges, which it is the duty and policy of every government to discover and suppress. But these corruptions had not, by any means, a necessary connection with Freemasonry. They arose wholly from the political condition of the continental kingdom. In Britain where the order subsisted much longer than in any other country, its history is stained by no glaring corruptions, or offensive innovations; more attention was paid to the intrinsic value of the order, than to its external observances; and the British lodges had a greater resemblance to charitable meetings, than to pompous and splendid assemblies. Blessed with a free constitution, and allowed every innocent liberty of our nature, we can divulge our sentiments with the greatest freedom, we can mark even the errors of administration without any to make us afraid. In such circumstances, Britons are under no temptation to introduce into the lodges religious and political discussions. The liberty of the press enables them to give the widest circulation to their opinions, however new and extravagant; and they are liable to no punishment by publicly attacking the established religion of their country. The British lodges, therefore, have retained their primitive purity; they have been employed in no sinister cause; they have harboured in their bosom neither traitors, nor atheists, nor French philosophers.

While the French were busily engaged in the decoration of their lodges, and in the invention of new degrees and trifling ceremonies, the masons in England were more wisely employed in extending the boundaries of the royal art. About the beginning of the eighteenth century, during the reign of the Queen Anne, Freemasonry seems to have rapidly declined in the south of England; four lodges only existed in the south and few hopes could be entertained of a revival, while the seat of the grand lodge was at such a distance as the city of York. In such circumstances, the four lodges met in 1717, and, in order to give vigor to their declining cause, and advance the interests of the fraternity in the south, they elected themselves into a Grand Lodge, and chose Anthony Sayer, esq. for their first Grand Master. Thus was instituted the Grand Lodge of England, which has now attained to such a pitch of prosperity and splendor. The motive which suggested this institution, was certainly laudible and useful; but every person must be aware, that the four lodges were guilty of a considerable impropriety in omitting to request the countenance of the Grand Lodge
